On the question of further guidance from my Department, I think that the answer lies in the new version of development control policy note 11, which I issued as recently as last January. I believe that the new version of the note — which was issued after the appeal cases to which my hon. Friend referred — sets out clear policy advice along the lines I have described.

The way in which national policy falls to be applied in local areas is, of course, a matter for local authorities themselves — and the note emphasises the role of local authorities' development plans in this respect. It makes it very clear that sound and well-judged policies in a local plan will provide the best framework for decisions on applications for amusement centres. The matter is therefore very much in the hands of individual district councils. If they incorporate suitable policies in their local plans, policies which are apt to secure proper land use planning objectives such as those set out in the policy note, and accord with the general advice in circular 22/84 and the memorandum on structure and local plans, such policies will be very relevant in appeal decisions. If the advice in the policy note seems insufficient in some way, I would be happy to look at it again. But I think that more than a few months' experience of the working of the note is needed to give it a fair trial, and I urge my hon. Friend to study the document in detail with his local authority representatives, and, if they wish to come back and make any comments. My door is open.

I acknowledge again the constructive way in which my hon. Friend introduced this topic. It has provided a useful opportunity to discuss the issue. I recognise that there has been some uncertainty, and I do not underestimate the deep disquiet which it has generated in many towns and cities throughout the country. But I hope that our new note will have clarified matters. It was greatly welcomed by the local authority associations. In local areas where uncertainty still exists it is very much a matter for local authorities to set the context for applications by adopting appropriate policies in their local plans.

I again congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing the subject and on being so diligent on behalf of his constituents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Three o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Nuclear Power Stations

1. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many additional nuclear power stations he expects to be commissioned between 1985 and 2000.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): The ordering of nuclear power stations by the CEGB beyond those currently under construction cannot be considered until after the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry.

Mr. Beith: Is that all the Minister can say, when yesterday's newspapers reported that the CEGB had dusted off its plans to build another 12 nuclear power stations before the end of the century, including, of course, one at Druridge bay, Northumberland? Is the Secretary of State planning to halve the country's dependence upon coal for energy purposes, and if so, why; or is he making the same exaggerated assumptions about energy demand as were fashionable when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was Secretary of State for Energy?

Mr. Goodlad: The number of stations will depend upon a range of factors, including the future level of electricity demand. The CEGB has stated that it does not intend to make applications for new power stations, nuclear or otherwise, before the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry is known. I understand that the CEGB has said that should it receive consent to construct Sizewell B, it would, subject to obtaining consent, wish to complete several PWRs before the end of the century. My right hon. Friend will consider any such applications on their merits at the time.

Mr. Portillo: If more PWR stations are to be built, does my hon. Friend imagine that the inquiries that will have to be held before each of those reactors is built will be as long as the Sizewell inquiry, or will some abbreviated form of inquiry be possible?

Mr. Goodlad: The terms of reference for any future inquiry will be set in the light of circumstances prevailing at the time.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: What is the Government's view about a safe or acceptable level of radiation exposure for the public, and how will that level be affected by the type of building programme for nuclear power stations that the Minister has discussed?

Mr. Goodlad: The Government attach the highest possible importance to nuclear safety, and any planning applications will be subject to the necessary consents.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend aware that electricity is considerably cheaper in France, which is substantially dependent on nuclear energy? Does he therefore agree that anyone interested in cheaper energy prices for pensioners and other low-income groups should welcome an expansion of Great Britain's nuclear energy programme?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend makes an important point.

Colliery Closures, Yorkshire

2. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the proposed colliery closures in Yorkshire.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): Individual closures are a matter for the National Coal Board in consultation with the mining unions.

Mr. Barron: I am pleased that the NCB is considering having consultations with the mining unions on closures. More than 95,000 people are unemployed in South Yorkshire at present, and the NCB proposes to get rid of job opportunities for another 10,000 people. How many jobs does the Minister think that NCB (Enterprises) Ltd. will create in South Yorkshire to try to stem that ever-increasing tide of unemployment?

Mr. Hunt: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the role of NCB (Enterprises) Ltd. is vital. The number of jobs created will depend upon the circumstances at the time and the number of applications, but I know that there is good will on both sides of the House for the vital work of that strategic organisation.

Mr. Mason: Is the Minister aware that of the 10,000 job losses that have been announced in Yorkshire since the strike ended, 3,000 are in Barnsley and district? With the knock-on effects, that will bring the unemployment rate in my area to 21·5 per cent. That is a ruthless pace of change and the local authorities cannot create sufficient jobs to neutralise such job losses. Is the hon. Gentleman further aware of the existence of the coalfield communities campaign, in which 54 local authorities, representing 16 million people, have banded together to try to create jobs in coal mining communities? What are the Government and the National Coal Board prepared to do to help?

Mr. Hunt: As I said in reply to the previous question, it is vital that NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. should have good will on both sides of the House. My right hon. Friend and I look forward to discussing these important issues with the coalfield communities campaign.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Opposition would have done better to address themselves to the question of where the blame lies for all the unemployment and trouble? It lies with the president of the NUM?

Mr. Hunt: It is vital that the House should appreciate the significance of that comment. I believe that the coal industry in Yorkshire has a very good future. It has a marvellous showcase in the Selby coalfield, which, thanks to record investment by this Government, illustrates how one can harness new technology to create low-cost high outputs. That is the great future in Yorkshire.

Mr. Ryman rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question about Yorkshire?

Mr. Ryman: Of course it is, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Under-Secretary of State satisfied with the machinery for operating the colliery review procedure in the case of the threatened closure of a pit? Is the hon. Gentleman aware — I shall be most interested in his views—that the colliery review procedure is a farce? It contravenes every rule of judicial impartiality. The decision to be made in respect of a proposed colliery review procedure — [HON. MEMBERS: "In Yorkshire."] in Yorkshire or anywhere else — may be pre-empted because the regional director of the NCB can so manipulate affairs that the procedure does not operate fairly. For example, the regional director can empty a pit of men, as he has done at Bates' colliery in Northumberland.

Mr. Hunt: I believe that there is a very good existing colliery review procedure. I am pleased with what I believe to be a reasonable offer put by the NCB to the three unions concerned, thereby improving that procedure and fulfilling the agreement reached last October with NACODS. I hope that the modified procedure will be put in place as quickly as possible.

TUC Fuel and Power Industries Committee

3. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the members of the Trades Union Congress fuel and power industries committee; and what was discussed.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan): I met members of the committee on 27 February to discuss oil refining policy.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: In view of the enormous importance of the energy sector to the whole of British industry and to domestic users, will the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues discuss with the TUC the contribution which the different sectors of the energy industry can make towards reducing costs and improving efficiency, thereby helping the competitiveness of British industry?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The TUC committee requested a discussion on the refining industry. We had a very good meeting on that subject. Energy as a whole is extremely important, not only to British industry, but to the economy.

Coal Industry

4. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the reduction in the level of output, manning and number of pits in the British coal industry since the end of the dispute in the industry.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): Since the end of the strike, production has recovered well in most areas. I understand that coal deliveries last week were over 2·5 million tonnes, the highest for five years.

Mr. Douglas: Will the right hon. Gentleman give some indication of coal imports? Will he give me an assurance about investment in the Comrie colliery in Fife and the Longannet complex? Will he also comment on morale in the industry, especially in Scotland where 203 men who were dismissed during the strike have not been re-employed because of the obduracy and bone-headedness of the NCB chairman?

Mr. Walker: I think that morale in the industry would have been adversely affected by some of the violence displayed in Scotland. Obviously, such a dispute will have certain effects. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about investment in the colliery to which he referred.

Mr. Maude: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is crucial for the NCB to move from high-cost to low-cost capacity, and that an important contribution to that change will be the speedy implementation of the plans for the south Warwickshire prospect?

Mr. Walker: I believe that a general welcome has been given to the fact that in south Warwickshire there is potential for a very heavy investment programme and production of coal at low cost. That is certainly important to the industry's future.

Mr. Ray Powell: I remind the Secretary of State that the purpose of the coal mining dispute was primarily to fight against pit closures. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the NCB has already announced the closure of St. John's colliery in Maesteg? Three weeks ago, I asked the rigt hon. Gentleman whether he would set up an inquiry to ascertain why that colliery would be closed and whether he would give me some details. I remind him that on Saturday I attended the last function of the mining apprentices club in mid-Glamorgan. That club, which was established 15 years ago, has had to be wound up because it no longer has sufficient apprentices.

Mr. Walker: At regional level, I know that the proposals for Wales are being discussed among the unions. The modified pit closure procedure that has been suggested by the NCB will be raised in further discussions with those unions. Any closure will be fully looked at, if necessary by an independent group, before any final decision is made.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Why should my right hon. Friend have to talk about reductions in coal output when it was Scargill who caused such reductions? Should not my right hon. Friend congratulate pits, such as the Leicestershire coal mines, on their excellent output and good manning levels? Will he join me in criticising what the Select Committee on Employment has done? That Select Committee, and no one else, has diminished morale in the industry. We should be encouraging our miners to get on with the job of producing more coal.

Mr. Walker: In my reply I said that production in most parts of the country is fast returning to normal levels, and in some areas it is at very high levels. The fact that more coal was moved last week than at any time for five years is another reflection on the fact that the industry needs encouragement and that some people should not take the attitude that my hon. Friend has mentioned.

Mr. Orme: What discussions has the Secretary of State had about a new "Plan for Coal"? He will be aware that the present plan runs out this year. Does he agree that if we are looking to the future of the industry there should be an overall plan, which could be agreed between the unions, the Government and the NCB?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I gather that in that sphere the board is preparing views to put to the unions. There will be a meeting with the unions to discuss in principle what is required for a plan that will produce coal at the right price to take full advantage of the market opportunities and of the high investment that has gone into that industry. Therefore, I believe that talks will take place along the lines that the right hon. Gentleman envisages.

EC Energy Policy

5. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he is satisfied with progress towards the development of a European Community energy policy.

Mr. Goodlad: We are now satisfied that progress is being made.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend realise that some of us feel that progress has been disappointingly slow so far? Do the Government intend to take any initiative to try to speed up progress in achieving such a policy?

Mr. Goodlad: I note my hon. Friend's view. Community energy objectives provide a framework for national energy programmes and actions. This country's policies have made a major contribution to improving the Community's energy position. We share the Commission's view that we need to continue with effective policies for the future.

Mr. John David Taylor: Will the Minister confirm reports that the French authorities have offered to provide cheaper electricity by cable to the United Kingdom? If so, what is the Government's response?

Mr. Goodlad: The Central Electricity Generating Board and EDF have agreed to construct a 2,000 MW cross-Channel link. The first half will be available later this year, and the second half a year later. The CEGB has agreed with EDF the commercial arrangements for the operation of the first half of the link during the first two years. There are no agreements covering the period after that.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Could my hon. Friend translate into one of the European languages what he means by "progress"? How much progress, how much cost and how long?

Mr. Goodlad: I understand that the rules of the House forbid me to translate into foreign languages.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister might try Welsh, and he might get away with it. Is he aware that the Secretary of State has given repeated assurances that he will not allow the Commission to interfere in the financing and subsidising of the national coal industry in the United Kingdom? Is he further aware that there is an attempt to dilute the national veto over several areas in the EEC context which are to be discussed in the next few weeks? Will the hon. Gentleman assure us that it will remain the right of our Government to decide on the subsidising and financing of the National Coal Board?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Sir. No Commission proposals have been received yet, although, as the hon. Gentleman knows, new Community legislation will be required by the end of the year to regulate national aids for coal. Otherwise, they would breach the European Coal and Steel Community treaty. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already told Commissioner Mosar that the proposals will have to reflect the interests of the major coal-producing member states. Energy programmes carried out under article 235 require unanimous Council agreement. The ECSC treaty contains provision for majority voting in some cases. However, any decision to replace the existing state aids regime would require Council unanimity.

Dismissed Miners (Scotland)

6. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the National Coal Board about the re-employment of dismissed National Union of Mineworkers' members in Scotland.

Mr. Peter Walker: Of 9,808 miners arrested during the dispute, more than 7,000 were charged. Of the 5,653 cases so far dealt with, 4,318 were convicted. It is against those figures that one must recognise that 1,019 were dismissed. The board has been reviewing dismissal cases, and 414 miners who were dismissed have been re-employed. I have been assured by the chairman, as he assured the Select Committee on Employment, that area management is continuing the board's policy of reviewing dismissal cases.

Mr. Orme: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This question relates specifically to Scotland. Why did the Secretary of State not answer it?

Mr. Walker: The facts, figures and the whole approach apply to Scotland in the same way as to everywhere else.

Mr. Orme rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) confine his question to Scotland, because I shall expect every other hon. Member who is called to do the same?

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that the decisions that have been taken in Scotland are outrageous, because, of 203 men who have been dismissed, not one has been reinstated? Is this not a matter of natural justice, as has been underlined by the all-party Select Committee report? What action is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to take over Scottish miners who have been dismissed?

Mr. Walker: The right hon. Gentleman used the phrase "all-party Select Committee report". It is true that one Conservative Member agreed with parts of that report, but, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows, that report has been widely condemned for having no—[Interruption.] A report which failed to deal completely with the violence that took place—[Interruption.] I assure the House that matters in Scotland are being reviewed on the same basis as elsewhere. Those cases will be carefully considered. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman, on behalf of the Opposition, will condemn the view, expressed by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and by the leader of the NUM, that people who are convicted of violence should receive an amnesty.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I call Mrs. Currie to ask a question about Scotland.

Mrs. Currie: Has not each Scottish miner who was sacked exactly the same right as sacked miners elsewhere to go to an industrial tribunal—[Interruption.] Is it not also a fact that in some parts of the country — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should be allowed to ask her question.

Mrs. Currie: Is it not also a fact that in some parts of the country sacked miners are being reinstated by industrial tribunals and that their rights are being upheld? Does not the unwillingness of the Scottish miners and others to go to court show that they are not interested in staying within the law or using it when it is to their benefit?

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend is quite right. The NCB made it clear to the Select Committee that it will carefully consider any tribunal findings.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Secretary of State aware that, despite what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, sacked miners in Scotland do not apparently have the same rights as other miners in the United Kingdom? It is quite clear that the policy being pursued in Scotland is vicious and irrational compared with the policy being followed in other regions of the United Kingdom. People who did not support the strike, or were not fully behind it, now see that a totally vicious policy is being pursued in Scotland. If the Secretary of State takes no action, it will be clear that he is pursuing the same policy as the National Coal Board.

Mr. Walker: As the board has told the Select Committee, it is continuing to review all cases, including those in Scotland. Many people in Scotland who witnessed some of the events around Bilston Glen certainly believe that it is right that some of the miners involved should have been dismissed.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in Scotland and elsewhere the NUM thought that at the end of the dispute it could secure a general amnesty, as it succeeded in doing in 1972 and 1974, and, therefore, many miners were encouraged to participate in violence or intimidation, in the hope that they would have immunity in the short term and in the belief that they could secure an amnesty in the long term? Is it not extraordinary that in the middle of the 20th century anyone should argue that employers should be forced to retain or reinstate men who have burnt their buses, smashed their equipment and assaulted their staff? Is it not right to deal with such conduct through industrial tribunals? Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the Select Committee, whatever else it said, could not bring itself to say that miners had been unfairly dismissed in the dispute?

Mr. Walker: The points made by my hon. Friend, who served on the Select Committee, are perfectly correct. Regarding the arguments about an amnesty, it is interesting that both the president of the NUM and the right hon. Member for Chesterfield have said that not only should an amnesty be given by the National Coal Board, but that if a Labour Government came to office an amnesty would be given for sentenced miners, no matter what they were sentenced for by the courts. So far we have no sign from the Leader of the Opposition that he disagrees with that view.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Secretary of State pause and consider the question that was asked, which was specifically about Scotland? Two hundred and three men have been dismissed, and not one of those cases has been discussed by the board in Scotland with a view to re-engagement. I gave some information to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, but will the Secretary of State undertake to meet Scottish Members of Parliament and go through this issue and then meet the National Coal Board to ensure fairness and justice, because we are manifestly not getting that at present?

Mr. Walker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have never refused to meet Members of Parliament on any question, and I will always meet them.

Mr. Neale: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of his Conservative colleagues feel strongly that he should not intervene in matters where miners have been dismissed in this way, and neither should Parliament? Does he accept that if the Select Committee's report, which was decided on the casting vote of the Chairman —and an Opposition Member at that—were put into effect by the House it would lead to the peculiarity of giving miners rights under the law which no other groups enjoy?

Mr. Walker: I am interested to know whether there is a similar desire by the Select Committee to investigate some of the ghastly instances of intimidation of working miners which took place.

Mr. Foot: Is it not the case that many of the individual decisions being taken by the board not to reinstate miners —Scotland is the worst affected, but other parts are also affected—will poison relations for weeks, months and perhaps years to come? Is it not also the case that the Secretary of State has the right to intervene? If so, why does he not do so?

Mr. Walker: The point is made clearly by the figures that I gave to the House. Of 5,653 convictions, slightly more than 1,000 were dismissed, and already 414 have been reinstated. Those figures show that careful consideration has been given.

British Gas

7. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the expansion plans of British Gas prior to privatisation.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No, Sir. Business plans are a matter for the corporation.

Mr. Colvin: That reply was not particularly helpful. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what steps he intends to take to persuade British Gas to honour such commitments as it has entered into to expand services to rural areas, because there is a growing feeling in rural areas, especially among domestic consumers, that if they did not get gas prior to privatisation they will never get it?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend raises an important and sensitive issue, and I am glad to reassure him that the present obligations of the British Gas Corporation will be carried over to the new company.

North Sea Oilfields

8. Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about the cost of production of North sea oilfields recently brought on stream.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The average cost per barrel for fields which started production between 1980 and 1984 is estimated to be £9. The corresponding cost for fields now under development is £13.

Mr. Skeet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the reduction in oil prices and movements in the exchange rate will affect the profitability of those fields and that something must be done for them? Will he recommend mergers and the rationalisation of some small firms which have applied and been successful in the ninth round?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Of course if the price of oil falls that affects profitability. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will reflect on the figures that I have given. The price will have to fall a long way before the North sea becomes unprofitable.

Mr. Rowlands: Is the Minister aware that the future lies in enhanced oil recovery from existing fields? Since nothing was done this year to encourage that development, what urgent consideration is he giving to future proposals in this regard?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As the hon. Gentleman knows, this matter was considered in the preparation for the Budget this year, and a case was not made out on the information presently available. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has invited the industry to reconsider its case, and has said that he will consider it when it is presented. The hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue.

Coal Mines (Ownership)

9. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his policy towards the sale of deep mines surplus to National Coal Board requirements to other operators; and if he will make a statement.

15. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received regarding the future ownership and structure of the coalmining industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government have no plans to privatise the mining activities of the National Coal Board.

Mr. Leigh: Just as launching other nationalised industries on the road to profitability was a precursor to privatisation, will the defeat of the Luddites in the NUM, and turning back the Coal Board from everlasting reliance on state subsidies, be a precursor to the gradual privatisation of pits? If not, why not?

Mr. Walker: The present losses and deficits in the industry are a great disadvantage to the country, to those who work in the industry and to its prospects. However, I hope that we shall find ways of giving NCB employees much more direct participation in the industry than they enjoy under nationalisation.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the Minister aware that the NUM and others in the mining communities will welcome his statement that neither he nor the Government have any intention of privatising the coal industry? However, since it is an important part of the work of the industry to improve industrial relations, does he accept that until he gets rid of Mr. MacGregor as the chairman of the NCB industrial relations will not improve to the point that we require?

Mr. Walker: At present, there are plenty of examples of co-operation and of pits going well. I gave the figures for the production and distribution of coal this week, and there are some encouraging signs. I do not wish to become involved in making judgments on any personalities. Mr. MacGregor's definition that the best future for the industry would be to have an expanding market with highly effective coal production as a result of high investment is the only sensible analysis of the future of the industry. I should have liked to give the hon. Gentleman a more helpful reply in his birthday week, but I regret that I cannot do so.

Mr. Rost: Does my right hon. Friend at least have plans to liberate opencast operations from the restrictive patronage of the NCB?

Mr. Walker: It is important that we take advantage of the opencast opportunities that exist. In some parts of the country, especially Scotland and Wales, such a step would be important for jobs.

Mr. Barron: Although I do not agree with the privatisation of the coal mining industry, does the Minister believe that selling surpluses will do any good? Presumably, the reason for closing collieries now is that the coal is surplus to requirements. What is the sense of selling them?

Mr. Walker: The sense is to produce coal in the future at a price at which the world wishes to buy it.

Mr. Eggar: If approaches were made by other operators or by miners currently employed by the NCB to purchase NCB assets or to become involved in joint ventures with the NCB, would the Government stand in the way of an NCB decision to sell its assets?

Mr. Walker: The NCB is considering several such applications from miners. However, the matter is more complicated than it sounds, because I fear that the miners who have made applications in respect of the pits at which they work have not taken into their calculations the enormous investment that is required to maintain safety standards in pits. That is not a simple process. Any approach by miners will be considered by the National Coal Board and be regarded sympathetically by the Government.

British Gas

11. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received regarding his proposals to privatise the British Gas Corporation.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received a number of representations from various organisations and individuals. I have also met the chairman of the National Gas Consumers Council and will be meeting representatives of unions.

Mr. Pike: Does the Secretary of State admit that the move towards privatisation of the British Gas Corporation arises out of political dogma and to help raise money that the Government need? Does he accept that the best interests of consumers and of safety will be served by leaving the corporation in public hands?

Mr. Peter Walker: No. The move to privatise the British Gas Corporation will be good for consumers, employees and the country.

Mr. Portillo: Has my right hon. Friend received any representations from the gas producers? Is he afraid that the monopoly position of British Gas might discourage exploration in the North sea, to the detriment of jobs in Britain?

Mr. Walker: I have received no such representations, but I can assure my hon. Friend that British Gas and the Government have a vested interest in encouraging the maximum development of the North sea. I can assure my hon. Friend that that will take place.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Secretary of State aware that the country will not be able to judge whether the move will benefit anyone until we have seen the details of the proposals? Will the right hon. Gentleman publish the details long before legislation is brought before the House? In particular, will he tell the House on what principles gas prices will be fixed?

Mr. Walker: Of course we shall publish proposals in advance of legislation. Knowing the terrific mental application of the Social Democrats, I am sure that they will have no difficulty in formulating their view long before legislation is introduced.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Is it because of what my right hon. Friend has said that British Gas has taken space in the country's Left-wing magazines' colour supplements in the last fortnight?

Mr. Walker: I do not know whether one would describe The Economist and the Spectator as Left-wing magazines, but since British Gas advertise in them, too, a tolerable balance has been achieved.

Mr. Orme: Will not the proposals be good for Rothschild's as well? In view of the role that it played in Britoil and Amersham International, is this not another disgraceful appointment by the Government?

Mr. Walker: Rothschild's had its association with Waterloo, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's remarks will go the same way.

Coal Industry

12. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss the future development of the coal industry in Leicestershire.

Mr. David Hunt: I am aware of the National Coal Board's plans for the development of the coal industry in Leicestershire and expect to discuss them with the chairman of the board from time to time as they develop.

Mr. Spencer: Does my hon. Friend agree that the development of the industry in Leicestershire is an admirable model for other parts of the country, with its high investment, high wages and high productivity? Does he agree also that the coal industry as a whole would do better to concentrate on a rosy future rather than on looking over its shoulder at the outworn ideas and outworn pits of the past?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend put the agument well. There is an exciting future for the industry in the area, with the movement towards low-cost, high productivity pits. I understand from the National Coal Board that work on the sinking of the shaft at Asfrodby will begin next month. Productivity at such pits is expected to reach five times the national average. That is good news for everyone connected with this great industry.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that high productivity and excellence in the coal mining industry in Leicestershire has not prevented what will be the devastation of that industry by the closing of a considerable number of pits and by saving only a few jobs as a result of opening the mine at Asfordby? Will the Minister promise that the remaining pits in the Vale of Belvoir will soon be open so that the production to which he refers can save the industry, not only in Leicestershire, but in the midlands, where it is so badly needed?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. and learned Gentleman has his facts wrong. The numbers employed in the coal industry in that area will increase by the end of the century. I wish that the hon. and learned Gentleman would spend his time paying tribute to the miners in the south midlands area, who worked throughout the strike and showed their good sense and support for an industry that will produce competitively priced coal.

13. Mr. Woodall asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will discuss industrial relations in the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: My regular discussions with the chairman cover all major aspects of the coal industry.

Mr. Woodall: Is the Secretary of State aware that industrial relations in the mining industry are at zero level? Are they not worse than they have ever been since the pits were nationalised in 1947, and almost as bad as they were under private enterprise? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware of the position at South Elmsall Frickley colliery where workmen and retired workmen have held fishing rights on two ponds for more than 60 years? The ponds were acquired by the NCB in 1974 to provide water for washing and fire fighting. Does he realise that the NCB has told the miners that they can no longer fish those two ponds? That has caused a great deal of upset in the village.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Acton Hall colliery in Featherstone——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that this is related to industrial relations.

Mr. Woodall: It certainly is, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Secretary of State aware that Acton Hall colliery is the first to have its closure announced since the strike, that all men over 50 have been made redundant, that men under 50 have been asked to volunteer for redundancy and that 112 have volunteered with 17 being made redundant? The others will be transferred——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a speech.

Mr. Walker: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's considerable anxiety about the problems in his constituency. Obviously, I do not know about the fishing rights and therefore cannot comment on that. As the figures I have given show, over much of the country production is increasing and acceptance of change is taking place in a good way. I hope that everybody will encourage that. There is no doubt that if we continue with the sort of approach that stops development, investment and sensible production of coal, the industry will have a bad future rather than a good one. There is a duty on the leadership of the NUM to pay far more attention to encouraging productivity rather than encouraging dissatisfaction.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Lobbying

29. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received on the amount of parliamentary lobbying by outside interests and the number of hon. Members being retained by such outside interests; and if he will make a statement.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I have received a number of representations on this topic, and a report on parliamentary lobbying has also been made recently by the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Select Committee report to which he referred fudged the issue posed in my question? Is he not concerned about the rapid growth of what I call parliamentary political prostitution, because hon. Members — especially Conservative Members — are selling their services to outside interests for unknown sums of money? That is bringing Parliament into great disrepute. Will he given an undertaking that the report will be debated in the House at a very early date?

Mr. Biffen: I take at once the concern that the hon. Gentleman expresses, which I imagine is in the context of the fact that the current Register shows that 120 Members of Parliament are now parliamentary consultants — an increase of 50 per cent. on the Register for the previous year. However, I doubt whether the debate is elevated by partisan accusations. I shall, of course, consider his point about a debate.

Mr. Marlow: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are a small number of Opposition Members who move heaven and earth to ensure that large numbers of immigrants are allowed to stop in this country? Will he investigate whether they are doing that with the best parliamentary interests in mind, or whether other things are at the back of their minds?

Mr. Biffen: I think that that question goes somewhat wide of the original question. I do not think that I would encourage a detached assessment of the problem if I followed that line.

Secretarial and Research Allowances

30. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received from hon. and right hon. Members about the level of secretarial and research allowances; and if he will make a statement.

36. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Lord Privy Seal what recent representations he has received from hon. and right hon. Members about staffing facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have received a number of representations from right hon. and hon. Members about this matter, including several parliamentary questions.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Leader of the House aware that 202 Members of Parliament, from both sides of the House, have signed a motion showing general dissatisfaction with the present system? Most hon. Members underpay their staff if they employ more than one. Will the right hon. Gentleman receive an all-party deputation to discuss this matter further?

Mr. Biffen: Certainly.

Mr. Sedgemore: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his parsimony and puritanism in these matters are making this legislature the laughing stock of the Western world? Why does he side with the Executive in seeking to turn Members of this legislature into a squalid version of Ruritania?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has a good turn of phrase in personalising all these great matters. It is not my parsimony but a vote of the House, by 95 to 52, which set the present scales for the secretarial and research allowance.

Mr. Soames: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are those who consider the allowances to be perfectly adequate—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every point of view is expressed in the House.

Mr. Soames: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are those in this House who believe that to ask for more is a load of pretentious nonsense?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says, and I look forward to the possibility that, in her generosity, the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) will ask him to join her delegation.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. Friend consider that he should also give weight to the 450 right hon. and hon. Members who have not signed the motion to which the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) referred? Has he also considered that the excessive number of written questions now appearing on the Order Paper indicates an excessive number of research assistants already?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, but I must also have regard to the fact that the present level was determined by a vote of the House about 12 months ago. In any case, we have a provision for its review in due course.

Private Members' Bills

31. Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will refer to the Procedure Committee the question of time for Private Members' Bills.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that the Committee is considering how best to deal with these matters.

Mr. Beith: When a Bill has been strongly supported on Second Reading and extensively discussed in Committee, does the Leader of the House think it right that the House should be able, if it chooses, to extend its sitting hours to reach a decision on the matter? If he does not think that, will he accept the degree of restraint on the Government's legislative enthusiasm that would result if he stopped tabling motions asking hon. Members to sit after 10 o'clock to consider Government Bills?

Mr. Biffen: That is precisely the type of question that should be central to the considerations of the Procedure Committee.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The House passes a resolution saying what amount of time should be allocated to private Members. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, however strongly those of us who support a particular Bill feel about it, we feel even more strongly that those conventions passed by resolution should not easily be overturned?

Mr. Biffen: That is a reasonable general proposition, but when tested in certain singular circumstances, great passions are released and the task that has been given to the Procedure Committee will be formidable when it looks at the principles that are involved in the governing of private Members' time.

Register of Members' Interests

32. Mr. Winnick asked the Lord Privy Seal if he has received any proposals for changes in the Register of Members' Interests.

Mr. Biffen: The Select Committee on Members' Interests has recently reported to the House and recommended that various categories of non-Members having access to Parliament should be required to register details of their employment outside the House.

Mr. Winnick: While welcoming that recommendation, which I hope will soon be implemented, may I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that a further change that is undoubtedly required is for right hon. and hon. Members to state in the Register the source and amount of income received? Does he agree that without details of the amounts of money received, the Register is of limited importance?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is right to remind us of the limitations of the Register and, therefore, of the extent to which one should try to place significance on it. In calling for the degree of relevation contained in his supplementary question, I think he will find that he has touched on a very controversial issue indeed.

Mr. Harris: Will my right hon. Friend stick to his present line of refusing to recommend to the House the setting up of a register of political lobbyists, partly because to do so would be giving a bogus status to those lobbyists, but also because the House cannot enforce the present Register of Members' Interests, since the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) cocked a snook at the requirement to register his interests?

Mr. Biffen: I very much agree that whatever the House decides in this area should be related to enforceability. On reflection, I think that the evidence that I gave on this issue was well placed.

Mr. Faulds: Will the Leader of the House accept that I share the animadversions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) on the recent report on lobbying? Does he agree that it was an extraordinarily superficial exercise? Is it not time that we had a much more stringent and profound examination of the whole question of Members' interests and lobbying in the Palace?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has only recently commended the report. However, it has now been attacked by two hon. Members. That goes to demonstrate that there is no general judgment of view upon it. I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the significance——

Mr. Faulds: Has the right hon. Gentleman read it?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, I have. I trust that I am joined in that eccentricity by the hon. Gentleman.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Service Unions

40. Mr. Soley asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met the Civil Service unions; and what matters were discussed.

41. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he next plans to meet representatives of the Civil Service unions.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I last met the Civil Service unions on 14 June, with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when matters relating to the pay of the non-industrial Civil Service were discussed. Neither I nor my right hon. and noble Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster have any specific plans to meet the Civil Service unions now.

Mr. Soley: When the Minister next meets the Civil Service unions, will he undertake to discuss with them a further review of security procedures in the Civil Service? Is it not time that he accepted Lord Denning's original definition of subversion as an attempt to overthrow parliamentary democracy by unlawful means? If he does not think that that is an acceptable definition, will he tell the House what he thinks is wrong with it?

Mr. Hayhoe: If the Civil Service unions wish to discuss that issue with me, I am sure that they will be in touch with my office to arrange a suitable time.

Mr. Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is desirable that we should have an early settlement of current pay claims? Is he aware of the special problem that is faced by the Civil Service in some areas near London because of the vast number of civil servants who are resigning as a result of the wide difference between salaries in the public and private sectors?

Mr. Hayhoe: There are a number of people who are resigning from the Civil Service. There are particular difficulties in and around London for specific grades, but, generally speaking, there is no great problem. It is in areas of specialist experience and knowledge where there are sometimes particular problems. Special measures have been taken to deal with them and will be taken again if necessary.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister recall that when a strike of computer operators took place at Newcastle in 1984 it was over a sum of about £50,000? Is he aware that the Minister for Social Security has told me that the Government spent £145 million over that strike? When the right hon. Gentleman next meets the Civil Service unions, will he justify spending £145 million of taxpayers' money to save £45,000 to £50,000? Will he consider telling hon. Members how he can justify such an outrage?

Mr. Hayhoe: The figures that the hon. Gentleman has quoted show the great irresponsibility of the local Civil Service union leaders who were responsible for the strike, which I know was not supported nationally. It arose over an issue on which there was no need for a strike to have taken place.

Mr. Key: What further special measures will my right hon. Friend consider taking in special circumstances in the Civil Service, bearing in mind that in some areas, such as Boscombe Down and Porton Down in my constituency, there is great unrest in a loyal Civil Service about the threat of contractorisation.

Mr. Hayhoe: The special measures that I had in mind were along the lines that we followed earlier, of responding when there is an absolute need to increase pay. We have done that recently, for example, for inspectors of taxes. Measures like that can be taken. I believe that it is the majority view in the House that if there are areas within the public sector where work can be carried out more efficiently by the private sector, we should move in that direction with all due speed.

Mr. Winnick: As the Minister responsible for answering Civil Service questions in the House, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that of the immense admiration felt on the Labour Benches for the people at GCHQ who refused to give up their trade union membership, despite all the pressure from the Government? Does he realise that those are the very people who uphold our democratic claims? As they are not in Latin America or Eastern Europe, should they not be allowed to retain their union membership and their employment?

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Gentleman is trying to re-run matters which have been fully debated in the House. In any case, he knows that they are the primary responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Eggar: Is my right hon. Friend able to say how many people are now employed in the Civil Service? Is he satisfied that the unions are co-operating fully with the financial management initiative and other value-for-money initiatives?

Mr. Hayhoe: I commend the great co-operation that civil servants, from the low grades to the higher grades, are giving in trying to provide better value for money. The number of civil servants is now just below 600,000. It is the first time that the figure has been at that level since the end of the second world war. That is a remarkable achievement.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that the letter from the chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue dated 24 May 1985 to the Association of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Taxes is the subject of one of a long series of complaints brought by the Council of Civil Service Unions and the Trades Union Congress, under convention 151 of the International Labour Organisation, about the Government's behaviour as an employer, and is at present being considered by the ILO?

Is the Minister aware that he may have misled the House about the nature of the letter, during the last Civil Service Question Time, by quoting selectively from it?

Is the Minister further aware that the letter implies that the career prospects of Inland Revenue staff could be put at risk by taking industrial action, since the chairman's letter clearly states that that is one of a number of factors that will be relevant to decisions about promotion? Will he now agree that that is no way to conduct industrial relations within the Civil Service?

Mr. Hayhoe: Those matters were not discussed when I last met the Civil Service unions, nor, to my knowledge, are they seeking a meeting on them. Matters concerning the ILO are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

The hon. Lady spoke of misleading the House. As I placed the full text of the letter in the Library of the House immediately after quoting from it, I do not see how it can be suggested that I misled the House. I admit that, having quoted only a sentence or a phrase from the letter, by definition that was a selection, but I thought that it put the balance right in view of the hon. Lady's question at that time.

There was nothing new about general policy in the letter, because I had made the same policy report to the House at Question Time some weeks before, so the hon. Lady's main charge falls completely.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is it normal and decent for the Leicester DHSS to challenge all the Members of Parliament based within the city of Leicester to a debate on the social security Green Paper by writing to the Leicester Mercury rather than having the courtesy to write direct to Members of Parliament? Is the method of notifying the press rather than giving Members of Parliament a personal invitation——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's point is somewhat wide of the question.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is certainly not my responsibility, but I suspect that my hon. Friend will be doing all right in the Leicestershire press.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

European Community Legislation

33. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Lord Privy Seal how many statutory instruments, draft directives and other legislative instruments recommended for further debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation are still awaiting debate on the Floor of the House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: At present there are 42 such documents recommended for debate on the Floor of the House. Many of these will, however, become relevant only when active negotiations resume in Brussels.

Mr. Taylor: The Government are constantly and rightly saying that we can and should pay more attention to public expenditure. Does my right hon. Friend feel that the revelation on Friday that the EEC is this year spending £7,000 million on destroying, dumping or storing surplus foods requires us to spend a little more time in considering EEC matters generally? Does he believe that it will be possible to get through the backlog by the end of the Session?

Mr. Biffen: We have made steady progress with the consideration of that type of document—46 have been debated so far this Session. I do not think that wider issues about the common agricultural policy flow directly from this question.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would we not normally go back to Energy questions now?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that we go back to the previous group of questions.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Leader of the House agree that, to get rid of all of these draft directives, it would be a good idea for his right hon. and hon. Friends to join the Opposition tomorrow night in saying that we will not vote that £252 million, whereupon the rest of the directives would become irrelevant?

Mr. Biffen: That is an attractive thought, but I do not think that it is entirely accurate.

Secretaries and Research Assistants

34. Mr. Soley asked the Lord Privy Seal what proportion of total cost of Members' salaries and allowances is represented by remuneration of hon. Members' secretaries and research assistants.

Mr. Biffen: The proportion in the financial year 1984-85 was approximately 22 per cent.

Mr. Soley: Does the Leader of the House agree that that figure, and some of the others that he has given today, show that the time is ripe for a conciliatory move by him towards hon. Members by allowing a debate and a vote on parliamentary allowances and facilities in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I thought that, though monosyllabic, my response to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) was conciliatory.

Select Committee on Employment (Report)

3.32 pm

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order concerning the report of the Select Committee on Employment dated 19 June. In accordance with Standing Order No. 99, the Committee was appointed to examine the expenditure, administration and policy of the Department of Employment and associated public bodies. On 19 June, there were two Divisions in the Select Committee. The first was on an amendment proposed by a Conservative Member. As was said earlier at Question Time, that amendment was defeated by the Chairman's casting vote. The Committee then decided by five votes to three that that important report be submitted to the House, which it duly was.

I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker, concerning the proper treatment of Select Committee reports, irrespective of whether they are presented by a casting vote, by a majority, by a member of one party or by a member of another. I should have thought that such reports should be treated with respect by the House and by the Government. A report of such substance which makes important recommendations should be debated. At the very least, the Minister concerned should make a statement, or a proper reply should be given. Instead of that, the Government have made no statement, have had no debate and have given no reply. They have merely referred to the report during Question Time, and the references have often been utterly irrelevant to the question being asked.

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order?

Mr. Janner: My point of order is whether it is in order for the Government to refuse to provide the House with any facilities to discuss a Select Committee report and to refuse to answer questions on a matter which affects many hundreds of British citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House and the hon. and learned Gentleman know that, when a Committee has made its report, it is up to the House—certainly not the Chair—to decide what action to take. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will remember that Opposition Members were worried about the Secretary of State's reply to question 6, which referred to Scotland. There was also anxiety on both sides of the House that the Secretary of State referred to the Select Committee report in the most dismissive terms. Is it in order for a Secretary of State of one Department to rubbish a Select Committee report before that Committee has received a response from the Department to which it relates?

Mr. Speaker: I should be chary about echoing comments such as "rubbishing" a report. The hon. Gentleman knows that this matter is not for me. The Secretary of State, like every other hon. Member, must make his own justification for what he says.

Young Homeless People (Cleveland)

3.35 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), to Cleveland on Thursday last and the views that he expressed on the plight of the young homeless people in Cleveland county."

The matter is specific because it relates to the visit of a Minister to Cleveland and to the fact that he chose to close his eyes and stop his ears to the abundance of readily available evidence about the plight of young homeless people in the area. Then, without any recourse to housing department records, voluntary aid group registers or church council experience, he proceeded to give public utterance to statements running diametrically counter to the real situation.

The matter is important because of the numbers affected by the regulations. There are 650 in Stockton, 2,500 in Cleveland and more than 50,000 throughout the country. The matter is also important because the Minister's attitude would deny victims consistent medical or psychotherapeutic attention on which they may be dependent. The Minister's attitude disrupts the continuity and stability of any police or probationary provision to which those involved might have to conform. That attitude also increases dramatically the potential burden on social services departments of councils that are already strapped for cash by Government diktat and, consequently, threatened by rate capping.

The Minister's attitude makes it more likely that a legally separated parent will have to undergo longer periods of isolation from the child awarded in custody to the previous partner. To all intents and purposes, the Minister's attitude imposes practical disfranchisement on young electors who, having registered to vote in their home town, are being condemned to wander until, come election time, they return to vote on some form of Tebbitan bike; they would do better seeking a Tibetan camel.

The matter deserves urgent consideration because 80 people in Middlesbrough alone await the hearing of their appeal against the DHSS refusal of exemption status; the figure for Stockton is not available today. Such appeals could take as long as three or four months and in the meanwhile those people are without financial support. In short, they have been judged, sentenced and executed.

In Cleveland, with 2,500 such cases, we have more than five times the national average. In Stockton, with 650 cases, we have more than four times the national average. All this comes to a head on Friday when those young people are condemned to the roads. There have already been suicides.

We must have a debate, and we must have it today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Seurity, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), to Cleveland on Thursday last and the views that he expressed on the plight of the young homeless people in Cleveland county."

[Mr. Speaker]

I listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

BILL PRESENTED

Sale of Alcoholic Beverages from Garage Premises

Mr. Tony Speller, supported by Mr. Peter Bruinvels, presented a Bill to prohibit the issue of off-licences to retail outlets situated on garage forecourts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 170.]

Adjournment Debates

3.39 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday each week, the Leader of the House comes to the Dispatch Box to answer questions about the business for the following week. Each week a ballot is held for Adjournment debates, and I understand that one of the debates called in the following week is at your discretion.

As you may exercise your discretion, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether you would be willing to accept requests for Adjournment debates from the Floor of the House. For example, a group of hon. Members might wish to press for a particular debate and ask you, in exercising your discretion, to select a subject for debate in the name of one hon. Member.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be very unwise to accept that suggestion. I think that everybody who applies for a debate on every day, including Thursday, feels strongly about a subject. It is left to my discretion to choose which subject is debated on Thursdays.

Opposition Day

[16th Allotted Day]

Skill Needs (Government Policies)

3.40 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's failure to make proper provision for improving the extent and standard of modern skills training that is essential for Britain's economic recovery and industrial growth; deplores the Government's destruction of the nation's training system, including the abolition of industrial training boards, the closure of skillcentres and the catastrophic decline in apprenticeships, and its failure to provide quality training for the new technologies; believes that the present adult training strategy is inadequate; and demands a comprehensive statutory framework to deliver sufficient quality of training to produce the competent and committed work force Britain needs.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Sheerman: In moving the motion, I am aware that only recently we had a good debate upon the crisis which affects young people. I shall try to keep away from some of the points that I made in that debate, but training for skills in this country is a matter of such importance that you, Mr. Speaker, will perhaps permit me to go back over some of the same territory.

Training is vital for economic recovery and growth and for the future development of industry, commerce and public services. Training builds effectiveness, quality and commitment into that most crucial factor of production, our nation's work force. This proposition ought to be uncontentious. It is accepted by the Government and the Opposition, by key agencies such as the Manpower Services Commission and the National Economic Development Office and by the researchers and policy analysts at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the Institute of Manpower Studies and elsewhere; but the increasing turbulence of technology and of the markets and the role of the multinationals in exposing our work forces in different countries to direct competition one with another means that workers will have to train and retrain continually throughout their adult lives.

Training is not a sufficient condition for economic recovery and growth. It alone will not create effective and competitive industry, but it is a necessary condition without which it will be impossible to achieve recovery and growth. As that benchmark for all of us who are interested in training, "Competence and Competition", showed, this is so at the level of our international competitors. Japan, Germany, the United States of America and many other countries have vastly superior systems of education and training. This is linked to their relative economic success compared with ours. Our system produces a fraction of the qualified young people produced by those countries. This lays down attitudes and habits for a lifetime. Our adult participation rate in training is less than half that of our German competitors.

But now we have further evidence from our own country at the level of the company and its policy on training. These are remarkable figures. Against the notional target figure of 2 per cent. of turnover—I hope that the Minister will remember the figure — that companies ought to be spending on training and retraining, a yardstick that the director of the Manpower Services Commission regards as appropriate, the average private sector firm in this country spends just 0·15 per cent. This is the figure for larger firms which generally do more training. Instead of spending £26 billion, the private sector spends just £1·2 billion. Moreover, as between companies, nine out of 10 of the top performers carried out adult training involving nearly half of their employees, but only half of the low performing companies had done any training at all, and, in those that had, less than one in five of the work force was ever involved.

I do not want to give the impression that the education and training system of a country should be geared only to its economic needs and the requirements of industry, but so far as it serves those needs the training system of a nation is one of the essential supports of its economic and industrial system. Until recently there was something of a consensus on this question, built around the employment and training Acts of 1964 and 1973 and the terms of the new training initiative, the NTI. However, the Government have dismembered the system that was built on that consensus which, flawed as it was, none the less provided some of the essential support that training needed. Those supports have been kicked away like so many pit props. Sixteen of the 23 industrial training boards have been abolished. Instead of covering about half the work force, industrial training boards cover now only about one quarter. They were abolished in the name of voluntarism and 100 non-statutory training organisations have grown up to fill the void, but they have become known in the industry as industrial jokes in terms of training.

The apprenticeship system has been allowed to collapse. It used to be the envy of the world and provided a trained and skilled work force not just for this country but for many industries abroad. The apprenticeship system had 150,000 places in 1979, but the number had become about 100,000 in 1984. The number of entrants is down by three quarters. The recruitment level in engineering is down by about 15,000 from the 1970s level—from well over 20,000 to fewer than 8,000. That is a reflection not simply of what has happened in the industrial sectors, which have been ravaged by the recession and the Government's economic policies, but of the Government's deliberate policy, which has been to destroy, attack and undermine the apprenticeship system and to turn off the resources tap, as witnessed by the withdrawal of its Exchequer support.

Many of us will be conscious of the closure of our skillcentres, because 27 of the 87 are to be closed. There will be a loss of at least 3,000 training places, and 1,000 skilled instructors will be sacked for moved elsewhere. Those essential training resources for individuals and local industry have been taken from where they are most needed — the areas of high unemployment. That is, indeed, kicking away the pit props of training. In South Wales, where the mention of pit props is appropriate, there is a feeling of desperation about the level of unemployment, and an even deeper desperation at the knowledge of the pit closures that the Government are forcing on it.

Many local authorities in south Wales are doing their utmost to attract alternative industry to provide a future and hope for their men and women. I recently saw the Islwyn borough brochure. It is an attractive brochure designed to attract people into industry in that area. It describes the advantages of the area. The people and their quality are rightly given prominence. It gives pride of place to describing the skills that can be acquired at the local skillcentre. It says:

"Of particular advantage to incoming and existing industries is the Government skillcentre at Pontllanfraith, Blackwood, which currently has places for 160 persons on various industrial training courses."

That no longer exists because it is one of the skillcentres being closed.

Not even the much bally-hooed retraining of miners through the MSC and the skillcentre training agency will do any good, even though it is a perfectly placed skillcentre to make a contribution in that area. I do not wish to dwell too much on that but that is where the people from Brecon and Radnor would go to obtain their skill training. [Interruption.] Conservative Members laugh. They think that it is amusing, that an unemployed man or woman living in Brecon and Radnor will now have to make a round trip of 80 miles to the skillcentre in Newport. Removing a skillcentre that offers a retraining opportunity for people will mean——

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow) rose——

Mr. Sheerman: —that people are deprived in a vital part of south Wales, and that is a crime against unemployed people who want a future.

This decision will not do anything for the 2,600 unemployed people in Brecon and Radnor. It could do something for them if the Government had used imagination. The Government could have tried to retrain the 69 people in Brecon and Radnor who have been unemployed for five years, the 63 people who have been unemployed for more than four years, the 179 people who have been unemployed for more than two years and the 1,724 people who have been unemployed for more than a year. That skillcentre would have given those people hope and a future, but they will not have that chance.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): Does the hon. Gentleman understand that, by arguing the case in that way, he is arguing that we should train fewer people in south Wales, including Brecon and Radnor? Is that what the Opposition want?

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister knows precisely that that is not what I want. I now anticipate his next intervention.

People look at the destruction of our national training system and say, "We do not understand why the Government are doing this. Are they mad?" They are even more puzzled when I tell them that the Government are proud of what they are doing in adult training and when I explain that the Government have reassured us that it is not as we think it is. Let me give the Government's assurances. They say, "The national training system may have been destroyed, but this Government are training more people than before. In fact, they are training twice as many. There are even 50,000 training places on the community programme." That is one of the measures mentioned by the Minister. I go on to explain, "Not only that, but there is a series of programmes — PICKUP open tech, college employer links, local collaborative projects and REPLAN. On top of all this, the Government are mounting a national awareness campaign on the importance of adult training." For most people, their awareness of adult training has been heightened by nothing so much as the fact that their local skillcentre has been closed or is under threat. The prospect of local unemployed people obtaining high-quality training has plummeted.

The Government's claims are pure humbug. They are a tissue of deceit because, under their schemes, the unemployed will be given only a palliative. They will be given an illusion of training opportunities, short on duration, thin on content and bereft of qualifications at the end.

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Sheerman: Is it not ironic and astonishing that the criteria for all the schemes that the Government have introduced are that they should be half the price and half the cost of those that they abolish? We cannot have training on the cheap.

Despite all this, the Government are not mad. Their approach to training is linked inextricably to what passes for their economic and employment strategy. Its features are by now only too familiar. The strategy starts with an idolatory of the market. Its objectives are to be set by employers and its delivery is to be privatised as far as possible. Most crucially, training policies are going to reflect, entrench and police the Government's theory of the dual labour market. The primary labour market consists of those sunrise and other private sector employers that the Government have decided have a future. It is to those companies and their needs that the adult training strategy has been harnessed. However, the bulk of the labour market is to be a secondary labour market, characterised by low wages, low skills and low technology and punctuated by bouts of unemployment so that workers can never become too secure.

Once this key proposition has been grasped, everything else falls into place, despite obfuscation and sweet talking. The Government will not increase resources for adult training, despite the importance that they claim to attach to it. To focus resources on these priority areas, the Government have written off the training needs of the unemployed and of the regions.

However, on the way, the Government have completely abrogated the third objective of the new training initiative, which was their own policy in 1981, and which seemed at the time to be the high water mark of the previous consensus on training strategy. Its terms were to open up widespread opportunities for adults, whether employed, unemployed or returning to work, to acquire, increase or update their skills and knowledge during their working lives. Viewed now, what humbug, what deceit that seems. What was never revealed was the secret codicil to that objective, which reads something like this: "We do not really mean the unemployed at all. As to the rest, there will be opportunities for training only if your employer wants a particular sort of training."

It is hardly surprising that the results of the strategy are beginning to show through in serious skill shortages. Who would have believed, in a country with 4 million or more unemployed people, that we should be suffering from serious skill shortages? With 4 million unemployed, industry is experiencing constraints because of the lack of skilled manpower. That trend has been going on systematically since the middle of 1982. The skill shortages are not just in the high tech areas, although they are there too. They include machine tool-setter operators, mechanical, maintenance and repair occupations, electricians, carpenters, joiners and sewing machinists

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): And Cabinet Ministers.

Mr. Sheerman: Indeed.

What may seem extraordinary is the fact that industries that have been decimated by the recession are also experiencing bad skill shortages, including the textile industry. Representing Huddersfield, I know the industry very well. The reasons are there to see. The training infrastructure in textiles, as in many other industries, has collapsed. The industrial training board has gone, and the voluntary training organisations have not filled the gap. The skills of the workers made redundant have either ebbed away during their enforced period of non-use or been abandoned in favour of some other occupation if they are lucky enough to get one. The Government do not seem to recognise the importance of the mutually supportive structures of education, training and industry. Once they are gone, it takes a lot more to revive the infrastructure than hot air from Ministers and the employers' federations to which they listened when they abolished the industrial training boards.

Mr. Hayes: I can understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about skill shortages, about which he speaks with great passion. Does he accept that those shortages are not helped by the grossly irresponsible campaign of the young Socialists who are terrorising young people going on youth training schemes? The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I tell him that that is happening. It is happening in my constituency. If the hon. Gentleman does not condemn the actions of the young Socialists who are terrorising young people who are going on YTS, does he accept that he is condemning young people to further bouts of unemployment?

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman again if he continues making such stupid interventions.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that faults are always on more than one side, and that one of the reasons for skill shortages is the refusal of trade unions to allow enough apprentices to be recruited over the past 15 to 20 years?

Mr. Sheerman: That is nonsense. If the hon. Gentleman had had any acquaintance with or had talked to any of the trade unions, he would know that that is not so.

I should like to refer to the area where one would have expected the Government to do best—high technology. I see that Ministers on the Front Bench have been joined by a Minister with some knowledge of the subject, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Given the Government's preoccupations and their rhetoric, one would expect them to do best in new technology. It is true that there are initiatives at various levels. Regrettably, all carry the mark of the Government's doctrinaire approach, and so have failed signally to meet their full potential. In schools, the technical and vocational education initiative has been introduced in a way that has caused great divisiveness between pupils, between schools, and between the education service and the Manpower Services Commission.

The obvious and desirable option of proper curriculum reform to introduce a technical element for all pupils has been ignored. That no doubt partly reflects expenditure restraints and a preference for doing things despite the education service rather than with it. But there is also the question of a dual labour market. Why encourage widespread technical literacy when the majority of young people under this Government's policies have a low tech future?

The information technology centres—the I-techs—were an initiative from the Community that was taken up by the Government. The Opposition supported expansion. But instead of building on that initiative as a permanent Community-based resource that would give access to high tech to all sections of the Community, it has been made subject to the doctrinaire arrangements that dictate short-term contracts for staff and a requirement to make money which will poison the training relationship within those centres and act to the detriment of I-techs in areas of high unemployment.

One wonders where this philosophy will end. Given the Government's philosophy on the closure of skillcentres and the way in which they do not favour I-techs, It seems that if they apply the same logic to the other MSC programmes, even YTS and the community programmes will cease to be available in areas of highest unemployment.

What of technicians and high tech graduates? There have been two reports from the Butcher committee, and an extra £43 million has been pumped into higher education. This is an absolutely classic case of too little, too late. The Government have known for years that there will be needs in the high tech areas, but they spent their time closing down large chunks of the national training system, and they brought some of the most important resources for procucing high tech skills, such as Bradford and Salford universities, to their knees through expenditure cuts.

When they finally woke up, the developing needs for high tech manpower had become a skill shortage crisis, but Ministers still met, wrung their hands and dithered. Finally, they acted by providing less than half of what even the Engineering Council regards as necessary in the desperate situation that we face. There are the self-same private employers to which the Government insists they are paying attention.

Contrast that with the report of the Select Committee on Science and Technology in the other place. That has again provided some of the long-term thinking and undogmatic analysis that this Government so badly need. It rightly criticises the ad hoc approach to the organisation and funding of technological education and training and short-term attitudes to funding. It made 60 comprehensive and far-reaching recommendations which should make the Government feel ashamed of their failure to act decisively and effectively in that area.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: In a moment.

The Government's public relations hopes are always pinned on YTS. Many people had high hopes of YTS, including the MSC and the TUC. Despite what has been said, the TUC is a prime supporter of any hopeful training initiative. In addition, many thousands of trainers and educationists have put much effort, energy and dedication into trying to give young people a better qualified start in adult working life.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: Not for a moment.

The Opposition wish the second year of YTS well, most particularly for the sake of the hundreds of thousands of young people and their parents who will have no realistic alternative option in the next two or three years until there is a Labour Government. Although I expect the MSC, the TUC and others to produce a good outline scheme for the second year, I have grave fears that most of a two-year YTS will still be little better than the present one-year scheme — which for the most part is merely work experience rather than proper training.

There is a twofold reason for my fears. First, youth training makes sense only in the context of jobs at the end of training, yet the Government's dual labour market approach will consign the vast bulk of YTS graduates to low-tech, low-wage jobs or to unemployment.

A few days ago the Secretary of State for Employment challenged me when I said that only half the YTS graduates were getting jobs. He intervened in my speech and said that I was wrong and that I was misleading the House. He said that the figure was 60 per cent. or more. There was no doubt then who was right, and there is even less doubt now, because two days after his intervention the MSC reported that the figure was 48 per cent. If the Minister can read, he should read that report, which shows that 48 per cent. is the figure.

Mr. Tracey rose——

Mr. Sheerman: I shall give way only to the Minister if he wishes to say whether 60 per cent. or 48 per cent. is the right figure. He fails to rise. It is precisely because of the number and quality of jobs likely to be available to young people under this Government's policy that there is no real incentive for the Government properly to resource a high quality, two-year YTS.

That is a second part of the tragedy. A two-year YTS as a permanent feature of the education training system is an important and significant change. It ranks with some of the extensions of universal schooling in the 19th century, for it will lay the foundations for the British work force of the 21st century. It cannot, and must not, be done on the cheap, yet that is precisely what the Government have done and are proposing to do.

When YTS was announced three years ago, it was to be a £1 billion scheme. But when the two-year scheme is fully operational, it will cost barely £1 billion, even at 1984-85 prices. I challenge the Minister to dispute the fact that this would have been significantly less than £1 billion at the time when he made the £1 billion claim. I challenge him to come clean and to say just how much less it would be. He does not rise to answer that point.

The Minister is also selling short the adult training strategy, the adult unemployed and youth. His training strategy does not meet the needs of individuals, women, or black people; nor does it meet the needs of employers or the nation.

The education and training system is part of Labour's long-term social, economic and political objectives. We see it as serving personal and intellectual development and the building of democratic values in a nation rich in creativity, humanity and spirit which has the means to enable people to lead full and satisfying lives. We see it producing the skills and knowledge that are essential to the creation of wealth in working conditions which respect and value the people who create that wealth. We also see the education and training system working towards a better life and a better society. We want to equip people for a genuine economic and political democracy, to eliminate racial and sexual discrimination and to provide real opportunities for people from all walks of life—not only the privileged.

These objectives are closely related. The goals that education and training serve for individuals include the opportunity to contribute effectively to the economy. People's aspirations are bound up with the job that they want to do. Without work and economic security, those aspirations are illusory. It will be impossible to make the economy work for all the people, not just for the profit of a few, unless people have a real stake in a society in which they have work.

Education and training are the means to acquire competence and the skills necessary to contribute to an active and effective democracy both at the place of work and in the community. If workers are to exercise greater control over their lives, to have greater control in the industries of which they are part and to run, and participate in, the management of private and public enterprises, as we believe they should, competence at work is an essential first step. Far more people who can organise work effectively and participate actively in directing the change that our country requires need to be available.

Our training policies will be firmly located in our economic policies. We see training as being linked to the package of investment measures in the infrastructure, construction and industry, which a Labour Government will carry out. The key lesson from "Competence and Competition" and other studies of Britain's training problems is the need to develop a culture of training, and an environment in which training is perceived as natural, useful and desirable for workers who need to acquire many skills during working life. That means breaking the habit of using the school system to filter the academically bright.

To that end, we shall apply a series of co-ordinated measures to initial education and training. The first will be curriculum reform in secondary schools, leading to a common core curriculum, which will be relevant to all pupils and will motivate their participation, and which will include a technical element for all. Secondly, for the post-16-year-olds, the keynote will be a coherent and comprehensive approach. That will include coherence in financial provisions for those studying full time and those engaged in new training. It will include education maintenance allowances for children at 16. It will include coherence in terms of rights to education and training, which will embrace both those in study and on YTS, and those in employment. Coherence will also be extended to methods of learning and its certification and assessment, focusing on outcomes and based on a modular, integrated system to ease entry and re-entry, and the development of personal profiles of learning and achievement. [Interruption.] I am trying to spell out some of the vital elements of an education and training policy. It is a serious matter and I wish that Conservative Members would listen.

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not give way. I have taken up enough of the House's time and I shall not allow another intervention.

Although those measures will provide the framework for learning and the encouragement for future learning that the whole of the nation's work force needs, what will motivate the system and the young people who participate in it more than anything will be the knowledge that there are jobs at the end of it. For young people coming through the system, the culture of education and training will be part of their understanding of life and work—it will be natural to learn and to relearn, and in that learning will lie both better performance in work and growth in personal and intellectual development.

In the area of adult education and training our first act will be to restate what has been obvious to everyone, except the Government and some of the short-sighted employers to whom they have listened, since shortly after the war. If the Minister listens to nothing else, I hope that he will listen to this. Voluntarism is not the way to create a culture of training or to produce the quantity and quality of training that industry, commerce and public service need and demand.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Alan Clark): What about Germany?

Mr. Sheerman: Indeed, what about Germany?

There will have to be a comprehensive statutory framework to bolster and promote the changes in attitudes and values that are required, and to ensure that the short-sightedness of some British employers is not allowed to disable the whole nation. Part of that statutory framework will be the establishment of a comprehensive contributory fund so that there are sufficient resources available for training to be carried out, and sufficient purpose in encouraging the training that most needs to be done. Part of that framework will be the rights of individuals to ensure that they play their part in being alive to the training opportunities that exist, and that they are encouraged to take advantage of them in a positive way. There will also be a specific measure aimed at the level of a firm. A Labour Government will put an end to the futile finger-wagging exercise at industry of the Government in favour of specific measures to encourage a firm to identify its training needs and to meet them. That will include the establishment of training committees with trade union involvement, similar to the health and safety committees. The trade unions know that training is their business, and it is right that they should play a full part. The comprehensive contributory fund will be available to support and encourage the measures that the training committees identify as necessary.

We shall also use the education and training system as a pace setter. That is vital. Skills can lead to productivity and improved performance, particularly when there is an extremely high rate of change. In that, a Labour Government will build on the pioneering work carried out by Labour local authorities in recent years, despite Government hostility and financial constraints.

The education and training system will also be an important path for tackling the lack of equal opportunities for black people and women. It will be specifically geared to the needs of increased industrial democracy, the development of a significant co-operative sector in the economy, and the talents required for effective municipal enterprise. That is what we believe in. The responsibilities of wealth creation and of improving production and performance are far too important to be left to the owners and managers of British industry. It is up to all working people to take responsibility for production, and taking that responsibility will be the measure of their willingness to share in the control of how that wealth is produced and distributed. The education and training system has a key part to play in equipping them for that role.

In short, the education training system of a Labour Government will embrace the concerns of industry, commerce and public and private services. But the purpose of that embrace will be, not merely to serve the economy as it is presently run, but to change it.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Peter Morrison): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the Government's many major initiatives which are producing for the first time coherent industrial and training strategies for the country as a whole, within which employers, in co-operation with others concerned with providing training, can anticipate and meet emerging skill needs.'.

I have listened carefully to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), just as I listened to what he had to say two weeks ago, but I did not hear anything new. Nor did I hear anything constructive—although, to give him his due, he was more constructive about the youth training scheme this week than he was two weeks ago. Despite the hyberbole towards the end of his speech, I did not hear anything relevant to the problems and needs of today. He talked about training committees, and a comprehensive contributory fund. We know what that means — the heavy hand of bureaucracy. That is precisely what the Opposition want. I assume that the hon. Gentleman was unable to answer my hon. Friends the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) because he could not. The opening speech was just like last week's debate, but, for all that, I welcome the opportunity to debate training again.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the underlying theme of "Competence and Competition", and the comparisons that are drawn between ourselves and our American, Japanese and German counterparts, show it to be an important document. All hon. Members could learn many lessons from it. The hon. Gentleman may have seen or heard of a new document produced for the Manpower Services Commission by Industrial Facts and Forecasting Ltd. which is being published this week and is entitled, "Adult Training in Britain". Research was carried out into companies in relation to their training, their profitability, their confidence in terms of their expectation of an improved position, and their expansion in their work forces and output, whether or not they use high technology skills and introduce new products. The research showed that 24 per cent. of the firms qualified as high performers, 47 per cent. as medium performers, and 29 per cent. as low performers. However—the hon. Gentleman and I may agree on this—there was found to be a high correlation between the amount of training done by firms and their business performance. More than 90 per cent. of the high performers had undertaken adult training, involving nearly 50 per cent. of their employees. Therefore, our objectives remain the same.

Of course, modern skills training is essential for Britain's economic recovery. As we have all learned, bad training equals no jobs in the future, and the pace of change is such that a sound foundation is bound to be needed on which to build further periods of training and retraining during an employee's working life. However — this is where the hon. Gentleman and I disagree completely—unless that training is relevant to the needs of today and tomorrow rather than yesterday, the time and resources spent on it will be wasted; worse, the time and resources spent on outdated training perpetuate manufacturing processes that are not only out of date but uncompetitive in world markets, so leading to lower employment prospects. That outdated training is training for bankruptcy and redundancy, not for profitability and job security.

That is why the Government have always maintained that employers are and will remain the main training providers. However, the Government can — I believe that they do—play an important role as a catalyst and as a pump-primer. Employers will remain the main providers, because they can spot the market demands first. They can then identify the skill needs and, with the Government and the providers of training, they must be in a position to plug the training gap quickly. The chasm —I believe that it was a chasm—that existed between industry and commerce and public providers of training was so wide that it was well nigh impossible to plug it quickly.

I hope that the House agrees that matters have improved, but there is still a considerable distance to go. It is a slow process made slower by vested and conservative interests, which obstruct every attempt to bring the system into the latter part of the 20th century.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Is my hon. Friend happy with the extent to which the MSC has consulted businesses in each community, especially in those areas where skillcentres will be closed, to establish precisely their preparedness to provide those training places and the basis on which such training will be provided? I agree with my hon. Friend about placing the emphasis on employers, but is he happy that there is an impetus to fill the gap that will be left by the closure of some skillcentres?

Mr. Morrison: Yes, I am happy. I discussed that point with the chairman of the MSC and with my hon. Friend at some length. The MSC has an important role to play in this regard. Indeed, it fulfils that role extremely well because it brings the provider and the employer much closer together. However, the process is like building a bridge. It takes time to ensure that the foundations are properly installed, but by and large I am happy with the building process.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): The Minister said that it is difficult to fill skill shortages quickly by training. Is he aware that many skill shortages arise not because of a lack of training, but because skilled personnel who have been made redundant are reluctant to take up their skills again? The problem is often to attract skilled workers back to their trades.

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that technology moves on apace. With regard to the personnel to whom he is referring, in many cases a period of updating training is necessary to bring them into the technology of the next decade and the decade after. I was referring to the chasm between the training provider, especially in the public sector, and the employer, which makes it more difficult for the people about whom he and I are worried to obtain that retraining.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has introduced many reforms with regard to training providers in the public sector. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry —if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, later in the debate — will highlight what he has done. Among the initiatives that we have taken with the sole objective of bringing the two parts closer together is the technical and vocational education initiative, which we discussed in the House two weeks ago. The hon. Member for Huddersfield belittled it by saying that it was a small pilot scheme without any will behind it. He is wrong. Already, 62 local education authorities are participating in the initiative. The total cost of the programme is about £20 million. In Clwyd local education authority, the initiative is so successful that it has gone, voluntarily, countywide. Yet, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the initiative was resisted initially by many educationalists and by some Labour-controlled — tending to be Left-wing Labour-controlled — local education authorities, which have refused to participate in it. Why do they do that? Why do they deprive their 14 and 15-year-olds of the opportunity of this break?

Mr. Sheerman: The answer to the Minister's question is that the Labour-controlled authorities wish to know when that opportunity and those resources, in terms of capital equipment and teaching, will be available to all children in that age group, rather than only to the favoured few for a trial period.

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman is arguing that Sheffield and Liverpool authorities are saying, "Here is taxpayers' money available for a group of 14 and 15-year-olds, but we shall deprive you of it because it is not available for all." They say that despite the fact that many will not want it and it is appropriate only for some. Their attitude is quite remarkable.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the information technology centres, 164 of which are already in operation and about 175 of which will come on stream in the autumn. He did not say that that was a bold initiative which, in many cases, has helped children with less academic records. He did not say that more than 60 per cent. of youngsters who go through the information technology centres go straight into jobs. He did not give the Government the credit for a significant and major initiative.

Mr. Tracey: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Morrison: I should continue, because the hon. Member for Huddersfield delayed the House for some time and I know that many hon. Members wish to speak.

The hon. Gentleman did not refer to the initiative begun by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment with regard to the non-advanced education budget. As he will be aware, in 1985-86, the MSC will spend about £65 million and in 1986-87, it will spend about £110 million. That, coupled with the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science — the college-employer links project — will ensure that the training and education in those institutions is much more closely geared to the labour market.

I was not surprised by the fact that the hon. Gentleman did not mention that, last week, the Audit Commission published a report on further education. I suspect that he did not mention it because it talks about value for money and makes the point that colleges should, within the present budget, take about 75,000 more students. The report states that there was much waste in that area. The reason he did not refer to it is simple: those who objected to its publication last week were supporters of the Labour party. The Opposition did not appear to notice that there was a need to change what happened in schools and colleges. Nor have they any desire to do something about it, even when the need for change is pointed out.

As the hon. Gentleman reminded us, two weeks ago we debated at length the youth training scheme. He was a little more fulsome about it today. He knows that I asked the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) to substantiate remarks that he made about the YTS about three months ago. He said that it was a load of rubbish. I wrote to him once before the debate, and I have written to him since then, but the hon. Gentleman is still unable to produce evidence about any scheme to show that it is rubbish. We still have not received an answer from him. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Huddersfield, who is not today flanked by his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, was a little more fulsome in his praise.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield talked about apprenticeships. I wonder how recently Opposition Members have visited a factory. I accept that the number of traditional apprenticeships has dropped substantially, but surely Opposition Members must accept that because of high technology the number of men and women on the line is substantially fewer. The requirement for apprenticeships in the traditional sense must therefore have dropped. The Opposition remain determined to perpetuate the old apprenticeship system which, for all its usefulness in the past, is no longer necessary to the same degree.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): We are challenged to say whether we have been round any factories recently. In the west midlands there are many factories which we visit regularly. To what line is the Minister referring on which he sees fewer people, which makes him believe that there is a need for fewer apprenticeships? Is he talking about the toolrooms or engineering support systems, which are as much in need as ever of apprenticeships?

Mr. Morrison: I am amazed that the hon. Member for Coventry North-West (Mr. Robinson) should say that. I am flabbergasted. Has the hon. Gentleman not been round the car plants in the west midlands? Has he not been round the manufacturing plants there? Does he suggest that with modern technology and machinery the same number of people are required to produce the same, or even six times, the amount? The hon. Gentleman must be blind and deaf if he does not realise that today's needs are different.

Mr. Robinson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morrison: I am sorry, but I must get on. The hon. Member will have a chance to reply. I am amazed that he should try to make the same point again.

Apparently, the Opposition want to perpetuate age restrictions, time serving and a system with no agreed standards. If they do, I do not. It would be fair to say that I want to dismantle the apprenticeship system as it is. I want to dismantle that system because I want opportunities for people to join at any age. I want people to be able to achieve certain standards regardless of time served. That is better for the trainees, whatever their age, and it is certainly better for industry and commerce. I want a flexible and relevant system. Both those words are overused, but they are right in this context.

Between 1980 and 1983, the number of apprentices dropped by about 50,000. At the same time, entrants into full-time, non-advanced education rose by about the same number. That reflects a move from craft to technician-based employment in traditional industries. That is the route that we should take.

Apprenticeships led to the belief that training once in a lifetime was sufficient. That is no longer so, as all hon. Members will agree. In the United States, it is said that a period of retraining three or four times in a working life is necessary. That is why we have completely reshaped the adult training strategy.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield mocked the estimate that 250,000 people per annum are to be trained. That is double the number trained originally and it reflects, I regret to say, a genuine need because of the lack of concentration on training during the 1960s and 1970s. That is one of the reasons why unemployment has risen, as the hon. Gentleman will agree.

Doubling the number of people trained is not of itself enough. For too long, we have assumed that training for is own sake is good, whereas training leading to a job is really good. Training for its own sake is no good at all, because that raises hopes which are then dashed. Training is an investment with a return. Training leads to profit. That is the message which I and my right hon. Friends wish to put across to industry—we are already doing that.

I hope that the Opposition, like their trade union colleagues, will help to put across that message, because the adult training campaign which the hon. Member for Huddersfield mocked was launched with the help of all the parties involved. It will take time to change attitudes, but they must be changed. In the four years in which I have been associated with training, attitudes have changed substantially. However, we have not run the whole course. We have still a significant way to go. The Government have a role to play in stimulating and encouraging, and in providing incentives. Through the adult training programme that is precisely what we are doing.

I am talking of the job training scheme—formerly TOPS — occupational training, training for enterprise, access to information technology, local training grants, local consultancy grants, training for special groups and the wider opportunities training programmes. The Government are making a considerable effort in all those directions.

In addition, we have the open tech, which was launched in 1982, as part of our new training initiative. We lead the field in developing open learning methods. I expect that open learning will become more and more the way of training. That is the way ahead. The system takes training to the trainee. That is simpler than a person having to go to a training establishment. This year distance learning, thanks to the open tech, will benefit about 25,000 people and next year about 50,000 people.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): The Opposition have been significantly silent on the open tech initiative. Will my hon. Friend suggest that they go to the Upper Waiting Hall tomorrow when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will open an open tech exhibition? The open tech demonstrates the Government's priority in connection with retraining. It will produce the training when and where it is required and make the maximum use of the many under-used training resources.

Mr. Morrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House that the exhibition will be opened tomorrow. All hon. Members will find it interesting.

We have heard the rhetoric about skillcentres time and time again and we heard it again today. The hon. Member for Huddersfield missed the point about skillcentres. Does he want to perpetuate a system that would result in £50 million a year being spent on courses to which no trainee would go, and on bricks and mortar? That was his argument. The hon. Gentleman believes that any organisation must remain rigid. Because of rationalisation in another 18 months we shall have released £50 million — that is extra training for tens of thousands more people. It is as simple as that.

The hon. Gentleman made a party political point about the by-election in Brecon and Radnor. Therefore, we must assume that the Labour party does not like the idea of mobile instructors going into rural areas — whether in Wales or in any other part of the country. As a result of what we are doing with the skillcentre training agency, training will be brought to those who need it in Brecon and Radnor.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister knows that cutting highly resourced centres that provide skills training over a period of time cannot be matched by short-term training, whether the capital resources are carried on the back of a bike or in the back of a van. We cannot take computer technology around the country on the back of a bike; we cannot take highly computerised engineering resources around the country on the back of a bike. We must put our money into training. All the schemes that the Minister has mentioned are training on the cheap, and he knows it.

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman has lost the argument, so there is no point in jumping into rhetoric. He cannot argue with the figures. He seems unable to understand that more people will receive training, and it will be more relevant to obtaining jobs.

On industrial training boards, the hon. Gentleman again used the arguments and rhetoric of the early 1980s. Does he not understand that the 17 industrial training boards that the Government abolished had lost the support of employers because they had become a dead hand? They were a bureaucratic control, and the net result was that training became a dirty word. I am happy to say that that is no longer the case.

I have outlined some — but not all because time precludes me from doing so — of the enormous training programmes launched during the past five years. Our programmes start in the schools and carry on through working life. They include the open tech and the technical and vocational education initiative, which, among others, are modern and looking forward. The YTS provides a sound foundation. The adult training strategy focuses on the need for continuous updating of training. Hundreds of thousands more people are benefiting, including the unemployed——

Mr. Sheerman: No.

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman may say, "No," but they are. During the period 1979-80 to now, resources have increased from £458 million to £1,234 million; 353,000 people were being trained five years ago as compared with 643,000 now. That is a substantial increase.

I look forward to seeing whether the hon. Gentleman really does have the support of his colleagues tonight. Only seven Back-Bench Labour Members were present during his speech, yet I gather that this is an Opposition day. We shall see whether he is backed in the Lobby or whether the Government's record on modernisation and constructive reform will not be opposed.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I regret to say that the Minister's speech did not measure up to the seriousness of the situation. It was an extremely complacent exposition of the Government's case in an area in which this country does not do well. I am sure that there is common consent across the parties that Britain has not done well in it for a long time.

The Government are charged with damaging and hindering the position for ideological reasons. [Interruption.] I hope that the Minister is not too complacent to listen to what others have to say. He will no doubt have seen the Labour Market Quarterly Report, published by the Manpower Services Commission, which said:

> "The picture that emerges is that shortages are spread across all levels from skilled manual to professional, but are more serious at higher levels."

It also says that the problem has been getting worse and is expected to deteriorate during the next year. That is the MSC telling us that, under the regime of the Conservative party, the position will get worse. What is the Government's explanation for that? The Minister, in his avuncular manner, nods his head, smiles and chats to his colleagues. He does not seem very interested.

The report also said that a wide range of occupations were identified — 173 in total. Therefore, there are skill shortages in 173 occupations. We do not need a blunderbuss to make us address ourselves to that point. The report cites sewing machinists, electrical and electronic engineers, computer programmers, machine tool setters, scientists, engineers and technicians.

I do not want to quote at length from the report; I hope that the Minister has read it. However, it states:

"The information indicates a general decline in training rates over the decade of about 3 percentage points."

Not only is the position bad and getting worse, but projected for the next 10 years it will deteriorate while other countries—our competitors—race ahead. I ask the House whether the Minister's speech measured up to the seriousness of that.

The problem that we face—perhaps based on our culture—is not new. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and others of my colleagues who served in the Department of Employment know that. The problem was identified in the 1960s, when it was realised that voluntarism was not the full answer because it did not work. It was necessary to have the carrot and the stick. Private firms had to be encouraged and guided, so Parliament established industrial training boards. They have now been abolished. In fact, the Minister—I almost said the vandal—was instrumental in that. He did not know much about industrial training boards in those days——

Mr. Peter Morrison: I do now.

Mr. Leighton: I do not hold against the Minister the fact that he did not know much about them in those days. Indeed, I served in Standing Committee with him when we discussed these matters. The Government gave him instructions to abolish the training boards. So what do we have now? The simple truth is that we go back to the 1960s, when we learned that there were not enough volunteers in British industry.

The most recent survey of British firms found that, what confronted with skill shortages and asked what they would do about them, they said, "We propose to recruit, not train." In other words, they proposed to poach people who had been trained by others. I ask the Minister—before he is moved from his present position—to think of how we can improve matters. Perhaps he could think of some tax reliefs for firms hoping to spend money on training. The taxpayer could match their investment pound for pound. Perhaps the Minister will make a note of that for the future. I ask him to think of ways to encourage private firms to train.

The skillcentre training agency was an integral part of the training division of the MSC; it was not shown separately in its accounts. It was cut adrift and told—I suppose on monetarist and ideological grounds—to sell its products in the market place and became self-financing in three years. That was unrealistic. After all, the training division had been its sole customer.

The training division found that it could get cheaper places elsewhere, primarily in colleges of further education. The labour costs in the skillcentres were half those of colleges of further education. We hear a lot about people pricing themselves into jobs. Those who taught in skillcentres charged only half what was charged by lecturers in colleges of further education. Despite that, they were given the sack. That seems a strange way of getting people to price themselves into jobs.

Although the labour cost of lecturers at skillcentres was about 50 per cent. of the cost of their counterparts in colleges of further education, when the service was delivered to the public it was 50 per cent. dearer. The reason for that lay in the accounting system, in that it did not compare like with like. The places at colleges of further education were priced on the basis of marginal costs, although their overheads were paid for by local education authorities. The skillcentre places were, by comparison, unrealistically priced because of their heavy overheads.

The MSC stated that, without the closures, there would be a loss of £52 million by 1987-88. When the Select Committee had the matter investigated by a specialist adviser, we found that that was not the true figure and that the cost would have been £12 million.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): The hon. Gentleman should also consider the effectiveness of skillcentres. The skillcentre for Lincoln, for example, was in another county many miles away, at Long Eaton. As a result, few people from Lincoln who wanted training could get there. Now that that has been closed, the number of training places where we need them, in Lincoln, is being doubled. More people will therefore take up those training places, which will become more cost-effective.

Mr. Leighton: I am happy to think that that will be the situation in Lincoln. I want more training places throughout the country. If we want to expand training, why sack hundreds of skilled trainers and put them on the dole? I want an expansion of the system in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and elsewhere, and in that process I do not want any centres to be closed. If it is said that skillcentres are offering the wrong products at the wrong prices in the wrong areas, let us have them supplying the right products in the right places. We want a general expansion of training.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): One of the most important skills required in the offshore construction industry is welding. The skillcentre in Govan, and at the James Watt college in my constituency, provide marvellous instruction in that and other skills. I speak from experience. My hon. Friend is right to say that the centres have an important role to play.

Mr. Leighton: Given the heavy overheads of skillcentres, they are likely always to be at a cost disadvantage compared with colleges of further education, which have their core costs met by others. If only market forces are to rule, with the sort of book-keeping that is undertaken in this sphere, few skillcentres will survive.

A heavy responsibility rests on the training division as the main customer of the skillcentre training agency. Does the Minister agree that the MSC and the Government have said that they regard the retention of the new network of skillcentres as being in the national interest, that it is the minimum necessary and that the present network will be retained for the future?

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reminding the House of what the chairman of the MSC said in the Select Committee, the point that the hon. Gentleman has reiterated. The training division's total obligation is to ensure the right training of the right quality at the right cost to maximise the number of people who can be trained in jobs or skills in which they are most likely to get employment. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is the right approach?

Mr. Leighton: Yes, but I remind the Minister that we were told by the Secretary of State that a national network of skillcentres was essential as a pace setter or benchmark of quality. He gave a number of criteria to show that it was essential to have such a network and we were told that the reduced network was the minimum necessary.

[Mr. Leighton]

That being so, a great responsibility rests on the training division to understand the needs of the skillcentre training agency. The cost of shutting down a third of the skillcentre network is £12 million. In other words, the Government are paying that to shut them down. I do not know whether that is generally appreciated.

The Minister may not like my saying that, in relation to the YTS, many people believe that the motives of the Government are suspect. They fear that the Government are using it as a device to get people off the register, to keep people off the streets and out of trouble and to promote cheap labour. Many people regard the YTS as a cosmetic.

I hope that when the Government consider the second year of YTS they will take careful note of what youngsters are saying. It is no good the Government saying, "We know better than you." It is a voluntary scheme—that is the way we work in Britain—and it is not good enough for the Government to claim, "We have a parliamentary majority, so what we say goes."

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, in the considerable time that he and I have been members of the Select Committee, we have had witnesses before us from the TUC and a wide range of bodies and that—with the exception of one, who totally failed to produce the evidence that he claimed would show that people thought that the schemes were no good—the evidence that we have consistently received has shown that the suspicion with which the YTS may have been regarded is diminishing rather than increasing?

Mr. Leighton: There is a lot of good will for the idea of a proper high-quality youth training scheme. The Labour party has been advocating a two-year youth training scheme and the Trades Union Congress supports a two-year scheme. The TUC is a part of the Manpower Services Commission and is giving great support to a two-year YTS, so I concur with what the hon. Gentleman has said. Despite all that, many people doubt the Government's motives. Therefore, the Government have a responsibility to remove that doubt. Nobody knows what the two-year scheme will offer young people. I do not know whether the Minister of State is listening to me or to his colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has great knowledge of skillcentres. I hope that the Minister will listen to the debate. We do not want more of the same or twice what we have now.

The credibility of the YTS will depend on whether there is a job at the end of it. We are told—perhaps the Minister of State will confirm this—that the most recent figures show that the number of trainees who get a job at the end of the scheme is diminishing. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said that half, or less than half, of those on the scheme obtained a job. We now understand that less than half of those on a scheme get a job at the end of it.

The youth training scheme must be of high quality and the second year must be an upgrading year that builds upon that achieved in the first year. There is very little evidence that it will be a better scheme. No one knows what it will be. There is really no such thing as the youth training scheme. There are a number of different schemes that are voluntary. We must listen to the CBI and the employers. The cash made available by the Government for the scheme is roughly £1 billion, the amount that they originally set for one year. Now they want two years of YTS at £1 billion. Is it possible to have a high-quality two-year scheme for £1 billion? I do not think it can be done, and the employers I have met do not believe that it is possible.

On the day that the White Paper was published, the CBI told the Select Committee that it was anxious about it. The Ford Motor Company said that it was not prepared to put in any more money, and it had one of the better schemes.

Many trainees do not stay in the YTS for the full year, so will they stay for two years? What will they do for two years? No one has given any sign of what they are to do for the second year. If the Minister of State can give any clear guidance I shall be pleased to hear it.

Those who suspect the Government's motives see the YTS as a cheap-labour scheme. If the allowance was still indexed to inflation, in the first year it would be £34, but it is now only £26·25. If the Government want to protect themselves from the charge that the YTS is a cheap-labour scheme, especially in the second year, they will have to increase the amount of the allowance. I hope that they will understand that that comment is made by someone who wants a decent credible youth training scheme and does not believe that the YTS should be abolished.

5.4 pm

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): I do not agree with most of the rhetoric from the Opposition Benches but I think that the Opposition have chosen an appropriate subject at an appropriate time as we are about to embark on the public expenditure review for 1986-87. Much of what has been said has been an attempt to persuade the Government to alter their priorities on spending and, therefore, education, training and updating skills are extremely relevant issues. Those of us now sitting on the Government Benches recognise that as a major challenge to the Government to ensure that as the new jobs appear the appropriate skill training is available for those who are seeking new jobs.

I welcome the part played by the Open university in providing fresh opportunities, especially for the adult unemployed, for learning new skills. I welcome also the support that the MSC is giving to adult training courses. In my view, there will be widespread support for the recent creation of a new standing committee on continuing education. By bringing in the Open university and other further and higher education institutions, that committee will be able to provide new practical schemes which will enable people to acquire new skills. This new body will be able to learn much from the welcome growth in many part-time courses in polytechnics that we have seen in the past two to three years.

There are two points that I want to make about the role of schools in the teaching of new skills. There has been enormous and welcome popularity and support for the Government's introduction of TVEI because of its enrichment of the curriculum and because of what it is doing to help young people to get jobs. However, the equipment used is expensive to acquire and is expensive to maintain. It is much-used equipment. I hope that proper account has been taken of the need to maintain the equipment in the budgeting, financing and planning of TVEI. It will be useless unless it is properly maintained. It should be recognised also that the cost of maintaining it is increasing all the time.

The second year of the YTS is very much unknown territory. Given the growth of further education and the improvement generally in higher and further education, young people may want to use the second year of YTS to return to full-time further education. There is a problem for the Government, as it is not clear what system of student financial support will be available for a young person if he leaves YTS in the second year to go into non-advanced further education or another form of further education and his local education authority is not obliged to supply a mandatory award. There is thus a gap in our student financial support provision. We shall soon have the Green Paper on student finance and grants and in my view it will have to take up that issue, especially as we are moving into the two-year YTS.

The way in which the Government fund research has a direct relevance to skill training. We are rightly concerned to see much more innovation from small firms whereby we encourage the talented to exploit their ideas through the growth of small firms. One of the reasons why the United States has seen such a surge in its economy through the growth of small firms is that a proportion of federal Government research funding always goes to small firms and small businesses. That is something that we should copy quickly.

I welcome the recent Government announcement that an additional £4 million is being provided for nine key university research groups to support research of international standing and industrial promise. However, it is public expenditure review time and I want to highlight two of the statements made by the recent report of the Advisory Board on Research Councils to the Government on science and public expenditure in the next two years. The board made two statements which cause me to worry. First, it said:

"large new facilities with the Science and Engineering Research Council cannot be exploited fully because the Council cannot afford the necessary instrumentation."

Secondly, it pointed out that the "Natural Environment Research Council does not have the resources to fund full UK participation in the Ocean Drilling Programme, of fundamental importance to advances in knowledge of plate tectonics and mineralisation".

The Government have time to make alterations. The report has to be considered by the Government and action can be taken in the autumn, when the public expenditure for 1986-87 has been agreed. The matters referred to by the advisory board need urgent attention because of their relevance to our efforts to improve skill training and increase employment. I am sure that the Government, in their spending review in the autumn, will want to take additional practical steps to accelerate economic activity, and above all to improve our research base, thereby helping to reduce unemployment.

Our aims with regard to learning new skills and updating skills will not be properly achieved unless there is peace and stability in the classroom. It does not exist at present, with deadlock in the teachers' pay dispute and classroom disruption happening in various parts of the country. I praise the Government for what they have achieved in obtaining greater co-operation between education and industry. As that co-operation increases, the teacher trade unions should look to industry for management advice and expertise in helping to create a new salary structure which will properly reward effective and dedicated teaching.

The debate has been about skills and employment. It is time to show some industrial relations skill in the education service, so that the dispute may be brought to an end quickly, and a phased salary offer, coupled with a new salary structure, can allow the education service to prepare young people for working life and enable them to take advantage of the rapidly growing new industries with new job opportunities.

5.12 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I welcome an opportune debate and congratulate the Opposition on raising it.

The issue of skills in Britain has a far wider effect on the nation that has been indicated in the speeches so far. I am by training an engineer and therefore aware that, even during the boom periods of the nation in the 1950s and 1960s, what Britain made was not a reflection of what we were capable of making but rather a reflection of the skills that were available to industry. In addition, many of the ways in which things were made were also a reflection of the skills available to industry.

It is interesting to consider who was to blame. I do not believe that the unions helped, with their restrictive practices, although I admit that I agreed with and enjoyed much of what the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said as a representative of one of the print unions. There was a degree of irony in his speech, because the print unions have probably done more than any other unions to oppose innovation, new technology and new working methods. They are the classic example of much of what is wrong with Britain and of the mire in which we find ourselves.

Mr. Leighton: I often hear that said, but is the hon. Gentleman aware that last year the printing unions and the British Federation of Master Printers reached a comprehensive agreement on training, and that there is complete harmony in the industry on training matters? Indeed, it is one of the few good examples in British industry of agreement on training between employers and trade unions.

Mr. Penhaligon: It is true that there is some willingness to allow training so that people can work the antiquated machinery that dominates much of the printing industry. What is required is training for the new technologies and an open-armed, welcoming approach to allowing it to be incorporated into our production system. I say that in the belief that one of the great duties of this House is to improve the living standards of people who work with machines.

It would be foolish to think that the blame lies only with the unions. When we consider our great industrial background and our role in the industrial revolution which transformed the world, it is extraordinary that we seem to live in an anti-technology nation. In the local sixth forms and colleges, where the brightest young people in a town or city are to be found, how many of them want to make something or grow something? Very few of them want to do that. That is not so in Switzerland, West Germany and France, where a reasonable percentage of the best and most able young people see their future in making or growing things, and look forward to such careers with enthusiasm and dedication.

To the extent that skill acquisition is now a political issue in Britain, I welcome the change of mind, because it is high time that we set to work to change attitudes. Much of our wealth-producing sector was based on low and medium technologies. We produced items that others could make, and that others made with a little higher productivity and slightly lower wages. In that way they undermined much of our economy. We have lost enormous swathes of our markets in the past few years. We lost them more rapidly than was necessary because of much of the Government's economic policy, but it could well be argued that we would have lost many of those markets in any event.

In debates such as this we tend to talk about training and jobs as though they were totally different entities. Although they are not the same, the two are closely connected. Suppose that by some miracle every person in Britain tomorrow could have a job. The current levels of skill and tuition would be inadequate to enable that position to be maintained for very long. Training is not an alternative to unemployment; it is a part of employment, and the nation's prosperity depends on it. We must begin to regard training in that light.

The youth training scheme has considerable potential. It is often referred to as a uniquely British idea, but it has been copied from other countries. It is none the worse for that, and I welcome the fact that we are now learning from the experience of other countries. I am, however, a little concerned about the content of the training schemes. In many communities training is often depicted as something that young people should do if they have failed to get a job. It is regarded almost as a sort of punishment. That is not how we want to see the YPS develop. It must be seen and believed by communities to be a sensible alternative to immediate employment, enabling young people eventually to enter the employment market at higher levels of skill, for which they will receive higher levels of reward.

To some extent I agree with the Government that the people who are most likely to know where training is most required are employers. After 10 years in this House, I have a shade more faith in the employers' choice than in that of any Secretary of State.

Employers are not forced to put anything like the resources into training that are manifestly required. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said that employers should be spending £26 billion a year on training—that sounds like a figure plucked from the air and a shade higher than my guess. But to put it bluntly, employers are not spending enough and I believe that we should use legislation to force employers to pay their fair share and to make an active contribution towards training. If it could be demonstrated that the voluntary sector is producing the goods, well and good. But I see little that makes me believe that, when training is voluntary, the employer provides anything like the quantity that is required.

Skillcentres are not tablets of stone, nor is there any reason why skillcentres should be used indefinitely as part of the training scene. However, they work. If one goes to any constituency and talks to people about their lives, jobs and living standards, they point to the local training centre as a great turning point in their lives. Such centres enable them to obtain substantial skills which they are able to put to good use for themselves and their employers. This is precisely what is required—skills that are good for the individual and employers.

Some of the changes that the Government have made do not make sense to me. The situation in south Wales, not surprisingly, has been mentioned today, but there are other areas where there are problems of similar magnitude. My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has said that many of his constituents have to travel 25 miles to the present training centre, at Killingworth, but it is to be closed, so the nearest will be 55 miles away. Even the most optimistic rural traveller, used to travelling further than urban dwellers, knows that 50 miles there and back puts an end to training on a day-to-day basis. That is the scrapping of the skillcentre and a local resource.

I do not say that every skillcentre should be maintained for ever but much of what the Government are doing worries me. I see the excellence of one section of our training being greatly reduced, but for what purpose? Clearly, it is to release a little money to offer a little training for a lot. I must tell the Government that offering a little training to a lot or offering a lot of training for a few are not acceptable alternatives. One way or the other, we must find the resources to manage both.

Other equally crazy examples are not difficult to discover. Plymouth runs a computer training course which my constituents are desperately keen to get on. However, to get on the course—there are none in Cornwall—Plymouth has to declare that it can find no one in Plymouth who wants to do the course. Therefore, if nobody in Plymouth wished to do the course, the droppings are offered to my constituents. That is crazy. There is no quality, no quantity and no analysis of who can use the course best. The centre is in Plymouth, so Plymouth people have first dab, and the Cornish are left out. I am sure that the same is true throughout the country.

We are told that in future there will be no list of applicants and no analysis of applicants. Courses will be stuck up on the board and the lucky person on his lucky day who wanders in and grabs the card off the wall before someone else will get the training. The Minister should talk to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission and ask what logic there is in such a system. I know why the system exists—it appears marginally to reduce administration costs.

We are back to spoiling the ship for a ha'porth of tar. I suspect that the Minister agrees. He believes that we must improve training, and he works hard to that end, but we do not get the impression that the same is true of the whole Government. I am sure that one reason why the Government have devoted more, but still meagre, resources to the youth training scheme is their desire to reduce the unemployment figures. There is nothing wrong with the desire, but there are other reasons for improving training.

Unless Britain gets its attitude to skill acquisition and training right in the next 10 to 15 years the decline in our basic wealth production will continue and Britain's economic outlook will be very poor.

5.26 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): A debate on youth training nearly two years ago provided the occasion for my maiden speech. I chose that debate because I take an interest in the subject, and it was of great interest in my constituency.

Last month, unemployment was 6·8 per cent., or 4,631 people. In that month, 663 vacancies were notified to my local job centre, and there was a stock of 679 vacancies at the end of the month. On the assumption, which I think is valid, that only about one third of vacancies are notifed, the pool is likely to be between 2,000 and 2,500.

By national standards, Slough has a relatively small unemployment problem, although it is just as tragic for the unemployed in Slough as it is for the unemployed in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). Slough has not so much an unemployment problem as an employment problem which is typified by a chronic shortage of skilled labour. I have visited about 50 companies in my two years as a Member of Parliament and spoken to the managers of many more, especially at meetings of chambers of commerce. All tell me that the major curb to expansion now is shortage of skilled labour. That curb on job creation has spin-offs in other parts of the country.

Slough is at the eastern end of the Thames valley and has recently been dubbed silicon valley because of the increasing representation of computer and information technology companies in the Thames valley corridor. However, that is only part of the picture.

Although an increasing number of computer and information technology companies have moved into my constituency in the past few years, the traditional character of Slough as a centre for the engineering industry remains relevant. There are just as many shortages in the more traditional skills as there are in the new glamour industries.

Some of the problems of the engineering industry were highlighted in a recent Thames Television programme that featured one of the many companies that permanently have a substantial number of vacancies for skilled engineers. I visited my local jobcentre recently and asked the manager, "We often hear about the hard-core unemployed, but can you tell me anything about the hard-core vacancies? How many vacancies stay on your books from month to month?" We were unable to arrive at a precise figure, but he was able to tell me that there is a large unsatisfied demand for skilled engineers. One wonders why such vacancies remain unfilled when the problem of unemployment is on everyone's lips.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) mentioned the reluctance of some people to return to their original trade after they have had to leave it. It is part of the local perception in my community that people who left the engineering industry in the depths of the recession and obtained other jobs, at Heathrow airport for example, which are not skilled but have the same rates of pay, are reluctant to move back to the jobs for which they were trained.

There are obstacles to mobility. Because of Slough's relative prosperity, housing costs are high. Slough's major expansion, which started in the 1930s, was facilitated by importing skills from other parts of the country. That is no longer an option for many companies because of the barrier which housing costs create. No one can be expected to sell a house for £15,000 or £20,000 in the north of England and take a job in Slough, where perhaps an equivalent property would cost £40,000 or more.

There are structural features of immobility, such as the impact of our social security system. Immobility is created by the comparison between drawing benefit and drawing wages. I believe that the Secretary of State's review of the system will help to overcome some of those problems.

Surely some of the 4,600 or so people registered as unemployed in my constituency have skills that are in demand. They cannot all be unskilled and unsuited to the jobs that are available.

Another problem is that we have little or no information about the skills and experience of those on the unemployment register. Such information might be of little more than academic interest in an area where job seekers vastly outnumber vacancies, but in places such as Slough, where unemployment is relatively low and skill shortages are severe, there could be value in having such information available.

If a local employer contacts the Slough jobcentre and says that he has, say, 10 vacancies for capstan lathe operators, although the official statistics may show that 4,600 people in Slough are supposedly looking for work, it is not possible for the jobcentre to put the employer in touch with a single person who holds himself out as having that skill. The information simply does not exist.

As a practical step towards meeting the skill shortage that faces many companies in my constituency, Ministers should look again at the decision no longer to require the unemployed to register at jobcentres. We need to gather information about the skills and experience of the unemployed if we are to make good use of the reservoir of skill and experience which must exist in every constituency.

Slough has relatively low unemployment, but severe skill shortages. It would be a good place to restart gathering information.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Anyone who wishes to register at a jobcentre is entitled to do so, and it is in order for him or her to state precisely any details of previous skills and experience. Officials at the jobcentre will endeavour to match those skills with employers' needs.

Mr. Watts: I know that there are voluntary arrangements — the manager and staff of my local jobcentre undertake that task enthusiastically when requested to do so — but we need more structured information so that we can match skills to vacancies and identify the potential for retraining to meet skill shortages.

I suspect that there is not a close match between the skills that are in short supply and the experience and skills of the unemployed. Otherwise, there would be more initiative from the unemployed in finding jobs. I suspect that, with a little retraining to facilitate people building on an old skill, there would be considerable potential for them to move into new jobs requiring different skills, but ones for which they could be trained.

Slough is lucky to have a go-ahead chamber of commerce and industry, which has taken a leading role locally in the youth training scheme. We have 360 young people in training, and 350 local companies have participated in the scheme in the past two and a half years.

We have heard from the Opposition depressing statistics about the YTS. I can speak only for Slough, but 90 per cent. of trainees are retained in full-time employment at the completion of their courses by the company that provided them with the training. An even higher proportion get jobs. Local companies have seized on the YTS as a golden opportunity to train people to meet skill shortages.

The local chamber of commerce and industry, sponsored by the Manpower Services Commission and the Department of Education and Science, and in collaboration with the local further education colleges, is investigating skill shortages and training needs throughout east Berkshire. I do not suggest that we should have endless investigations, but I hope that this is not a one-off exercise. I am suggesting that there could be a much greater role for chambers of commerce and industry. They could be involved in both identifying local skill shortages and co-ordinating the required training. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) said that he had more faith in employers than in the Secretary of State identifying training needs. To use a different comparison, I have more faith in the ability of a good chamber of commerce and industry to identify the training needs of its member companies than I have in the Manpower Services Commission. Therefore, I should prefer far more of the funding made available by the Government for training to be routed through chambers of commerce and industry.

[Mr. Watts]

That is the way in which training is carried out in Germany, which has been held out to us as a shining example of how training should be organised. I had the opportunity to visit Germany last year to study vocational training there. Success in Germany is based not upon the investment of vast sums of taxpayers' money but upon investment in training by industry. It is common for the chambers of commerce and industry in Germany to play a leading role in both setting the standards and monitoring the performance of those who are being trained.

One reason why industry in Germany has been able to afford to maintain a massive training programme throughout the recession—this year German industry has provided 800,000 new training places for school leavers—lies in the sensible attitude towards the remuneration of trainees by both sides of industry. Whereas in this country apprentice pay rates have recently been about 60 per cent. of adult rates, in Germany the typical range is between 20 and 30 per cent. of adult rates. Over the years, trade unions in this country have succeeded in forcing up the rates of pay for apprentices to completely unrealistic levels. Consequently, they have succeeded in eliminating the training of apprentices throughout most of British industry. It is against that background—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) wish to intervene?

Mr. Sheerman: It is not worthy of an intervention.

Mr. Watts: I could have made very much the same comment about the majority of the hon. Gentleman's opening speech, but I heard him muttering on the Front Bench and thought that he might wish to intervene. Clearly he does not wish to do so; he prefers just to mutter.

It was against that background that it became necessary for taxpayers' money to be injected in order to establish the youth training scheme. The Government are right, however, to insist that there must be a much bigger contribution from industry to the extended youth training scheme that was announced in the Budget speech.

I do not believe that skill shortages will be solved by throwing taxpayers' money at the problem, which seems to be the only solution of the Labour party; nor do I believe, in the words of the Opposition motion, that "a comprehensive statutory framework" will deliver the skills that the country needs. Nothing seems to me to be less like a recipe for success than a statutory framework. A major change in attitudes is needed. Our young people need to recognise that the long-term value of sound training is more important than a few extra pounds in their pockets during the early years of their working lives.

Industry needs to recognise far more clearly than it has in the past that training is an investment, not an overhead, and that the responsibility for providing training rests with each business, not just with its competitors. It is not good enough to rely upon somebody else to train and then hope to be able to poach in sufficient numbers to meet one's needs. I agree with the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) who made that point. The trade unions need to recognise that the contribution to overheads, let alone to profit, of trainees in their early years is negligible and that this should be reflected in the rates of pay for trainees.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East referred to the youth training scheme allowances and the suspicion that this scheme is designed to provide cheap labour. That is not the reality. The allowance rates are a recognition of the work that is done in the early years of training. The time for bigger reward comes later, when the training has been completed and experience has been obtained.

Anybody who listened to the speeches of Opposition Members and who was ignorant of the facts could be forgiven for believing that until May 1979 Britain had a comprehensive system of vocational training which was then destroyed by a callous and indifferent Government. The Opposition motion refers to "the Government's destruction of the nation's training system".

Yet anybody who looks at the facts sees that the reality is very different. The Labour Government introduced the youth opportunities scheme. That was mainly a cosmetic measure—an allegation that was subsequently thrown at the youth training scheme, but with very little justice. That cosmetic measure has been replaced by YTS. It is the first attempt ever in this country to provide school leavers with relevant work-related training.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Watts: No. I offered to give way earlier to the hon. Gentleman. Many of my hon. Friends wish to contribute to the debate, so I shall not give way now.

The industrial training boards were a costly bureaucratic money-go-round. The name of the game was to see whether one could load overheads upon one's training budget and then recover more out of grant than one had to pay through levy. It had very little to do with the provision of training. Apprenticeship schemes were made cripplingly expensive for employers by trade unions forcing up rates of pay, just as the Opposition would like to do with the youth training scheme.

This Government have produced the first coherent training strategy that this country has ever had. In partnership with industry, this strategy will, I believe, meet the skill needs that are so vital to my constituency and to the future industrial success and economic growth of this country.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Tory Ministers dealing with skills and training are, in my view, amiable but incompetent and gullible. They are gullible because they have been taken in by the employers. In his Budget speech the Chancellor said:

"too many employers still fail to recognise that training is an investment in their own commercial interest. This is in marked contrast to our major competitors overseas." — [Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 792.]

Both those statements could be wrong.

I say to my own Front Bench that it should not believe that training is always in the interests of the employer. I was a joint Under-Secretary of State in the Department of Employment before 1979. A problem that we constantly faced was that workers who were trained by one industry were then poached by another. Lorry drivers are a very good example. Heavy goods vehicle operators accept that, having paid for training somebody, others then poach those they have trained. Training is not necessarily a good investment. The Chancellor's statement is true if one refers to Britain in general, but in the case of each employer it is not necessarily true. It is cheaper and better for one's shareholders not to train if somebody else is carrying out training and if it is possible to poach those workers at the end of their training.

Ministers are gullible because they believed employers who said that they would do a far better job than the industrial training boards. There is no evidence for that. They have done worse. However, Ministers believed the employers when they asked to be freed from the industrial training boards so that they could provide the training. The result is that we have the pathetic sight of the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry ticking off the employers because they are not doing the job that they promised they would do. Employers are being begged to do that job and they are being threatened if they do not do it. Mr. Deputy Speaker, would you be frightened by the Under-Secretary of State who is sitting on the Front Bench now? Would you part with your shareholders' money if the Minister was sent to tick you off?

Of course you would not. The Minister of State goes around the country chiding employers for not training. The employers smile and enjoy the speech. They are amiable, and they share a gin and tonic at the end of the meeting. They then go their respective ways and no training takes place.

I do not believe that Ministers are callous and indifferent. They are amiable, incompetent and gullible and the country suffers from the gullibility. I asked the Minister of State a serious question about skill shortage, and he did not seem to grasp the point. The Minister of State contradicted me and the Secretary of State nodded in agreement with me.

Everyone knows that one of the reasons for the present skill shortage is that people who have used their skills for 20, 25 and even 30 years and been declared redundant, have found more secure jobs perhaps as postmen or milkmen. They have grown to like the independence of that job and because they no longer face redundancy, they stay in that job. As a result, a semi-skilled or unskilled person who could be trained as a postman or milkman is kept out of a job, and we are short of a skilled worker.

When I was in the Department of Employment I was appalled at the waste of skill. We had no policy to cope with that wastage. The Chancellor has compared this country with Japan, but great differences exist between us. The Japanese have lifetime security in a firm. That security has two effects. First, because there is little mobility between firms, it is worth while for a company to invest money in a youngster and subsequently throughout his adult working life, because the company knows that its investment will be repaid. After all that training the individual will not disappear. Secondly, it is worth while for the individual to accept that training because he or she knows that the job is secure.

Hon. Members should not think that the answer to skill shortage is simply further training. It is pointless to continue training if the trainees will not use their skills. I must however modify that statement. I disagree strongly with my hon. Friends, the Chairman of the Select Committee and the Minister when they say that training is only worth while if there is a job to go to.

When I was in the Department of Employment I saw hundreds of young people in training who would otherwise have been on the streets. I defend training for training's sake, if the alternative is for the young people to do nothing. Apprentice training is not only about teaching a youngster to use or maintain equipment; it is about giving youngsters dignity, self-respect, status and a position in society. Industrial training is as important to the individual as it is to the employer.

We heard a lot of claptrap from the Minister about training for the new technologies. He said that we should forget the traditional apprenticeships and concentrate on the new technologies. I tabled early-day motion 574 to draw attention to the fact that only 32 apprentices are to be recruited this year by British Telecom, London, which has an engineering work force of over 27,000. It is a highly profitable company engaged in high technology with an expanding market. I was shattered when I realised that British Telecom was cutting its apprentice recruitment. We are not talking about the traditional apprenticeships that the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers proudly controlled for a century or more. We are talking about modern apprenticeships in a modern technological industry. BT has decided to cut recruitment of apprentices in this important company because it is responsible to private shareholders now and not to the public good.

The Minister of State is not present but when he returns the Under-Secretary can tell him that I have not been to a telephone exchange for at least a fortnight. I say that because the Minister of State chided the Opposition Front Bench for not visiting factories.

What BT is doing for training is an illustration of what is happening elsewhere. The Minister of State talks about modernising training. BT's attitude is to stop training engineers in the complete system and to teach them only what they need to know to do the job in hand. Its training philosophy has retreated centuries. For a long time BT took great pride in its training. That pride was shared by trade unions and management. Entry was not restricted. Training at all levels and ages was accepted.

Management is now saying that it will not train in systems so that trainees can understand all the work, or in a way that will enable them to adapt in the future. It is training people to perform some industrial tasks only. That is not good enough. BT has been cutting its regional training schools. I understand that its Kew training school is closing. BT prefers to issue glossy periodicals, to spend money on useless advertisements and to reduce consumer relations training. It does not make sense. It accords, however, with management thinking in British private industrial companies. I understand that the training of clerks is also being restricted.

The MSC's "Labour Market Trends: Midland Region" assessment is a devastating report for anyone who has the interests of British industry at heart. It talks about the vast need for training. It refers to upgrading, updating, giving operatives many skills and the acquisition of management. I shall not go through them all because I want other hon. Members to have the opportunity to speak.

It is clear from the report that there is a need for industrial training. We should not look at this subject merely against the background of training cuts during the recession because of Government and management decisions. It is decades since the unions restricted entry into apprenticeship schemes. When I was Under-Secretary of State for Employment, I spent my time receiving deputations from unions demanding an increase in recruitment of apprentices.

The MSC report states:

"It must be obvious that sufficient money is not available to fund the sheer enormity of the training that is required in the new technology age."

The MSC seems to accept that smaller firms will not be able to afford training because of the expense of the equipment used in training.

When I was Under-Secretary of State for Employment, I oversaw the payment of unemployment benefit and training, but I found it difficult to get hold of the training aspect. The training division of the MSC did not show sufficient leadership. Often the industrial training boards were not properly staffed. I came across some that had been staffed by ex-colonials. One empire collapsed; another was created. Let us make no bones about it: neither the MSC training division or the ITBs had sufficient clout to do the work that was needed.

I believe that the Government have been totally wrong in finding defects in the MSC and then saying that they will abolish the ITBs. I recommend that they read Burke who referred to conserving and improving. The Government seem to be not conservators but smashers. They should have improved, not smashed, the system. The Government have been wrong to dismantle the skillcentre system.

The Government should not believe that employers will ever part with their money for training unless forced to do so. We shall be short of money for training unless someone pays. Either the taxpayer or the employer must pay. Both parties seem to agree that the employer should pay. If we are to have training, payment must be compulsory. It is no us sending the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher)—or the Minister of State, Department of Employment, whining—not "wining"—and dining with employers. It would be far better for Parliament to say to the employers, "In the interests of individuals, industry and industrial efficiency, we need industrial training. You must pay and provide the training on which this nation's future depends. We will introduce collective funding."

The Government will throw away Britain's industrial future unless they have the courage to face the employers with this unpalatable fact.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I am disadvantaged compared with other hon. Members, because I became a Member later in life than most. I carry with me the disadvantage of having worked for my living in industry and knowing at the sharp end more about training than some of the Labour Front-Bench Members who have sought to make derogatory remarks.

We must look at the seed corn of education to determine where the original fault lies. In the education system we start by denigrating those who work in industry and commerce—those making or growing something, as the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) said. It is perhaps not accidental that few people at school ever want to be salesmen. Few teachers ever say to a young person, "You should be a salesman." Yet there is no shortage of salesmen. One reason is that salesmen invariably get a car with the job. That is why the percentage of company cars in Britain is the highest in the world. That does not come about by accident, nor does the education system bring us by accident to where we are in industry.

Why do our schools teach almost exclusively French and a little German, almost to the exclusion of other languages? When will our schools start teaching more Spanish and Japanese and one or two Eastern bloc languages? It would be good for commerce and trade and for international relations if one could have a face-to-face dialogue with another person instead of relying upon an interpreter every time. However, if one tries to bring a greater variety of language teaching into the education system, the teachers rise up, almost as they are doing at the moment.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), I chose to make my maiden speech on this subject. I wish to continue the theme on which I started in the House two years ago but on which I had been speaking publicly outside for more than a decade—the theme of the lack of cohesion between education and training. Education happens in schools and training happens outside schools. There seems to be almost no relationship between the two. I resigned from an MSC committee because I wanted a headmaster of a school to be included on the committee so that there was a link between education and further education. A principal of a college of further education said that he would resign from that committee if I tried to force through the measure. In the end, I gave up trying to beat such bureaucracy.

Training boards were a good idea when first set up. They had some fundamental good points, but they were also flawed and, in the end, became a cop-out. They became too bureaucratic. There were many more bureaucrats shuffling pieces of paper around making sure that levies or grants were right than there were people involved in training. The boards were wasteful in that they did not give a true return for the amount of money that employers were forced to put into the scheme. In fact, the grants and levy scheme did not work. My company was able to obtain an exemption because it was good at training. That had nothing to do with the money element.

We should have an audit of training, not of whether companies are putting in the right amount of money. I should like to see an audit of training as part of the Companies Act in the same way as there is an audit of a company's accounts at the end of every year. It would be interesting to see how many people have been engaged in and completed training, and, in the final analysis, whether it is cost-effective.

Therefore, training boards were a cop-out. They were somewhere for people in their latter years to go on an occasional afternoon. The further education colleges are not much better. The audit report shows that they are almost worse. However, even the audit report could be flawed because the statistics on which the commission has just reported are, I understand, three years out of date.

There has been considerable discussion about skillcentres. I believe that the Government have got it wrong. It is not the first time that I have told the Government that they have got it wrong on this issue. I have told them on at least four occasions in the House, and I make no secret of it. To close the skillcentres before the other scheme had been introduced and was proven to be better was wrong. The Government should have maintained the skillcentres and found the additional resources and finances necessary to try out the new scheme, which I am sure will be successful in the rural and far-flung areas. They should not have closed the skillcentres first.

My skillcentre in Middlesbrough is one of those that are doomed. I wrote and asked why Southampton and Twickenham were not having their skillcentres closed, and why they were removed from the list. The answer that I received was that the chamber of commerce in Southampton had decided to take on any shortfall in financing of the skillcentre in Southampton. I wonder whether that option was given to the chamber of commerce in Middlesbrough, or to chambers of commerce in any of the constituencies in which skillcentres are being closed. Therefore, the Government have got it wrong in closing skillcentres.

The main reason why the Government have got it wrong relates to a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough. Seven days ago at this time of day there was a television programme on BBC North in which I launched an initiative called Job Link North. As is apparent to most people, I do not have a northern accent, although I represent a northern seat. I found that in Slough and the adjacent area where I come from, hundreds of jobs were unfilled. Therefore, I have now introduced a scheme, with the help of the jobcentres, chambers of trade and many other people, to have the local newspapers from that region sent up to the north so that people in the jobcentres and clubs can see them. I have not been partial about that because the newspapers have been put in Conservative and Labour clubs, and I think that there is even one Liberal club somewhere. Thus, as wide a spectrum of people as possible can see what job opportunities are available.

However many such initiatives are introduced, unless something is done about housing, the "on your bike" syndrome will fail. On 5 June I suggested that Ministers consider a scheme whereby anyone who has been unemployed for six months or more should be granted the equivalent of one year's benefits to act as a deposit on a house in a region of high-cost housing, subject to that person having a job and retaining that job over a given period. That lump sum, which would have been given to the person anyway for staying out of work for a further year or two or three, would allow the person to move to an area with skill shortages such as Slough and the adjacent area. It would save the Government money and give pride and impetus back to the person, but, more important in skill training, it would give a goal to some of the people in my area, so that they would take the trouble to learn skills in the traditional, old-fashioned sense, and would know that there might be a job in the end.

The prime reason why Middlesbrough skillcentre is to close is that one of the criteria is how many people go into jobs having been through the skillcentre. In an area of high unemployment, there is no need to give a person training in skills. It seems that that is the Government's attitude. I should have thought that we would want more people to be trained in skills so that they could go wherever they wanted with those skills.

Apprenticeships have changed and will continue to change. Skills are a movable feast. One of the things in which we have a proud tradition is the standard of skill training in the City and Guilds of London Institute, which has been recognised worldwide for many years. It celebrated its centenary not long ago. The institute, which I think many people would respect, has a new director-general, who took up his post last November so that he could have a break-in period before fully taking over in April. I have spoken to the new director-general. I asked him how many Ministers he had met. After all, he is the director-general of the most prestigious craft training institute in the world. The answer was, none. There are to be informal discussions between officials, before the formal discussions between officials, before they finally meet Lord Young in November.

I thought that perhaps I had got it wrong. I thought that perhaps the trade unions had been to see the director-general and everything was all right. I have to admit that one trade union has bothered to send its man in charge of training to the institute to talk about training today and in future. That trade union is the one that is least liked by Opposition Members — the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union. By and large, the trade unions have little to boast about in that area.

I am getting signals from the Whip to shut up, but I want to tell the House something about voluntarism. I know a teeny bit about this industry. I should declare an interest. There was not a single betting shop anywhere in 1963—not one—because they were illegal. Since 1963, many betting shops have been opened in this country. Almost all of them are managed by someone who has been trained, entirely voluntarily, in bookmaking. Not a single penny piece of public money has been put into it. Perhaps one of the reasons is that the mathematics is a little too complex for some of the teachers in our schools. However, the industry has stood absolutely on its own two feet. It has never sought anyone's assistance. It has many skilled, trained people today, all of whom have come through the business.

I spoke first on this subject two years ago. I shall no doubt speak on it again in two years' time, and again two years thereafter, because training is an ongoing subject. I wish the Government well, but I wish that they would sometimes watch the amber lights as well as the green ones.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): It always seems to be my lot in debates to be what would be termed in football parlance as the sweeper-up. However, I have sat through the debate patiently and enjoyed some of the speeches. I have been amazed at the abysmal ignorance of some Conservative Members about real life in engineering and industrial apprenticeships. I agree with the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) that the closure of skillcentres was a gross error of judgment. The skillcentre at Killingworth is being closed when thousands of miners are being put out of work, and there is a need to train mining, electrical and mechanical engineers from the mining industry in other skills.

The history of the Government's approach to training has not been good. Indeed, it has been abysmal. The Minister made some remarks which got up my nose, especially when he asked the Opposition how many hon. Members had visited a factory. I have visited many factories, especially during the last few years. It is normally a visit to hear about redundancies or, as it was last week, to hear about the loss of 700 jobs and the closure of a plant. That pattern has gone on for years in many areas.

[Mr. Ted Garrett]

The Minister then said that training must be relevant to the future. If he had said that five years ago, the position might have been different. A glorious opportunity has gone. We should have been spending our way out of trouble and on industrial training at the height of the depression. That opportunity has gone, as has the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). I wanted to tell him that he has an abysmal knowledge of the trade union movement and the apprentice payment scheme. However, I agree with him that there are skill shortages in some areas.

The Government have engaged in an academic exercise on how to spend less money and gain more, but it does not work. We are not spending the necessary time, effort and energy in training for the future, relative to a greater need and a higher level of technology, to meet the rapid changes. That is where the Government have gone wrong.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) who contradicted the Minister's remark that training for its own sake was no good. That is open to challenge. Training does not merely involve studying technology, and training, but meeting people and discussing the progress of educational training. It provides the opportunity to discuss the problems that arise in industry and commerce, and helps to build up an ability to communicate with others on problems. Earlier, it was argued that training facilities were being moved into rural areas. What good will that do when one instructor trains four or five people in a village of 400 people? Those people will remain isolated from the arguments that go on about the problems of industrial training. They will become introspective, instead of seeing the wider world of technology.

I too have limited time, I shall conclude. The motion sums up every problem that faces the Government, and their complete failure to meet the challenge. I feel sorry for the Ministers. The Secretary of State and his Ministers know in their hearts that they are being forced by the Treasury into financially based action, which they dislike. They have been in office long enough to realise that the policies that they are being forced to implement will not work. It is time that someone from the Department said so, and took a much tougher stance in Cabinet.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Proposals by the Manpower Services Commission to streamline Britain's skillcentre network have met with the predictable response from Labour spokesmen that the Government are applying their dogma of market forces to training. However, closer examination of the facts shows that the proposals are necessary if Britain is to have any genuine hope of competing effectively against our major rivals for world trade.

Last August, the Institute of Manpower Studies published a report with the stark message that spending on vocational training must rise if Britain is to compete. The report, entitled "Competence and Competition", concluded that Britain was seriously lagging behind its rivals in training, notwithstanding that the Government and British taxpayers were paying a higher proportion of training costs than was the case in the other three countries studied—Japan, West Germany and the United States.

The difference in training and competitiveness is not because of too little being done by the Government but, as the report found, the fact that whereas businesses in Japan, West Germany and the United States want to invest in people's training, British employers rarely assess what they should spend on education and training. In West Germany, which has a similar population to Britain, each year employers spend about £7 billion on continuing vocational education and training. Some 80 per cent. of the costs of Germany's expensive apprenticeship system is funded by employers, yet there is no need for compulsion because German employers see the value of investing in their work force. By contrast, too many British employers for too long have been inclined to think that whenever they are short of skilled people, they have only to telephone the local job centre and the people they need will be available and ready trained. They are not.

If Britain is to have a better skilled, more flexible work force, employers must take the lead in training. After all, they are in the best position to know their skill needs and to train people for new jobs. The machinery and technology in which companies invest can be the same the world over. What makes the difference in a highly competitive world is what people do with that machinery or technology—that means training a skilled work force, and employers investing in people.

Until recently the skillcentre network has had all too little to do with employers. All too often people at skillcentres have been trained speculatively for yesterday's skills with no prospect necessarily of a job at the end of their course. Without business direct from industry, skillcentres became all too dependent on one source of income — the budget of the training division of the MSC. But the MSC found that it could often buy equally good training from colleges of further education, often at half the price of skillcentres. Skillcentres have become increasingly under-utilised and expensive to run and, therefore, last year the skillcentre network had to be subsidised by taxpayers by about £12 million. That £12 million was spent on bricks and mortar, not on training anybody. If that had not been rectified, that subsidy would have been become £50 million in a couple of years' time, which is almost a quarter of the money available for adult training. Every pound spent on subsidising skillcentres is a pound less for training people. Therefore, it must make sense to streamline the skillcentre network to ensure that it carries out training directed to known employment needs, and to skills that are needed today, in the 1980s and in the next century.

It does not matter whether the building is called a skillcentre, a college of further education or a technical college. What is important is the quality, relevance and cost-effectiveness of the trainingin. Regarding the adult training strategy, the number of adults trained under MSC programmes each year will double to 250,000 by 1986, including a significant increase to 125,000 in the number of unemployed people getting new skills training. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that both the adult training strategy and the skillcentre training agency's business plan received the unanimous endorsement of the Manpower Services Commissioners, including the trade union commissioners.

I shall conclude by touching on the youth training scheme. It is only Opposition Members who knock the YTS. They pay lip service to it, but when it comes to the crunch, they never give it their wholehearted endorsement. They are torn between wanting to endorse it and not wanting to give the Government credit for a good scheme. We have been asked what we want from a two-year YTS. It is clear what we want and what the Government and the MSC can deliver. It is a scheme to provide a vocational and educational training and work experience to all youngsters, ending with a vocational qualification—a qualification demonstrating occupational competence that can be taken into the work area.

Much has been said about the Government's contribution to the scheme in terms of funding, but we should remember this. It looks as though the Exchequer money available could stretch to a contribution of between £150 and £170 a month for each trainee for each of the 24 months of the two-year programme. If we take the mid-point of that range, it would mean an expenditure of £3,840 per trainee per annum. We should compare that with what is provided in West Germany. On its two-year apprenticeship scheme, the average net cost to the employer is £3,600 per trainee per year. No money is provided by the state. Why do German employers continue to make that contribution each year? The Germans are fully conscious that their industrial success and high standard of living depend upon their ability to produce advanced goods reliably and efficiently. That means that the Germans have stopped regarding training as an on-cost and now regard it as an investment.

Britain will improve its position not by forcing employers, through a statutory framework, to contribute more towards training, but by making employers realise that training is an investment, not an on-cost.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I do not wish to blight the parliamentary career of the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) by saying that I agree with his comparison with German industry. Suffice it to say that, in any recession, training is the first casualty. I understand that, especially in small businesses employing fewer than 200 people, the struggle to keep the business alive—it certainly is a struggle under this Government—often leads to dispensing with training. It may seem to be necessary as a short-term measure, but it is not prudent in the longer term.

A vital element in any recovery is confidence. The Government do not help to create confidence by saying that they will abolish the state earnings-related pension scheme because it will not be affordable in the future. The only conclusion that can be drawn from that is that the Government are not confident that Britain will have the sustained recovery that would make such a pension scheme affordable.

We are entitled to ask why there is such a shortage of skills. Between 1980 and 1984, 170,000 craftsmen were lost to the engineering industry and several thousand apprentices were made redundant. But skilled workers can turn their hands to other jobs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) said, people may be reluctant to return to an industry when it is held in such low esteem by a Government who believe that we can earn our living by taking in each other's washing. Our competitors realise that a strong manufacturing base is essential for a thriving economy, and, therefore, Germany trains twice as many technicians as we do.

Without wishing to detract from the initiatives which the Minister mentioned, it is still true that, on 26 April, the CBI announced that one in 10 firms expects its output to be held back by a shortage of skilled labour during the next quarter, and that this was expected to remain the same during the next year. Some firms expected the position to become worse.

Unfortunately, industry, with some honourable exceptions, has never given training and retraining the priority that they deserve. That applies especially to firms employing fewer than 200 people, which rarely have training facilities. They expect to be able to lift skilled personnel off sky hooks when they need them, and to replace them on the hooks when they do not need them. They expect to be able to poach enough people to meet their needs. Firms must substantially alter their attitude to training and regard it as an essential cost if they are to remain in business over a period, because a major stumbling block to better performance by British industry is technical expertise and training. I accept that apprenticeships must change with the times, but now we have only 8,000 engineering apprentices compared with 25,000 only recently. If anyone imagines that those 8,000 apprentices will meet our future needs, he had better think again. That number will go nowhere near to meeting the needs of industry.

As to the introduction of a two-year YTS, given the will by Government and industry, it should be possible to identify and tailor schemes to the needs of industry. That should be possible, but I am discouraged about the appreciation of the need, because on the same day as the CBI made the announcement to which I referred, the west midlands CBI said in a covering letter that it had done no more work on the identification of skills shortages than had been done at national level. Had that organisation been seized of the need, it would have examined the matter much more deeply.

Those tailored schemes would be aimed at specific needs. I believe that industry would be prepared to contribute towards the cost, and it could even go some way to eliminating the criticism that YTS is a cheap labour scheme by providing real jobs at the end of the training. Such a scheme would need greater commitment, but if translated into reality the problem would be to accommodate all those who wished to take up the training.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): The motion tabled by the Labour party is a combination of reaction and party political propaganda of the most depressing sort. The Opposition hark backwards to a pattern of training that was inadequate and which the Labour Government did nothing to improve. The principal features of the Labour Government's policy for the provision of skills were the abolition of grammar schools and the invention of the youth opportunities programme. That response was derisorily inadequate, if not actively destructive.

The speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) betrayed his resentment of the Government's approach, which has been thoughtful, constructive and determined, and through which a great deal has already been achieved. The Government have produced a succession of documents, including the "New Training Initiative" and responses to consultation, "Training for Jobs", "Education and Training for Young People" and, on the education side, "Better Schools" and "The Development of Higher Education." Those documents have defined the issues, led the debate and helped us to establish a national recognition of our modern needs.

Those needs are a foundation of basic education in which every pupil has the opportunity to acquire intellectual, practical and social skills, as well as the confidence and discipline to enable him to cope with and adapt to the modern world of work. That foundation must be built upon with a period of occupational training which will provide the bridge from education to a job. Thereafter, every worker must have the opportunity of periodic retraining so that he will have the security and dignity of knowing that he will be needed and can continue to contribute.

Central Government have increased their spending allocation to training by four times in the last five years. We are moving away from a situation in which 16-year-olds are cast, vulnerable and often ill prepared, on the job market, 40 per cent. of them with no formal qualification and a high proportion of them having been for years demotivated at school and personally pessimistic about their future. We are moving to a situation in which every school leaver will have the opportunity to undertake a considered programme of work experience and structured training leading to qualifications, so that at 18 youngsters will be able to take their place in the job market, properly equipped and prepared.

What is really happening in relation to skill shortages? Certainly the skill shortages are not such as to abort the present recovery. The CBI survey in April found, however, that one in 10 companies expected skill shortages that would inhibit their future progress. It is interesting that within the severe shortages were shown shortages of skilled textile workers. The traumatic experience of the textile industry in recent years has shown that there is no absolute shortage of skilled textile workers.

Policies to meet skills needs must take account of three aspects of the labour market — mobility, cost and training.

We must help put the right people in the right places. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) spoke shrewdly on the subject. I will only add to what he said by pointing out that it is important to pursue policies to improve the provision of private rented accommodation, so that people who choose to move from Sunderland to High Wycombe, for example, can find somewhere to live.

If there are shortages in skills and a tradition of under-investment, it is partly because of excessive costs. In that, the trade unions have, unfortunately, played a damaging part. They have sometimes made it impossibly expensive to provide the necessary training. They have insisted on time serving when increasingly we need to achieve competitive standards and to adapt rapidly. The unions insisted upon demarcation when there was an increasing premium on adaptability and the transferability of skills. Above all, trade unions have forced up the pay of young workers. The whole labour movement remains doggedly intransigent on that. In the interests of young people, it is realistic to recognise that in the early years of their work experience they should be trainees rather than employees. As a result of training, they will be able eventually to make their full contribution and earn adult levels of pay.

When considering the educational content of training we must continue to address ourselves to the problem of the cultural gap which has long been established between education and industry. Much is now being done to build bridges. The Government are making grants to improve local liaison. The CBI has its Understanding Industry initiative. That is helpful, but I should like the in-service training of teachers to offer more opportunities for teachers to be seconded so that they can enjoy first-hand industrial experience. Then they would no longer convey to pupils the idea that a career in industry or commerce is second best. Equivalently, I should like industry to be more active in contributing to the development of the curriculum.

We chose to destroy our technical schools in the 1970s. It is an interesting and sad irony that over the same period the Germans have moved to a position in which 50 per cent. of their schoolchildren now attend technical schools —the Realschulen. Research under the auspices of the NIESR has found that average levels of mathematical attainment by German school leavers are two years ahead of ours.

Much has to be done. There is no doubt that the Government's initiatives in the reform of the curriculum and the examination system — for example, the introduction of the GCSE, with its emphasis on practical competence and problem solving—will help, as will the TVEI.

However, we cannot afford certain self-indulgent professional, political and bureaucratic attitudes. We cannot afford the NUT to block the reform of teachers' career structures. Local education authorities, including some which were Conservative-controlled, went into sulks because the Government insisted that the MSC should spend some of the money which they were accustomed to spending. Some Left-wing Labour-controlled authorities are spurning TVEI on the bogus principle that it erodes their proper sphere of influence.

Industry can make a much larger commitment to training for the future. The lessons which are so well expressed in the MSC document "Competence and Competition" will not be ignored. The best of British companies recognise the need for a policy of investment in the use of human resources from the top down. It is people who cause a company to succeed or to fail.

I am confident that industry will respond to make an even greater success of the youth training scheme which has already had a remarkable effect in only two years. We must build on the successes and recognise that YTS is not a palliative for unemployment but a key part of a policy to build suitable training bridges between school and the entry to employment at 18-plus on a properly trained and qualified basis.

Unions and industry should respond to the Government's challenge of a second-year YTS. There will be difficulties. Many firms have as many YTS trainees as they can handle. Some industries, including parts of engineering, are in a fragile financial position. Training costs are higher in some industries than in others. Many new participant firms will be needed and much has to be sorted out before April 1986. However, industry will benefit from a better trained, better motivated, better skilled and more flexible work force.

The Government deserve to be congratulated on their policies to meet Britain's skill needs.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): The House is at least agreed about the appropriateness of the timing of today's debate. However, the Minister's speech betrayed an awful complacency and a dangerous ignorance of the extent and gravity of the problem. He was blasé. Perhaps he is bored with the subject.

I sympathise with the Minister because the problems with which he has to grapple daily are not easy. However, the problems will not go away. Nothing that he has said today will make it easier for him or his Department to deal with the problems of British industry or of British youngsters who are in urgent need of skill training to meet the country's needs.

This has been a good debate, but we expect something better from the Under-Secretary of State than a recital of the odds and ends about which he will be anxious to tell us. We want him to respond to the heart of the debate and to tell us how the Government intend to reverse the downward spiral. I accept that he will not have long to do that.

I must comment on four outstanding speeches from the Opposition Back Benches. I refer to the speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), who spoke with the full authority of a Chairman of a Select Committee; my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding); my very close friend the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park), who spoke with detailed knowledge of the midlands; and my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), who spoke with a depth of experience derived from a lifetime in industry.

Opposition Members have our different perspectives and emphases, but we are agreed about the extent and gravity of the problem. A wealth of reports has been issued in the past two years. It seems that everyone but the Minister and his Department are seized of the difficulties and dangers. The document "Competence and Competition" from the NEDC and the MSC — [Interruption.] It is here. It has obviously not been read by the Minister. All that he has done is read the title, but I have read the report. That is why he could not today talk with any meaning about that important report. If the Minister had read the report, he would not have talked so much rubbish about going round factories in the west midlands, without understanding that, behind the automated assembly lines, there is a need for technicians, apprentices and skills. The Minister does not understand. If he cannot see people or apprentices, he does not think that we need skills or apprenticeships. Of course we do, and we need them in the same numbers as we had previously. We are not even replacing those who are leaving because our factories are declining. Skilled fitters and skilled electricians are doing other jobs in the economy and no longer fulfilling their proper roles.

There have been many reports on the matter, including one from the House of Lords. There can be no doubt about the serious danger that we face. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) quoted the figure for the amount spent by British industry on training —figures provided by the MSC — as being 0·15 per cent. compared with what the MSC believes should be 2 per cent. of turnover. I do not want to quibble about the figures; I wish only to bring home to the Minister, the Under-Secretary and Conservative Members the extent of the gravity of the position. There is no room for complacency. Britain is going backwards while other countries are racing forward. That is something that the Minister does not want to grasp.

In a moment, I shall put forward policies that the Government should adopt—[Interruption.] I could take a great deal longer with my speech, but the Under-Secretary would not like his hon. Friends to encourage me to do so. If the Minister does not believe what I am saying, let him read the news release from the CBI. After all, Sir Terence Beckett is a great supporter of the Conservative party. It states:

"A breakdown of the skill shortages now being faced by British manufacturing industry shows that they cover many types of jobs ranging from welders"—

[Interruption.] Of course robots are on line doing blind spot welding—it is the first generation of robotics. But there is a great deal more to manufacturing than robots on a car assembly line. The report continues:

"and sewing machinists, to technicians and computer programmers . . . they cover a wide range of jobs and are not confined purely to information technology."

I shall not read on because time does not permit me to do so.

What has been the Government's response? I can pick out four points, having listened to the debate. First, they have reduced the skillcentres by one third, and it has cost them £12 million to do so even though there was opposition from their own supporters. Secondly, the Government have abolished 16 training boards because they were not perfect and, supposedly, were not doing their job. Has the private sector been doing its job? Of course not. If we are to give the private sector a lead, if we are to encourage it and bring it with us, we must establish something to achieve that. Of course the boards were not perfect, but the answer was not to close them; it was to make them better.

Thirdly, the Government have blamed the unions. We hear that time after time, ad nauseam. Yet the Policy Studies Institute said about Britain's non-problem, the unions:

"In Britain opposition to the introduction of the new technology from the shopfloor or the trade unions is seen as an obstacle to its adoption far less frequently than economic, technical or skills problems."

are experiencing problems because of the unions

"than in Germany . . . or France."

I shall let the Minister see that report.

Fourthly, the Government have said, "Let us leave it to the companies; voluntarism will work." Cannot the Minister understand that it was because voluntarism was not working in the 1960s that we embarked on industrial training boards? Cannot the Minister see the crisis of the growing shortage of skills across the whole range of industrial requirements? It means that voluntarism is not working.

If the Minister does not like what the Labour party is saying, let him read the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology entitled "Education and Training for New Technologies." What is wrong with the four or five important recommendations that it contains? We have not heard a word about that from him. Perhaps the Under-Secretary, when he replies, will say that he will implement those recommendations because he is responsible for training for industry.

I do not want to get into the debate about whether training should be for training's sake — although I happen to believe that. I believe that we will get the training that we need only when we stop allowing our industrial base to decline. It is only when the jobs are available that there will be training geared for them. The expansion of the economy and of the skill training programme are the twin pillars on which we must base our policy to meet the requirements that those will bring with them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): In the six minutes left to me, I wish first to thank my hon. Friends the Members for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), for Slough (Mr. Watts), for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) for their contributions. I also acknowledge the contribution of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), who got things totally wrong when defining the industries for which we should train and those for which we should not.

I thank the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) for his sometimes elegant and sometimes inelegant swipe at the YTS. I also thank the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyne (Mr. Golding), whose filibuster I have heard eight or nine times before, and which was inevitably targeted on British Telecom—a success story that he would rather not begin to recognise.

I wish to address my brief remarks to those parts of the motion that state that the Opposition

"condemns the Government's failure to make proper provision for improving the extent and standard of modern skills training that is essential for Britain's economic recovery and industrial growth."

It then admonishes the Government for "its failure to provide quality training for the new technologies" and goes on to recommend a comprehensive statutory framework.

I can leave to one side the micros-in-schools programme. There is not time to discuss that today, other than to say that it has been a magnificent success, producing the first computer-literate generation of school leavers. There is no time to discuss the information technology centres—all 175 of them. There has been a great deal of argument tonight about placement rates from the various programmes, but we are talking about 75 per cent. — plus placements in jobs from the information technology centres.

Saddest of all, there is not time to discuss a certain document. There has been some to-ing and fro-ing about who has read what and who has bothered to do his homework. I am convinced that Opposition Members have not read the script for tonight's debate — it is called "The Human Factor—The Supply Side Problem". Not only has my hon. Friend read it; he helped to write it. There were contributions from the MSC and, most important of all, contributions from people in industry who actually hire graduates in the new technologies — the graduates on whom we depend for our future economic well-being.

We must address ourselves to another problem—one that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) failed to diagnose accurately. He fell into the old mistake of talking about a dual labour market and high tech versus low tech. There is no such thing as a clear distinction between high tech and low tech. The so-called low tech industries, by becoming involved in new production processes and by applying intellect and added value to their manufacturing processes, in fact become sunrise industries; they become the users of information technology.

I listened carefully to what the hon., Member for Huddersfield said. He spoke about a coherent and comprehensive approach. He then spoke about a modular integrated approach—part of the overall understanding of life and work. He then went on to talk—a little more ominously — about a comprehensive statutory framework, then about a comprehensive contributory fund and then about training committees with trade union involvement. The hon. Gentleman wrote his speech on the basis that he might obtain a good mention for terminology in the editorials of The Guardian; it was not a speech suitable for tonight's very serious debate.

The missing element in the assertions of the hon. Member for Huddersfield was the costing of the proposals contained in "Plan for Training". On the Labour party's own figures, the centralised, bureaucratic, modular, comprehensive and integrated—call it what one will—approach would cost £6 billion. The statutory minimum wage to which his party is committed would cost another £200 million. The cost of full trade union rates of pay for YTS trainees would cost £260 million — and the hon. Gentleman tells us that we do not understand the market forces behind training. The Government realise that the pace of change, the flexibility that is required and the fluidity that is necessary in our labour markets and training markets——

It being Seven o'clock, and there being private business set down by direction of THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, under Standing Order No. 7 (Time for taking Private Business), further proceeding stood postponed.

Birmingham City Council Bill
(By Order)

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill, as amended, be now considered.—[Mr. Garel Jones.]

7.1 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I am grateful to be called to speak on the Bill, particularly as I was not called until 9.53 pm on Second Reading and then the closure was moved. I was unable to put before the House my views on the Bill, despite the fact that the proposed race will take place largely within my constituency.

I deeply resent some of the comment that has appeared in the local press in Birmingham, especially in a free newspaper that I have never seen called the Birmingham Despatch. That newspaper suggests that the Birmingham Members of Parliament who have ensured that the Bill is properly debated in the House are in some way obstructing its passage. The implication is that the House should not use its powers to scrutinise any legislation that is put before it.

As I said at the beginning of my speech on Second Reading, which was so rudely interrupted, I hesitate to speak against or oppose a Bill which is supported by the overwhelming majority of councillors in Birmingham. My view is that local democracy should be much greater than it is at present and that the ultra vires rule should be abolished. Local authorities should be given the power to do whatever they think right and for which they have authority from the local people, provided that they can afford so to act and are given reasonable powers to raise moneys to finance such expenditure. That is not the current situation. Local authorities are severely restricted in what they can do, and they must seek parliamentary authority to go beyond those powers. It seems that those of us who are elected to represent the interests of our constituents should properly scrutinise any measures that come before us. When we have a measure that will affect the people of Birmingham, it is particularly important that Birmingham Members should pay attention to what is being proposed — [Interruption.] Would the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) please be quiet?

The second reason why I hesitate to criticise the Bill is that we have repeatedly been told that a referendum, which was taken in the area where the road race is to be run, suggested that local residents were overwhelmingly in favour of the proposal. I find that rather odd, because I have received a number of extremely critical letters and met many people who live in the area who are highly critical of the proposals in the Bill.

We are told that referendum forms were sent to 4,520 residents and that about 34 per cent. voted. Apparently 1,290 voted yes and 283 voted no. Perhaps that is a significant majority in favour of the Bill, but it means that many people did not consider the proposal. When one considers the information that was put to those who participated in the referendum, it is clear that they were not fully informed of the facts, especially the potential cost —[Interruption.] Mr. Deputy Speaker, I appeal to you to do something about the racket that is taking place on the Government Benches below the Gangway?

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): We are listening to your every word, girl.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I can hear clearly what the hon. Lady is saying.

Ms. Clare Short: I am grateful to all the attentive listeners.

When those who live in the area where the race is proposed to be run were asked to participate in the referendum, a piece of paper was circulated outlining the proposals. That piece of paper was misleading in a number of serious respects. First, it was misleading to suggest that the race would become a grand prix. There is a general understanding in Birmingham that the race will be a grand prix, but that is completely wrong, and that somewhat changes the nature of the proposal.

Secondly, and more seriously, the people of Birmingham who said that they were in favour of such a race were not told the potential costs that would be incurred and might result in other less than adequate services. The council, in its publicity about the race, has misled people by not stressing that the potential cost is quite serious.

A leaflet, entitled "Road Race Facts," gives six facts, the last of which asserts that Birmingham ratepayers will not be paying for the race. It states:

"The cost to Birmingham ratepayers will be absolutely nothing. Indeed, they will benefit as more much needed cash will be brought into the authority's kitty."

That is false and misleading, and it is bad that the council should put out such material.

In a glossy package, which was assembled and distributed in Birmingham, there is a leaflet on the jobs that the road race would create. It says

"The race will make money for the City Council so the ratepayers will not lose out. We will not be taking decisions on whether to repair leaking roofs or to support the race. The road race will bring more cash into the authority's kitty."

The literature that has been issued by the council to the people of Birmingham is gravely misleading. Many people who consider the road race to be desirable are not aware of all the facts.

As I have said, many people in Birmingham think that a grand prix is proposed. One of my hon. Friends who was a member of the Committee which considered the Bill has passed to me a copy of the summary that was put before the members of the Committee. The first paragraph reads:

"The purpose of the Bill is to authorise a motor racing event once a year in Birmingham, not far from the centre. The event is based on the Monaco Grand Prix."

Again, it is suggested that there will be a grand prix in Birmingham, but that is not so. It will be a much lower level race with less status, and it will bring fewer people into the city. That has serious implications for the money that might come into the city as a result of the road race. The people of Birmingham have been misled on this crucial issue.

My first objection to the Bill, as drafted, is the cost. We are told by the council, though the people of Birmingham have not had this information put to them, that the proposal is to spend £1·5 million on capital expenditure in the early stages to prepare the road for the race. Serious alterations to the road are to take place—widening and the removal of flower beds and other amenities in the area. In addition, it will cost £1·5 million in revenue costs for each year that the road race is run. The council's estimated figures show that it is fairly certain that at worst the road race will cover its own costs. There may not be any profit for the people of Birmingham, despite what is said in the leaflets to which I have referred, but the council is fairly confident that there will not be any loss.

I shall seek to move amendments designed to ensure that there will not be a loss. I am worried that the council is giving assurances about the money that it will spend and the income it will receive, but the Bill will not protect the people of Birmingham from much greater expenditure and much smaller income than is projected. My deepest fear and greatest objection to the Bill is that the people of Birmingham could spend millions of pounds, which could be used to improve housing facilities, which are in a serious state of decline, or to protect other declining public services. All this money will be spent on a race which will be a loss maker for the people of Birmingham, most of whom will not be able to attend it because of the cost of the tickets.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does the hon. Lady agree that she is speaking of the type of infrastructure spending that she and her hon. Friends spend much time complaining is not taking place in Birmingham?

Ms. Short: No, it is not the type of infrastructure spending that I favour. I do not favour turning the hearts of our cities into race tracks. I favour an increase in infrastructure spending to improve the facilities for all the people of our cities— for example, putting right decaying sewers.

I shall be moving amendments designed to hold the council to its financial projections. The council has given the sums of money that will be spent, but there is no guarantee that it will keep to those figures. Later in the debate we can discuss the need to hold the council to its projections so that Birmingham ratepayers are not required to spend even more.

The money that the council proposes to spend will, of course, come from the capital expenditure budgets of the people of Birmingham, who are already severely restricted financially. It is notable that the area around which the race will be run contains many tower blocks and maisonettes that are in a serious state of disrepair. Each month, when I conduct my advice bureau in that part of the city, people complain about the state of the tower blocks, with damp, condensation, mould and a general lack of repair. Caretakers lose their jobs or leave and are not replaced. There is a general air of decline and grottiness about those dwellings.

When we ask the city for more expenditure to enable people to live in dignified housing in the area where it is proposed to hold the race, we are told that, because the Government have restricted the money available for Birmingham to spend, there is no additional finance available. It seems ironic that Birmingham can find money to promote a road race, but not to repair the homes of those who live in the area surrounding the race route.

Many Birmingham people are under the illusion that the road race will be great fun, with free entertainment for anyone wishing to attend. Indeed, in an experiment to see whether the event would be popular, the city of Birmingham ran a "fun day" and invited people to come free on that day. I have received letters from people telling me not to be a spoilsport and that people would love a free day out.

It will not be free. The tickets will range from £5 to £25 a head for each of the two days of the race. Most Birmingham families cannot afford such expenditure. Indeed, among the 300,000 people who live in the six inner Birmingham constituencies, the rate of unemployment is 30 per cent. The unemployed of Birmingham will not be able to afford the cost of tickets for the road race. I shall be moving an amendment later to require the council to charge the residents of Birmingham half price. Anyone who argues that this will be a fun event for the people of Birmingham should be prepared to accept such an amendment.

Another reason why I have doubts about the proposal arises from a briefing document that was circulated by the RAC prior to Second Reading. The RAC made it clear that it had grave doubts about the Bill. It did not think that road racing was desirable in Birmingham. In paragraph 8 of its briefing document, it stated:

"The RAC Motor Sports Association has declared its policy that motor racing should be on purpose-built circuits where there has been substantial investment of resources to ensure that adequate facilities will be available—and where there will be maximum practicable safety for competitors and for spectators. Such circuits also permit training, testing and practising at all times and safety provisions are continually being improved."

That sentiment makes sense. We were told in Committee that objections to the idea had been withdrawn. When I telephoned the RAC today and spoke to Mr. Jack Smeaton, one of those under whose name the briefing document was circulated, he made it clear that the RAC's view had not changed, that it still had grave doubts about the proposal, that it was opposed in principle to road racing and that, for reasons of safety and efficiency, it should be confined to circuits. However, given the size of the vote on Second Reading, the RAC says that it is keeping its head down, that it will comply with the will of Parliament and continue to look in detail at the proposal. It is not clear, therefore, that at the end of the day the RAC will approve the race.

We could have an even worse scenario, with Birmingham spending a considerable amount on changing the roads and preparing for the race, only to find that a proper, high quality race has not been approved and that the money has been wasted. In considering the vision that inspired the road race proposal, we must note that Birmingham is in deep and dangerous economic trouble.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It will be in even deeper trouble if the hon. Lady stays much longer.

Ms. Short: The rate of unemployment in inner Birmingham is 30 per cent. Over the city as a whole, the rate is 30 per cent. Birmingham encapsulates the major problems of the British economy.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark rose—

Ms. Short: I shall not give way in view of the silly comments that the hon. Gentleman has been making.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): My hon. Friend should perhaps reflect, when referring to silly comments made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), that that hon. Gentleman is normally paid by a Birmingham newspaper, which makes me lean to her side of the fence rather than to his.

Ms. Short: While I do not always agree with the hon. Member for Selly Oak, he usually behaves in a courteous fashion. He has not been behaving that way today. That is why I shall not give way to him.

I have explained why I have serious objections to the Bill. The people of Birmingham have been misled into thinking that the race will be a grand prix, when it will not, because of the cost involved, and the likelihood is that it will not prove profitable. The tickets will be so expensive that most Birmingham people will not be able to afford to attend.

If the Bill is amended in the ways in which I am seeking, I shall not oppose it, but it will not be with enthusiasm that I shall support it. The leadership of Birmingham city council seems to be adducing an argument similar to that put forward by the Government in trying to solve the problems of the British economy, with an apparent willingness to write off manufacturing and to look to services as a major source of income and employment.

In the Soho ward of my constituency, unemployment has reached 40 per cent. Matthew Bolton and James Watt developed the steam engine there, and that concept led to the industrial revolution.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am pleased that my behaviour has improved sufficiently for the hon. Lady to permit me to intervene. Does she agree that if, as she says, the problems of Birmingham are great and that much needs to be done, it is time to encourage the sort of enterprise that the Bill proposes? The motor industry is important to Birmingham. The publicity that would come from the race — which I believe would be profitable — would focus attention on the way in which we were taking steps to solve our problems. It is a time for enterprise and a little risk. Why is she against that?

Ms. Short: I agree that the hon. Gentleman's behaviour has improved. I do not agree that a low level road race with saloon cars, held for one day, will do anything to restore Birmingham's manufacturing base. Birmingham's manufacturing, like manufacturing throughout the country, needs major new investment so that it can be modernised to use new technology.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the output of manufacturing in Britain is still lower that it was in 1979. I agree that, with intervention from central Government and local government to restructure manufacturing, it is highly likely that the number of people employed in manufacturing would decline compared with 1979, but the number would decline in a context of highly profitable industry, with people in employment, and with money available to be spent on public services and leisure amenities in which all could participate. That is the desirable way forward for Birmingham — not spending money on gimmicks such as road racing and convention centres which seek to bring in rich foreigners who might spend a little money in our city and create a few jobs in catering, or in the sales of ice cream and beer. I repeat that investment in modern high technology manufacturing is the way forward for Birmingham, not in convention centres and road races.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Does the hon. Lady agree that if there is a desire to show off the motor manufacturing wares of Birmingham, there are two race tracks close by which could be utilised — Silverstone and Donington? They would be happy to lend their race tracks to the city of Birmingham to enable Birmingham to display its wares in safety to the world at large.

Ms. Short: That is an attractive offer. I am sure that people in Birmingham will take note of it and perhaps come back to the hon. Gentleman for further information.

I have grave reservations about the Bill, and I cannot support it as presently drafted. If the amendments are made, I shall not oppose the Bill, but it should not be thought by anyone in Birmingham that Birmingham's economy will be put right by events such as this or that they can provide dignified work and proper leisure and public services.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): It may be helpful if I intervene early to re-state the Government's view on the Bill.

As the House knows, the Government traditionally stand neutral in relation to private Bills where no major matter of principle is involved. This Bill is no exception. We regard it as primarily a local matter. Listening to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), one realised the extent to which it is a local matter. We are not opposed in any way to the principle of the Bill as it stands. It will be up to Birmingham city council to make its decisions on priorities, and I am sure that during the debate we shall hear the varying views on those priorities.

The Government considered whether the concept of a city centre motor race constituted a precedent with adverse effects on national sporting interests. Hon. Members may remember that that was one of the issues raised on Second Reading. We sought assurances from the promoters of the Bill as to the construction of the circuit, the number of days per year on which racing could be permitted, and the type of racing allowed. The provisions of the Bill are very restricted; racing will take place on only one day a year. The circuit is essentially city streets marginally modified, and there will be no grand prix type racing. That is absolutely clear.

The Royal Automobile Club, the body for controlling motor sport in Britain, indicated to me that it was opposed to the Bill at the beginning. I listened carefully to its concerns, but I concluded that there was not sufficient cause to seek to influence the passage of the Bill. There was a majority in favour of the Bill on Second Reading, following which the chairman of the RAC wrote to me to say that the RAC accepted that the principle of the Bill had been approved by this House and that it intended to make no further representations on the issue.

I understand that the RAC is now discussing the organisation of any future race in accordance with its own rules, and the detailed track requirements, with Birmingham city council. That is the very spirit of co-operation that I urged on Second Reading, and I applaud the fact that at last the RAC and Birmingham city council are working together in co-operation. That will, I believe, enable Birmingham to have its motor race, and enable the RAC to ensure that the race meets its own stringent requirements — a matter about which other hon. Members and I have expressed concern.

The Government also have a duty to oversee other general matters of national concern which are relevant to the Bill.

Mr. Ashby: Does my hon. Friend realise that the RAC is still against the principle of the road race? On the other hand, if Parliament approves the road race, the RAC is bound, as the governing body of the sport, to ensure that the race takes place according to its rules and in the safest possible manner, so of course it will co-operate and talk to Birmingham city council and do what it can. But the RAC still remains opposed to the principle of the motor race.

Mrs. Chalker: In the discussions that we had before the Second Reading debate I took care to find out exactly what was being said by the RAC and, indeed, by Birmingham city council.

On 17 April last, I received a letter from the chairman of the standing joint committee of the RAC, the Automobile Association and the Royal Scottish Automobile Club which expresses their views. The letter says:

"Certain specific matters which were causing concern have now been the subject of acceptable assurances from the City council, but the Bill remains of interest to the Standing Joint Committee because, if enacted, it will establish a precedent for similar measures elsewhere.

The Standing Joint Committee invites you"— the letter refers to me—

"to consider that it would be undesirable if this were relied upon before there had been time for a valid judgment of the effectiveness of the assurances which have been given relating to matters of safety, reasonable access and minimal interference with road users in general".

The point is that, of course, people are bound by a vote in this House, but I am glad that Birmingham city council and the RAC, as the leading partner in the standing joint committee, have got together to discuss the matter, and it is right that they should do so.

I want also to comment on other general matters of concern, such as the effects on strategic traffic flows, safety, access, noise and pollution. They are all matters which have worried hon. Members and about which they have rightly expressed concern. The Bill contains clauses relevant to all those matters. Officials of my Department and those of the Department of the Environment and the Home Office have discussed the Bill in detail with the promoters, and several amendments have been incorporated to satisfy our reservations which existed at the earlier stage.

In our view, it would also be unreasonable for the net expense, if there were any, of this local initiative to be met from public funds. Therefore, we sought details from Birmingham city council on the anticipated income and expenditure associated with the race. We have told the council clearly that we expect the project to be self-financing, and have accepted that the estimates provided to us by the Birmingham city council demonstrate that that is indeed feasible. Those matters are important and I have seen it as our duty to ensure that they have been fully considered, and the best possible arrangements made. We are, however, content that the promoters of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), my hon. Friends and some Opposition Members, have worked hard to make sure that they know what is required of them. I am content that the promoters are well aware of their responsibilities, as one would expect from a city with such a civic reputation as Birmingham. I said on Second Reading that this is an exciting prospect and that the Bill is undoubtedly an unusual and adventurous initiative. That is not unusual. We have come to expect exciting, unusual and adventurous initiatives from Birmingham. There are no reasons for frustrating the city's attempts to promote itself.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): If the Government have such a high regard for the city of Birmingham, why are they financially penalising the city so much that we have been forced to raise rates through the roof?

Mrs. Chalker rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Lady answers that, we shall be getting away from the Bill.

Mrs. Chalker: I am quite ready to answer that point, but I abide by your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall leave it to another day to respond to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), who, unfortunately, has recently been associated with a sludge works —[Interruption]. He is not really associated with sludge works.

The Bill was given a substantial majority in this House on Second Reading, when my hon. Friend the Member for Hall Green made a lucid and open speech. I see no reason for impeding the progress of the Bill. Therefore, I recommend that it be allowed to proceed.

Sir Reginald Eyre (Birmingham, Hall Green): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for her positive attitude. I assure her that the city of Birmingham will take full account of and comply with the requirements that she has specified relating to safety, environmental considerations and other such matters.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) for missing the opening sentences of her speech. She raised a number of important points to which I would like to refer.

We had an opportunity to record the main purposes of the Bill on Second Reading on 1 April. It establishes a framework for the creation, in Birmingham, once a year, of a major international tourist attraction for the city and the midlands—a motor race of formula cars through the streets and a parade of historic cars and other attractive events suitable for family entertainment.

The city council believes — these matters were earnestly considered by members of the city council, as the hon. Member for Ladywood knows — that this event would help to promote Bimingham as a motor city. It would encourage the many thousands in the city who are engaged in work connected with the motor industry. From a psychological point of view, it is important to provide that kind of encouragement. The city council has considered the matter very carefully.

Ms. Clare Short: There are two issues—whether it would be desirable to have this road race and whether it would be profitable. At a recent meeting with the leader of the council and some of my hon. Friends, one of the officials went so far as to argue that a road race to promote Birmingham as an international tourist centre would be desirable, whether or not it was profitable. I would be grateful for the hon. Gentleman's view on that.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I accept the importance of jobs and profitability. If the hon. Lady will permit me, I shall try to reply to what she said about those two major issues later.

A list of job creation effects was discussed on Second Reading. I invite the hon. Lady to read those speeches. Perhaps I might ask her to read mine——

Ms. Clare Short: I read it again today.

Sir Reginald Eyre: —because I said that I believe that the event will contribute to job creation in Birmingham.

The hon. Lady rightly said that we do not want to turn all our attention to service industries, but that we want a revival of manufacturing. I share her view. There is no doubt that the future of manufacturing is enormously important to Birmingham. I remind her, however, that the city's competitiveness has improved this year as a result of a revised regional policy. The regional office has received many applications for grants to further the development of manufacturing industry and other businesses. Moreover, the Government recently approved British Leyland's corporate plan. We were extremely pleased in Birmingham, because that was another contribution to our future as a manufacturing city.

I ask the hon. Lady to bear those factors in mind. I agree that it is important to create jobs in manufacturing and to modernise that section of industry. The promotion of the motor industry by this international tourist event would be a gain for people involved with the motor industry in the city.

The project enjoyed overwhelming all-party support in the city council. In November, 90 members voted for it, 13 voted against and there were only five abstentions. As the hon. Lady knows, the Bill received a Second Reading by 202 votes to 68. The city council and supporters of the project hope and believe that the project will cover the capital and revenue costs and generate income which will improve the city's revenue and therefore services.

It is difficult for the House to debate such an assumption for the future, but the city council took much advice and considered the proposition very carefully. It was extremely carefully costed. The basis of the calculation is that, if the council goes for the expenditure of £1·5 million, perhaps over two years, it is likely that the city will receive the benefit of a profit of £1 million—a 40 per cent. return on a business investment. That would be a good return for the city and benefit everyone in the long term. Those are the best estimates we have upon which to base our judgment. I have considered them and thought seriously about the matter and believe that there is a good chance of the city making that profit. I support the Bill because I do not think that the cost will fall on ratepayers.

Ms. Clare Short: Later, I shall move two amendments that seek to secure that the council stays within those economic projections. Will the hon. Gentleman be supporting the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We should not anticipate debates on the amendments.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that I shall be able to show a positive response to the main thrust of the hon. Lady's argument. I look forward to considering the amendments. The hon. Lady will also find that stage of the debate helpful.

The Bill was amended in Committee to take account of observations by Government Departments, statutory undertakers, the county council and petitioners. All five petitions were withdrawn before the Committee stage, so the Bill was unopposed. The city takes full responsibility and will take great care to observe the points of detail that the Minister has raised.

There has been a misunderstanding about the position of the RAC. At Second Reading, the RAC opposed the Bill and motor racing on a street circuit. Following the vote on Second Reading, the chairman of the general purposes committee in Birmingham, Councillor Mrs. Brown, wrote to the chairman of the RAC, Mr. J. Rose, and made it clear that the city wished to work with the RAC to pursue the promotion of motor sport in Birmingham. In reply to Mrs. Brown on 22 May, Mr. Rose said that, having had its view rejected on Second Reading, the RAC would discontinue further opposition to the principle of the Bill and would receive and deal with any application for motor racing subsequent to the passage of the Act in accordance with the published regulations governing motor sport. I accept that that is the duty and responsibility of the chairman of the RAC.

I am happy to say that Mr. Rose offered a meeting at officer level, which was accepted by the city on 6 June. The RAC was represented by its general secretary, the motoring sports chief executive and the race executive. They made helpful suggestions and provided information about the necessary competition and track licences. All those matters are being followed up. I hope that the hon. Member for Ladywood will feel that that reveals a better situation.

The hon. Lady mentioned road surfaces. The city is having further consultations with the RAC—I am glad to say that, following Second Reading, a friendly relationship has been maintained with the RAC—and I am informed that, in the opinion of the RAC, the road surface in Birmingham is satisfactory for racing, especially in the light of experience at Monaco, where racing has not accelerated wear on the surface.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): The hon. Gentleman is being too modest about the RAC opinion. Apparently, the RAC believes that the surface of the proposed track in Birmingham is already of a higher specification than that at Monaco.

Sir Reginald Eyre: The hon. Gentleman makes a helpful point, which I believe to be accurate.

It would be much in the interests of our business if we could proceed soon to deal with the new clause in the name of the hon. Member for Ladywood, and the amendments tabled by the hon. Members for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). I am anxious to be able to show a positive attitude towards the points that they wish to raise.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), I wish to get on to the amendments as soon as possible, so I shall speak for only a few minutes. However, we must use this opportunity to discuss what is in the Bill following its Committee stage.

The hon. Member for Hall Green read out a list of people and organisations whose worries had been met, but he mentioned none of the anxieties expressed by myself and some of my hon. Friends when we discussed a number of instructions on Second Reading. I am still unhappy about the fact that the Bill contains no financial provisions. Not one sum of money is referred to.

[Mr. Jeff Rooker]

I mentioned in an intervention — it was a little underhanded, because I suspected that I was out of order when I was making it — that Birmingham faces a massive financial crises. No one can tell us that everything is financially and economically rosy in Birmingham.

On Second Reading, Conservative Members enthused over the municipal Socialism that the Bill represents, but since then the city council has announced a 43 per cent. rate increase and Conservative Members have subsequently spent their time slagging off the city council at every opportunity.

It is one thing to say that the rate increase is no fault of the city council or of the Government, but it is another to ask hon. Members to approve legislation that will result in an impost on Birmingham ratepayers — without mentioning the fact that Birmingham is in a financial crisis. I shall say more about that later, when I shall also repeat that I am still unhappy about the fact that no attempt has been made to secure the external financing which I believe could easily have been obtained.

Some ignorant comment has been made in Birmingham newspapers about my hon. Friends and myself. I take extreme exception to being classed as the sort of hooligan who caused a death at Birmingham city football ground —and merely because I seek to have every stage of the Bill debated. The hon. Member for Hall Green shakes his head, but the Birmingham Despatch said that my hon. Friends and I were like the hooligans at Birmingham city who caused the crowd trouble that led to the death of a football supporter. I take extreme exception to that, and I shall be most annoyed if Birmingham city council spends money advertising in the Birmingham Despatch. The paper made no attempt to speak to us about why we had to object to the Bill recently so that we could secure today's debate.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. We understand that some of our amendments may be accepted. The hon. Member for Hall Green talked about accepting the thrust of our amendments. We want more than that. We want amendments accepted here, not in another place. There is every reason to believe that financial amendments should be inserted here, not in the House of Lords.

I am glad that clause 21, with its code of practice, was added in Committee. It is only a pity that it was not in the original Bill. Nevertheless, I applaud the Committee and the promoters for their action.

Until about 10 days ago, the promoters and their agents had made no attempt since 1 April to contact my hon. Friends or myself to discuss detailed matters that we were worried about. Therefore, they cannot complain that we tabled amendments to the Bill only recently. We did not know until a few days ago that the Bill would be debated today, and it is no good the promoters saying that they cannot amend the Bill here and that amendments will have to be made in the other place. They knew what we were worried about, and the result was new clause 21.

This will be the only opportunity that I shall have to ask the promotors about clause 22, which was not amended or discussed in great detail in Committee. I do not understand why the city council should not have to obtain the permission of the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute a prosecution. The powers of prosecution that are sought are different from those that are contained in the legislation.

I hope that some of the amendments that are to be debated tonight will be accepted. Their acceptance would improve the Bill. I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). I am worried about the financial implications. If I can be satisfied about them, I shall not oppose the Bill, but we have not yet been convinced about the financial implications and they remain our greatest concern.

The amendments demonstrate that there are other worries. For example, a meeting is taking place now in Birmingham to decide whether or not to proceed with Birmingham's bid to stage the Olympics. I am not opposed to that bid. I have not been asked for my approval or disapproval. It is not a parliamentary matter. However, after the Olympics, Birmingham would be left with many physical assets.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: They would be liabilities.

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman says that they would be liabilities. I believe that they would be assets. Those assets would be used by the citizens of Birmingham. Furthermore, many new jobs would be created in order to provide those assets.

We are dealing here not with assets but with a peripheral tourist attraction. This event would take place once a year. The hon. Member for Hall Green made it sound so good financially that I wondered why this event is not to take place every three months. If it is to be such a sure-fire winner and a real money spinner, why not stage the event twice or three times a year? Such an event could be staged at bank holidays.

There remain doubts about whether it would be viable. I need to be convinced that the event will be financially successful. More information needs to be made available. The capital restrictions were not accepted by all members of the council. It was not a unanimous decision. Therefore, it is unreasonable to expect hon. Members to come to a unanimous decision. If councillors are so certain that this will be a money spinner that they wish no capital restrictions to be written into the Bill, there ought perhaps to be an amendment requiring them to make a contribution if a loss should be made. However, we have not gone that far.

We do not wish to be unreasonable. Those hon. Members who seek to impose financial control over the exercise have made compromises. Those compromises take the place of many amendments that we would have moved had we not been prepared to compromise. Having made compromises, during the evening we shall expect firm evidence, in the form of acceptance of certain of these amendments, that the promotors are also willing to make compromises.

Mr. Snape: Does my hon. Friend accept that if the financial projections of Birmingham city council prove to be correct, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) and his hon. Friends will be trooping through the Division Lobby to privatise the event within three years or so?

Mr. Rooker: That thought had not crossed my mind.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. Rooker: The idea had clearly not crossed the mind of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) who has just thanked my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) for giving him the idea.

If this project goes ahead, we wish it to be successful. Nobody wishes it to be a failure. However, it should be proceeded with only if there is sufficient evidence that it will be successful or if there is sufficient evidence that the private sector will be prepared to put its hand in its pocket to provide support. The private sector will benefit from it, as the hon. Member for Hall Green made clear on Second Reading.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): It is sad that this further bold venture from Birmingham has met with opposition — forgetting the interested parties representing other race tracks — from only three hon. Members with Birmingham constituencies. It is a pity that they all happen to be members of the Opposition, particularly as the city council — alas and alack Labour-controlled — is now in favour of the event. I do not doubt the motives of these hon. Members. It does not behove anybody in public life to doubt people's motives for opposing something and I know that the views of the three hon. Members are honourably held and have been honourably put forward.

However, as somebody who was involved in the local government life of the city of Birmingham for over 20 years, I have to say of some of the arguments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) that I remember hearing them loud and clear from those of faint heart who thought that instead of money being spent on one project or another it should have been spent on the repair and maintenance of tower blocks, expenditure which is of course necessary, or upon schools, expenditure which is also necessary. I do not doubt the heart of the hon. Member for Ladywood because she cares for her constituents and for the city, as do we all.

When we debated all those years ago the spending of a much greater sum of money on the National Exhibition Centre, to which project two Governments gave valiant support, the sum of money involved was much larger. It amounted to £26 million, and eventually the project cost £42 million. Harry Whatton, Frank Price, Sir Frank Griffin and I said that we should probably end up in the tower if it all went wrong. However, Birmingham and all other cities have to take risks with their ratepayers' money. Of course they have to think carefully before they risk that money, so to risk £40 million was a tremendous gamble.

A good case could have been made out for spending that money upon the infrastructure, roads and old people's homes, but the result of the venture was a new airport, a new international station, a new road link and new hotels, restaurants and jobs. It has resulted in new hope and in a new vision of what the city of Birmingham is. That was what was involved when we took that great decision on the Sunday morning when the contract was signed. Had the risk we then took gone wrong, heads would have rolled.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) rightly said, the reason for only modest representation from the political parties of Birmingham is that tonight they are considering another great venture, in which far larger sums of money are involved than was the case with the National Exhibition Centre. About £500 million will be involved if the Olympics are staged in Birmingham. Whether or not the Olympics come to Birmingham, and whether the city is controlled by a Conservative of Labour city council, the city moves best when it moves as a united team upon such ventures. I hope that if we can overcome the niggles we can move upon this venture. It may not be a great success, but I believe that Birmingham has a knack of making such things successful. The sum of money involved is small but it will attract business and people to Birmingham.

Rates have been mentioned but I do not wish to join in the controversy tonight about whether rates should have been increased. When we talk about the future of Birmingham we should not consider the problems of today but rather the direction we wish to see Birmingham take.

If one discounts rate rebates, those who pay rates will include business people large and small. They will pay for the future of our great city. It is correct to risk ratepayers' money to help people build a vision and create new hope for the city of Birmingham. It is not Government money, it is the people's money. That is why I am glad that the RAC, which I thought acted badly previously, though its motives may have been for the best, has relented and given us its support.

If one sets out on a venture one must believe that it will be successful; otherwise one would be wasting the time of the House and its servants on discussion. I believe that Birmingham is right. This is a good venture and once we have got over the niggles — the matter of half-price tickets for Birmingham citizens is not a crucial issue — and we can set at rest the genuine anxieties of hon. Members we can proceed with this or like ventures because, as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood said, Birmingham needs a lift.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) mentioned the BL plan which, last week, we all agreed was a huge uplift for the city of Birmingham and for the west midlands. We should not damage Birmingham's prospects by letting those who decide Birmingham's future think that we are disunited on this matter, the Olympics, or some future venture, as we were in the past on the NEC.

It is our city, and our future should be in our hands. If we can reach a united decision tonight, our bid for the Olympics might be looked upon more favourably because we act as a united Birmingham. Labour or Conservative control does not matter. The future of our city does. It is the future of Birmingham that matters, regardless of whether the Conservatives or Socialists control it. We should vote on this tonight as a united team.

8.3 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): During this debate the hon. Members for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) and for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) have said that the Bill would create jobs. Such arguments sound strange from the lips of hon. Members who support a Government who continually cut public expenditure. I accept that public expenditure creates jobs. My objection to the Bill is not that it involves public expenditure but that it involves expenditure on a motor race instead of more worthwhile projects. Those hon. Gentlemen speak of the expenditure of £1·5 million of capital allocation on a motor race and support it on the grounds that it will create jobs. I am amazed that we have heard nothing from them at any time about the reduction of £40 million in capital allocation to the city of Birmingham this year. That money would have created far more jobs than a motor race.

It is clear that the hon. Member for Hall Green does not know how many jobs would be created by the motor race. I can tell him because I raised the point with Councillor Marjorie Brown, the chairman of the general purposes committee. She told me that the expenditure would only create "up to 20 jobs". In fact she said that the clerical work to be done would involve up to 20 extra members of staff for the city council.

The issue is not whether public expenditure does or does not create jobs. I argue consistently in all economic debates that it does create jobs.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I take the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. If the event is held and attracts the flow of visitors and the expenditure that has been taken account of, all that activity creates the prospect of further employment in a wider sector.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman has taken my bait. I raised that point with Councillor Brown and she could give me no estimate—I was willing to accept any rough estimate or guesstimate—of how many jobs the city council thought would be created as a spin-off from the motor race. I would not have argued. I just wanted a figure. There would be jobs. Some of them would be temporary such as selling programmes and hot dogs. Some of them might last longer than the weekend and be in hotels and restaurants. Of course there would be some extra jobs. But the answer was that the council did not know and the Bill's promoters do not know how many jobs will be created by the activities to which the hon. Member for Hall Green drew our attention.

I am not opposed to the creation of jobs. On the contrary, I argue for that in all our debates in all contexts, unlike the hon. Members for Hall Green and for Selly Oak. I accept that some jobs will be created and that some profits will be made at the same time. That is why some of the businesses in Birmingham want the Bill. They want public expenditure so that they have the opportunity for private profit.

The point is not whether we spend £1·5 million; it is whether we spend it on a motor race in preference to other activities, or projects. That is the point. Capital expenditure creates jobs. It is not only the motor race. Other forms of capital expenditure also create jobs. I am not arguing for a reduction of £1·5 million in the council's expenditure. I am arguing and I have consistently argued for that £1·5 million to be spent on other things.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am happy to be another fish and to accept the hon. Gentleman's bait. We can, of course make out a long shopping list of things on which to spend money. As I hope I said, to spend £1 million on infrastructure or repairs may create more jobs than this project. Which does the hon. Gentleman think will attract more and better publicity for the city of Birmingham and attract people and make them believe that Birmingham is a go-ahead city? Does he think that people would be inclined to give us greater publicity for having a good and successful race or for £1 million spent upon sewerage, although the one may be essential? Do we not sometimes have to raise our minds from the temporary for the greater good in the longer term?

Mr. Davis: I accept the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument. We shall be using that word a great deal this evening. That is why I am favourably disposed towards a Birmingham bid for the Olympics. I think that that would do a great deal for Birmingham. But I should prefer people to take away a better image of Birmingham as a result of the expenditure of £1·5 million on some projects that I shall mention later instead of a motor race. I believe that they would have a better image of Birmingham if the money were spent on these projects rather than on a motor race.

The fact that tower blocks are fenced off because of the danger of blocks of concrete falling on people and the fact that Birmingham contains many Smith houses which are crumbling round the ears of the people living in them because the city council has no money to do anything about these problems do not do Birmingham's image much good.

Ms. Clare Short: What would be the impact on Birmingham's image if a foreign tourist went past one of these tower blocks, a lump of masonry fell on his head and he was severely injured?

Mr. Davis: Of course that would be a disaster. I do not think that it is likely to happen, because the council has fenced off many of these tower blocks.

The hon. Member for Hall Green argued that the race would be self-financing. I do not believe that he appreciated the force and strength of our belief in priorities. For the purposes of this debate, I shall accept the figures that have been cited by the city council. This is an argument not about whether the race is self-financing but about the items on which the city council should spend money under the capital allocation. The Minister of State also argued that the race would be self-financing. I do not believe that she has understood the point that it is capital expenditure. It is not a case of spending the people's money, as the hon. Member for Selly Oak put it. The money will be borrowed; it will not be raised from the rates as revenue expenditure.

For what should the city council borrow the money? On what should the council spend it? According to my understanding of the way in which capital expenditure works, the Government restrict the amount of money—they call it an allocation—that the city council can spend on capital expenditure. The Government leave it to the council to decide on what that money is spent, but they control the amount borrowed and the amount that the council can use from its capital receipts. The Government therefore restrict Birmingham's total capital expenditure.

In a letter to me, the chairman of the general purposes committee of the city of Birmingham said:

"you are quite right in saying that this will come from capital allocations — although the phasing of the expenditure by financial year is still uncertain."

The city treasurer confirmed this in a note circulated to other hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell). He said:

"Since total local authority spending on land, buildings, roads etc. is controlled by the Government, by spending allocations and restrictions on the use of capital receipts, the initial road alterations and setting up costs would count against City spending limits and would utilise resources which otherwise could be spent on other City services."

Let there be no misunderstanding: it is a question not of the total amount of capital expenditure but of priorities.

In January, hon. Members received a letter from Councillor Dick Knowles, the leader of the city council. His letter complained about the Government's restrictions on Birmingham's capital expenditure. He attached a briefing note that had been prepared by the city treasurer and mentioned all the items — some of which were mentioned by the hon. Member for Selly Oak — on which the city council would not be able to spend as much as it needed in the coming year. These vital items included council house building, even for the elderly and disabled; structural repairs to dangerous high-rise blocks which were being fenced off; improvement grants; work to replace inadequate outside school toilets and essential fire precautions work. That is not my shopping list; it is a list of items that will be in jeopardy because of the Government's restrictions. That is why I and my hon. Friends, especially my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) object to the Bill.

The Minister of State says that it is up to Birmingham city council to decide its priorities, but we are being asked to endorse them by our votes. That is why we are entitled to object. My hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr put his finger on the central point when he said that money was our greatest concern. Our sense of priorities differs from that of the hon. Member for Selly Oak. That is not surprising. It is one reason why we are in different political parties. We want the money to be spent on those items to which I referred.

This morning, I received a letter from the city council and this afternoon I had discussions with a council officer. I have not been able to consult my colleagues because these events have taken place during the past few hours. The city treasurer's department has now come up with an ingenious scheme. It does not contain everything we have requested. It will still involve the city council using £1·5 million of its capital expenditure allocation for the motor race. The scheme does, however, go a long way towards meeting our objection on the ground of priorities. Our objection concerned the once-and-for-all use of that money for a motor race. However great the profit, it cannot be used for capital expenditure. The scheme proposed by the city treasurer's department would enable us to meet the priorities about which my hon. Friends and I have such strong feelings. The arrangements proposed by the council are much closer to us than the council's previous position, and it has been made clear to me that these proposals at the eleventh hour are the direct result of our refusal to allow the Bill to pass on the nod and of our meeting with the leader of the city council last Thursday afternoon. I urge my colleagues to accept the council's serious effort to meet our objection on capital expenditure priorities.

That still leaves several defects in the Bill, which are covered by the amendments that we have tabled on many aspects, including finance. We shall want to press those amendments to debate and possibly to a Division if they are not accepted by the hon. Member for Hall Green.

The hon. Member for Hall Green said that he accepted the thrust of some amendments and referred especially to some of mine. As my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr pointed out, the hon. Gentleman will have to do much more than that. For example, he will have to find a way of accommodating amendment No. 4, which has not been selected for debate. As drafted, the Bill says that the city council will liaise with Birmingham district health authority, but there is no such body. There are five district health authorities in Birmingham, and none of them runs the ambulance service, which is one of the aspects on which there is supposed to be liaison. I suggest that my amendment, which refers to the West Midlands regional health authority, is an essential amendment if this is to be sensible legislation. My amendment has not been accepted by Mr. Speaker for technical reasons, which I understand. The hon. Member for Hall Green should find a way of amending the Bill, perhaps in the other place. The trouble is that, because the Bill is badly drafted, it will have to be amended in the other place and return to the House of Commons to enable hon. Members to consider the amendments.

Mr. Rooker: The technicalities of private legislation differ from those of public legislation. Is the reason why my hon. Friend's amendment was not selected the fact that he could not show evidence that he had consulted Birmingham district health authority, to which he was referring? I freely admit that I did not consult the Birmingham Despatch. That was a quid pro quo. How could my hon. Friend consult Birmingham district health authority? If this is the difference between the two sides of the House, surely a manuscript amendment or a change in Mr. Speaker's decision would accommodate my hon. Friend's wishes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Hon. Members are getting a little wide of the debate. I realise that the House wishes to discuss whether the Bill should be now considered. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has begun to refer to an amendment that has not been selected. I am sure that he appreciates that it would not be appropriate to discuss that amendment. I am wondering whether the House wishes to move on fairly soon to the amendments that have been selected.

Mr. Davis: We are discussing whether we should consider a Bill that is defective. From the expression on the face of the hon. Member for Hall Green, I think that he has had urgent discussions with the city council as a result of my amendment and others. He has learned that there is a defect in the Bill. It is a pity that it was not put right before.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Hall Green will rise to suggest that we should now defer consideration of the Bill to enable us to amend it properly in the House of Commons. I am not putting words into the hon. Gentleman's mouth, but that is the point that I was seeking to make.

Clearly we shall consider the Bill this evening because the hon. Gentleman has not risen to his feet. We shall consider a defective Bill that will have to be amended in the other place and will have to come back to the House of Commons.

Meanwhile, we shall seek to amend the Bill to enable it to go forward as a much more sensible Bill than it would have been if we had not objected to its passage on the nod a fortnight ago.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): I was not able to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on Second Reading. I am surprised that so many of my hon. Friends are still so keen on the municipal as opposed to the private sector being involved in the race.

[Mr. David Ashby]

Many of my constituents are ratepayers of the city of Birmingham. Some are in the unfortunate position of being ratepayers who do not have a vote — in the business and commercial sector. They are very concerned about the Bill. Therefore, there are some matters that I wish to raise at this stage in the hope that something can be done and that some consideration will be given to those points.

Before I refer to those matters, I should like to say something about the RAC, of which much mention has been made, because I have spoken to its representatives on many occasions about the Bill. Their position may have been misrepresented unwittingly. As we know, they were opposed to the idea of a road race on public roads. They were very concerned about the precedent and about races taking money from the private sector, where a great deal of capital had already been spent. On the other hand, as very good servants of this country and as people who watch carefully what happens in Parliament, and bearing in mind Second Reading, they realised that they should co-operate and enforce the rules and regulations to the best of their ability. To say that they are in favour is being unfair to them. They are not. The RAC is the governing body of motor sport, and it is therefore beholden to the sport, the country and the views of Parliament, and to do its best in a situation in which they disagree. I know that the RAC has been co-operating and that it will continue to do so. However, I wanted to put that matter straight.

A few points cause me a great deal of concern. The first concerns clause 5, on the restriction of traffic. The proposed route for the race covers 2·5 miles, involving parts of 45 roads bounded by a mixture of commercial and industrial and residential premises. The Bill empowers the council to close off the roads and to restrict access to any part of them between 9 am and 6 pm on the day of and the day preceding the race. That could create havoc for some commercial premises to which goods must be delivered and received.

We appreciate that trade and commerce do not grind to a halt just because of a bank holiday in England, especially as bank holidays abroad do not necessarily coincide with our bank holidays. Therefore, the powers of access granted in the Bill are not sufficient, especially considering the inconvenience of even setting up the barriers and taking them down, apart from inconvenience during the race itself.

We must appreciate that the race is to take place not on a field miles from anywhere, but in the commercial heartland. I am disappointed about that aspect of the Bill. I hope that if it goes to the other place, further consideration will be given to the point that I have raised.

The other points that I should like to raise are more fundamental and go to the heart of much that I have spoken about and believe. Clause 16 deals with damage to property. The Bill provides that entitlement to damages from street closure or barrier erection is to be calculated under provisions laid down in the Land Compensation Act 1961. Under that Act, disputed claims for compensation go to the land tribunal rather than directly to the courts. That is something like a court of law. But in such cases, should not any disputes go directly to the High Court, especially since they may involve both physical loss and commercial financial loss of large sums of money? In the eyes of the public, such a crucial case would be accredited with greater legitimacy if it was heard in the High Court. Why should a business action for tort not be available? Why should this procedure supplant a business action for tort?

The Bill states that damage claims must be assessed in the light of any gain to the plaintiff that the holding or the prospect of holding a motor race would give. Who will decide who gains or what those gains are? That is an unfair penalty on business interests. We must appreciate that under the Bill there will be confiscation of property rights for a time, possibly without adequate compensation.

There is another aspect that we must consider—the duration of validity for damage claims, which comes under clause 16(5). The clause provides that a period of only 12 months elapses before any claim for compensation falls. That is absolutely ridiculous. Why should Birmingham arrogantly give itself preferential treatment? After all, the limitation period in any other business is a good deal longer. It is six years. Why should Birmingham have 12 months? We must consider why it is six years. In certain trade and international commercial circles 12 months would be an insufficient time to make any assessment of the true extent of the damage incurred. That is a very important point. It is absolutely fundamental.

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman is making a meal of the matter. I do not like the way in which he is attacking Birmingham. Surely the reason is obvious. Birmingham wants to get the claims for one race out of the way and legally settled before the second race. That makes sense. Otherwise, it would be impossible to administer.

Mr. Ashby: One will not know whether the race has been run at a loss or a profit until one has got the claims out of the way. That may well be the point. That may be the reason for 12 months. After all, a substantial claim could turn a profit into a loss—perhaps a substantial loss. However, not only commercial interests but residents are involved. Why should those people be in a different legal position from the rest of the country? Why should they not have the same legal rights as the rest of the country? Why can they not go to the same courts, have the same limitation period, and make the same claims as the ordinary person?

Sir Reginald Eyre: With respect, I think that my hon. Friend has not taken full account of the deliberations of the Committee. Special provisions with regard to liability affecting Birmingham were made, which took it into a special category, part of which my hon. Friend mentioned. But the total balance is very much in favour of anyone who is injured. I think that that was a proper liability to place upon the corporation in these circumstances. It will, of course, be met by insurance. I think that, under the total scheme, the balance of advantage is with the person injured.

Mr. Ashby: I have not seen that. Why should Birmingham be given such preferential treatment in the courts above and beyond everyone else? The courts exist to protect ordinary citizens, and every citizen should have the right to go to court. I hope that my points will be given thought elsewhere because the position is alarming and goes far beyond the Birmingham City Council Bill.

I find another aspect equally alarming. Clause 5(7) allows the police to arrest any individual found without reasonable excuse in any street closed for the event. Under the Bill the police will have the defence of taking all reasonable precautions. The Bill creates an offence, and I can see the scenario that will develop. A person with important commercial interests who requires to reach his premises will be refused access by a police officer. That person will say, "I must pass through. I have an important item to deliver to the premises." That may happen not on the bank holiday, but on the preceding day or one of the other days when the streets are closed. Then the poor fellow will be arrested, taken before the courts and fined. Only a fine is permissible under this clause. He will be extremely angry because he will have been denied access to his premises to carry out his business. He may refuse to pay—many people refuse to pay fines—and he will then be sentenced to 14 days imprisonment. That is the scenario that will arise because fundamental rights are denied under the Bill. That is a serious aspect, and it must be considered. A new offence is being created.

Equally alarming is clause 12, which deals with the compulsory purchase of land rights. The Bill gives Birmingham city council draconian powers to acquire property rights on specific land for three days before and after the day of the event, if agreement cannot be reached with the owner. I have spent most of my political life fighting against compulsory powers and for the rights of the individual. This clause fills me with horror. We are taking property rights away from the individual. There is no appeal, because this is a compulsory acquisition of property rights. In other similar cases there have been inquiries. An independent inspector has to listen to both sides and make up his mind whether the powers that have been sought are good or bad, sensible or nonsensical. After that, the matter goes to the Minister for his agreement. That happens in every other case of compulsory acquisition of land rights. However, there is no provision for that in the Bill. The powers are draconian. No other body has them in peacetime. I can imagine those powers being made available in wartime regulations, but not in peacetime.

It is monstrous that Birmingham should be given these added powers, that there should be no appeal, no independent inquiry and no safeguard for the individual. The Bill removes individuals' rights substantially in the name of a jolly good day's entertainment on the municipal rates, and without regard to the people who will be affected by the race being staged on their roads. The very people affected are having their rights taken from them. I hope that my points will be considered, because they are vital.

8.35 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I wish to refer in particular to the speech by the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby). At the beginning of his speech I wondered how many of the hon. Gentleman's constituents either live or work in Birmingham.

Mr. Ashby: One thousand.

Mr. Snape: I heard him when he mentioned it in his speech. He has spoken for 15 minutes and I hope that he does not wish to speak again now.

Like most of my hon. Friends, I see no particular reason why people who live in north-west Leicestershire should vote in council elections in Birmingham.

Mr. Ashby: They do not.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman keeps re-emphasising points to which I listened. I am well aware that his constituents do not vote in Birmingham council elections. My point is that I see no reason why they should. It is difficult for me to speak because I am a non-Birmingham Member of Parliament. However, I can claim to be a Birmingham ratepayer and, therefore, I have some direct interest in how my money is spent. Regrettably, I am not yet represented by any of my hon. Friends, but I hope that some time in the future I shall be.

Mr. Terry Davis: Who did my hon. Friend vote for?

Mr. Snape: Regrettably, I was not in Birmingham during the general election, but I promise to vote Labour next time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) pointed out the inconvenience that her constituents will suffer if the road race goes ahead. I, too, have many constituents who live in tower blocks and who, like her constituents, wish to leave them as quickly as possible. Although I do not know my hon. Friend's constituency as well as she does, I hope that she will accept that I know a little about it. This morning I passed through part of it, and I hope that she will agree that the environment of her constituents with the present road traffic using the roads on which it is proposed to run the race is hardly the best in the country. I put it no higher than that. Perhaps she could tell the House what her constituents' views would be about the difference between the non-stop stream of heavy goods vehicles which pass through the centre of Birmingham at present on these roads, and the road vehicles that will pass down those roads if the Bill is accepted. I would not have thought that the intrusive aspect of a road race would be much greater than the nightmare that most of them must put up with at present.

Ms. Clare Short: We are told by an expert report that the noise from the road race will at times be deafening, but brief. Obviously, that is much more intrusive than normal heavy traffic during the day. However, that was not my major point. It was that the money that is being spent on the road race could be spent on desperately needed repairs to the tower blocks that surround the racing circuit.

Mr. Snape: I realise that. My hon. Friend will, however, acknowledge that £1,500,000 will not go far towards those much-needed repairs. As the Member of Parliament who represents the constituency adjacent to my hon. Friend, although outside the city of Birmingham, I [illegible] that if millions of pounds are flying around, some will be allocated to my constituency. The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) is central to our debate. I speak only for myself when I say that I would find difficulty in, on the one hand, waging a political battle for greater local government autonomy, and on the other telling an elected city council whether it can spend a small proportion of its overall budget. I was a member of a local authority, as were many of my hon. Friends, and for some time I was chairman of the finance committee. The allocation of finance and the division of any council's resources is often a hot political potato. Indeed, sometimes it is a hotter political potato among members of the same party than it is in a council where all the political parties are represented. When I did that job, I would not have wanted the House to decide those financial priorities for me.

[Mr. Snape]

The Labour party has waged the battle that it has on the Local Government Bill because the Government wish to centralise the decisions of local authorities. Again, I stress that I speak personally, but I support the right of Birmingham city council to decide its priorities. I represent a constituency adjacent to Birmingham and within the borough of Sandwell, and I can tell the House that such arguments and controversies are nothing new in my borough. We run an annual historic vehicle parade for which it is necessary to close some roads. The parade was started by two people about seven years ago, but because it was so successful, Sandwell council became directly involved and now contributes financially to the project. During the years, there has been some criticism within the borough and on the council about spending money in that way.

I have another interest to declare, in that it is extremely worrying that each time I see the historic vehicle parade, I realise that I used to travel on most of the buses on parade. The allocation of a small part of the council's resources often causes controversy in the borough. I do not always agree with the council's decisions, but I believe that the allocation of resources is better left——

Mr. Terry Davis rose——

Mr. Rooker rose——

Mr. Snape: I cannot give way to both my hon. Friends. Perhaps they can decide between themselves who will cast the first stone. The allocation of those resources should be left to the local council. That is why, on the previous occasion when this Bill was before the House, I could not support my hon. Friends.

Mr. Terry Davis: My hon. Friend has made it clear that he is speaking for himself. However, does he understand that there is a difference? Here we are being asked to vote on the priorities because we must vote on a Bill. It is not a case of leaving the decision to the council. We are being asked to endorse or vote against its priorities. I must tell my hon. Friend that four of the six Birmingham, Labour Members of Parliament do not regard themselves as rubber stamps for the council.

Mr. Snape: Of course I accept that. However, I should point out that the Government are seeking a change in the law because they do not believe in the autonomy of local government.

Mr. Davis: It is not the same thing.

Mr. Snape: It is exactly the same thing. Of course, four of the six Birmingham Labour Members of Parliament must make up their minds and vote accordingly on this Bill, as on any legislation. I make no complaint about that.

However, the city council recently commissioned an eminently reputable organisation—Market and Opinion Research International, which the Labour party uses for its opinion polls—to conduct an opinion poll into what people thought about decision-making at local level, the accountancy procedures of the council and the way in which their money is spent. The result of the poll will bring no comfort to Conservative Members, who troop continually through the Lobby to restrict the powers of local authority expenditure. The poll states:

"Even among those who believe the Council, not the Government, is more to blame for rate rises"— that is a very small proportion of the citizens of Birmingham—

"over twice as many say the Council (62 per cent.) rather than the Government (28 per cent.) should be mainly responsible for how much the Council spends."

The people were not asked whether the Opposition should play a part in decision-making. The result shows that the ratepayers of Birmingham, regardless of their political affiliations, believe that those decisions are best made at city council level. I agree with them.

Mr. Rooker: I should be interested to see that document, because none of us has received it. I do not know why that should be so. Perhaps the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) has a copy. Does my hon. Friend believe that it should be a matter of local government choice to have racing on the public highway? That is what the Bill is about. If it was possible for a council to decide to close the highways and to have racing on them, they would not need a Bill. No one is arguing about the priorities of choice among the heads of expenditure within the competence of the city council. It is not within the competence of Birmingham city council to close the public highway for racing. That is why it must come to the House for permission. That is why we are asking some questions about the financial arrangements. There is nothing wrong with that, and I cannot understand why my hon. Friend has this holier-than-thou attitude on this matter. We are not attacking local democracy. It is simply not within the competence of Birmingham city council to do as it wishes in this respect.

Mr. Snape: I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would not shout at me, because that does make a valid point better. If we cannot conduct this debate without going for each other's throats, at least verbally, we are in a bad way.

As to my hon. Friend's first point, I do not know how the document was distributed. I received it only today, and I have no idea whether other hon. Members received copies. It is entitled, "Residents' attitudes to Birmingham city council", and it is a research study conducted for the council by MORI.

Mr. Rooker: Where did my hon. Friend get the document from?

Mr. Snape: I got it from the city council today. I thought that I had made that plain. My hon. Friend, who is a fellow ratepayer in Birmingham, is welcome to take the document with him at the end of the debate. There is no reason why it should be kept secret and, as far as I am aware, it has not been.

Mr. Rooker: I have never heard of it.

Mr. Snape: I do not wish to labour the point. There is the document; if my hon. Friend wishes to read it, he can take it with him at the end of the debate.

My hon. Friend's second point was that the controversy is about road closures rather than financial matters, but that is not what my hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill said. I do not complain about what he said, but he and my hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood both said that this is a question of financial priorities and that, rather than spend £1·5 million on a road race, they could find—we all could—better purposes for the expenditure than the city council has chosen. That is a different point from the one made by my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr.

Mr. Rooker: Will my hon. Friend give way so that I can clarify this point?

Mr. Snape: No. We shall come to the amendments in a moment or two, and no doubt my hon. Friend will wish to speak again. My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood refused to give way to me twice the last time we debated the matter.

Ms. Clare Short: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Snape: No. We shall reach my hon. Friend's amendments in due course. One of the amendments concerns half-price tickets for those wishing to watch the race. I shall vote against that proposal because it is unfair. I shall directly benefit from such a provision, but others will have to pay twice as much to watch the race.

I do not know whether the city council is right in its suggestion on the tourist aspect. The council must make its own decision. I find some contributions by my hon. Friends vaguely off-putting because they claim to be concerned about the future economy of the city. When one considers what has happened to that economy in the last six years it is ridiculous to suggest that the scheme could go even a fraction of the way to replace the jobs lost in manufacturing industry in Birmingham and the black country. Any impact that the scheme could have on the economies of Birmingham and the surrounding area is at best marginal. It might even cost money.

My hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr was anxious to persuade members of the local authority to stand the financial loss if that were necessary. However, he has said that that is unacceptable to the city council and that therefore he would not proceed with that suggestion.

We are talking about a decision by a majority on the city council. That is not good enough, although I know that some of my hon. Friends do not agree with me. The Bill received an overwhelming majority on Second Reading. That leads me to believe that I should support the Bill as I did then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind hon. Members that there are five amendments and that time is short.

8.52 pm

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): I shall take note of your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and my remarks will be brief.

Throughout the Bill's consideration two important features have been prominent. The first is the closing of roads, and the second the financial structure relating to the rates. I represent not a Birmingham constituency but a constituency in the heart of the black country. I am able to tell the House that there is a tremendous amount of support for the Bill in the black country. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is in the same position as I am, in that we are not contributors to the area in rateable terms, but we both support the event.

The closing of roads takes place in all areas for all sorts of reasons, particularly in the summer. The contribution of my hon. Friend for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) was saturated with wisdom. He gave us the vision of what happened some years ago when Birmingham's city fathers took the decision about the national exhibition centre. I spent three years involved in the construction of the NEC and the buildings attached to it. It is a jewel in the crown of the west midlands. I believe that the events that we are debating tonight will be another jewel in the crown.

I am prompted to say that because another city has roads which are closed once a year. They are closed so that a race might take place. If one asked the people of Liverpool, "Why do you close the roads?", they would say "Because we are able to have an international event which is well renowned. You can speak to people throughout the world and mention Melling road and they know what you mean."

Ms. Clare Short: What is it?

Dr. Blackburn: It is not up to me to educate the House. Because roads are closed by Act of Parliament, the Grand National steeplechase can take place at Aintree. That is a tremendous source of income for Liverpool. Equally, this evening represents an historic occasion. Closing roads in Birmingham will have the same historic success, and I wish the Bill godspeed.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered.

New Clause 1

DURATION OF ACT

'(1) The powers of this Act shall cease to have effect if the profit income to the City from the road race does not exceed the annual revenue and capital repayment costs by 1991.

(2) Separate accounts shall be published each year on the exercise of powers under this Act'.—[Ms. Clare Short.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

8.54 pm

Ms. Clare Short: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss the following amendments: No. 7, in clause 4, page 5, line 24, at end add—

'(3) The powers of this Section shall be exercised after the Council has arranged external financial sponsorship to cover its capital expenditure involved in providing motor races.'

No. 16, in clause 9, page 8, line 39, at end insert—

'(3) The powers of this section and section 4 shall not be exercised if the capital expenditure to be incurred in 1986 exceeds £1,700,000'.

Ms. Clare Short: The purpose of the new clause is to hold the council to the financial projections that it continues to put before us to justify the road race. We are in a quandary because, whenever we ask how the finances will work, we are given a set of figures which show that £1·5 million capital expenditure will be involved initially, that £1·5 million revenue expenditure will be involved each year that the race is run and that the returns for the city will at best be £2·5 million and at worst will cover costs. Nothing in the Bill holds the city council to those projections. It will be possible for the council to spend considerably more and to receive considerably less, and never have to do anything about it.

As I said during the speech by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), at a meeting recently with the leader of the city council, one of the officials argued that even if the road race were not profitable it might be desirable for the city because a road race might make Birmingham as famous as Indianapolis. That was an extraordinary comparison. I know nothing about Indianapolis except its name. Birmingham is Britain's second city and the place where the industrial revolution began. It can already claim more fame and glory than Indianapolis.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does not the hon. Lady think that there is something vaguely insulting in suggesting that the city of Birmingham — which manages to handle hundreds of millions of pounds of expenditure each year and look after, as is its duty, more than 1 million people — really needs this House to act as a nanny and tie down the city to a sum of money? Would it not be better for it to decide for itself? Does this House think that it can take Birmingham's place and do its job for it?

Ms. Clare Short: It is extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman belonging to the Conservative party, has the cheek to stand up and say that. Since 1979 we have lived with his party constantly taking away financial powers from local authorities and tying them down in the way in which they can spend money.

Mr. Terry Davis: I have visited Indianapolis and I would not want to live there.

Ms. Clare Short: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

There are two views. It is not simply a matter of trying to tie down the city of Birmingham on how much it can spend on a road race. Underlying the amendment is a policy decision on whether it is worth while Birmingham having a road race that does not cover its costs.

The purpose of the new clause is to require the city to cover its costs, but to give it five years to do so. It should be acceptable to anyone other than those who, like that official, want to argue that the road race is worth while in any event. It is a fairly low level race. The number of international visitors who will go to Birmingham to attend the race has been exaggerated and will be nothing like the number that would be attracted to the grand prix that Birmingham thinks it will get but will not get. It is an entirely reasonable clause. Indeed, yesterday I received a letter from the leader of the city council intimating that it might be acceptable. I do not doubt that the hon. Member for Hall Green will give us a detailed account of the city council's attitude to it. I shall listen to him with considerable interest. As matters stand, I shall seek a vote on it.

The second part of the new clause seeks information for the people of Birmingham on the amount of money involved each year—the cost of the race and the money being returned — which will enable them to exercise their democratic rights through local elections and in discussions and to determine whether the road race is costing them money or bringing money to the city.

Amendment No. 16 is a different amendment with a similar purpose. It refers specifically to capital expenditure. In the estimates that we have been given, the city council says that there will be an initial capital expenditure of £1·5 million and thereafter £1·5 million revenue every time that the race is run. As my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) made clear, capital expenditure in Birmingham is very short because of the limitations that the Government have imposed on the right of Birmingham to spend capital. Therefore, if expenditure of £1·5 million is made on the road race, that £1·5 million cannot be spent elsewhere. The amendment seeks to hold the council to its projections. If it believes in its figures, both of our proposals should be acceptable. The amendment would require the council to spend no more in initial capital than £1·7 million in 1986. Therefore, it cannot claim that inflation has speeded up — which it has — and that £1·5 million is no longer realistic.

I hope that both proposals will be acceptable to the promoter of the Bill. I make it clear that, unless undertakings are given, I intend to push both of them to a vote.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) for the forthright way in which she moved the amendments. I appreciate the underlying principle that both she and the hon. Members for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) have advanced in asking for detailed study and consideration of the point encompassed in both amendments.

In principle, a requirement that the race would not continue — that is, that the powers to operate the race would cease — if the event could not be staged without incurring annual losses, is accepted. The city council would not want to continue running the race if it had to require support from the ratepayers each year.

However, the wording of the appropriate legislation needs to be carefully considered to achieve that objective. I can illustrate the drafting difficulty by pointing out that the words "profit income" do not represent a precise accounting phrase. The intention is to introduce an amendment in another place to deal fully with the principle of the new clause.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) asked whether we could make any necessary amendments in this House. I understand that it is not procedurally possible at this stage to do that. In any case, it is necessary to arrive at the precise form of words to meet the principle of the amendment. On that basis, I ask Opposition Members to accept my assurance that a suitable amendment will be introduced in another place.

Mr. Terry Davis: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman is making great efforts to meet the arguments that my hon. Friends and I have adduced. Why is it not procedurally possible to amend the Bill in this House?

Sir Reginald Eyre: I am not fully acquainted with all the mysteries of the procedural difficulties that apply in Parliament. I understand that if we were to seek to make the change now, a manuscript amendment would be necessary and that there would not be time to incorporate the points made by the hon. Member for Ladywood in a suitable form of words. I am giving an undertaking of equivalent value in that such an amendment will be introduced in another place. I give that undertaking on behalf of the city council.

Mr. Rooker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the undertaking that he has given. However, the promoters are, in charge of the Bill. It is their measure and they are paying for it. Indeed, they have probably paid the legal profession a fortune to get it this far. The promoters are therefore entitled to promote any amendment that they wish and to do so at any stage of the Bill. I feel sure that if those with the expensive and expert advice necessary to frame such an amendment were to do that and present to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) a manuscript amendment, and he sought approval to put it before the House, the matter could be settled here and now.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's impatience to settle the matter promptly. He will know that I am not in charge of the detailed professional handling of the Bill. I am faced with the technical fact that while I am able to accept the principle of the amendment, consideration must be given to it so that a suitable form of words, from the accounting and legal point of view, may be devised. I cannot introduce such an amendment at this stage. It is with complete honesty that I am trying to ensure that the amendment is achieved in a correct form. I ask the hon. Member for Ladywood and her hon. Friends to accept my assurance.

Ms. Clare Short: I accept the hon. Gentleman's assurances and I am grateful for them. It would be generous if he were to agree not to oppose the new clause and, if it needs correction, to correct it when it goes to another place.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I have had much experience of piloting legislation through the House. I have given an undertaking without reservation on behalf of Birmingham city council. I hope that the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends will be kind enough to accept it. I assure her that no damage will be done to her argument and that the result will be exactly the one that she wants to secure.

Amendment No. 16 raises more difficult issues. It is directed to the proposed limit on initial capital expenditure. The new clause seeks to introduce a requirement that the race should be conducted for a specified period — five years — without loss and amendment No. 16 seeks to provide a more limited time. Birmingham city council is not able to accept the amendment. The city is confident that the costs can be kept within a proper ceiling but there could be an unforeseen additional cost. For example, road surfaces could be displaced and urgent expenditure would be required to put the road in a satisfactory condition within the required time. Such an unforeseen additional cost would mean that the race could not proceed. The amendment includes a certain figure and the item of unforeseen expenditure could take the city only slightly over that limit. If the need for such expenditure were to arise at the last minute and to cause the capital limit to be breached, the race would have to be cancelled and the city could incur huge compensation payments that would be far in excess of the additional capital spending required.

After earnest discussion, and with a great desire to meet the arguments that are being raised by the hon. Member for Ladywood and her hon. Friends, Birmingham city council cannot commit itself to cancel the race if there were to be some slight extra expenditure beyond its control which would affect annual expenditure. The council has no reason to believe that costs will escalate and, indeed, it is sure that they can be contained.

The hon. Member for Ladywood has referred to annual accounts. As I said on Second Reading, the annual accounts must make clear exactly what the position is in respect of the race. The hon. Lady's argument will be met by the provisions that turn on five-yearly expenditure and by annual accounting. For the reasons that I have offered, the council cannot accept a limitation on expenditure each year. However, it believes that it will be able to ensure that it keeps within its planned expenditure.

Mr. Terry Davis: The hon. Gentleman may be confusing new clause 1 and amendment No. 16. In his earlier response, he referred to the annual expenditure and the problems that might be created if there were a limit on the annual expenditure. At that point he was referring to amendment No. 16. The amendment is concerned only with capital expenditure, which is by definition once-for-all-expenditure. I think there was confusion there in the hon. Gentleman's mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) would not wish to be so inflexible as not to provide for the possibility of some unforeseen capital item taking the cost above the limit which she has suggested, but the limit that my hon. Friend has suggested seems to be the council's own estimate of £1·5 million, adjusted for inflation. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there is nothing in that estimate for contingencies?

Sir Reginald Eyre: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hodge Hill, who has clarified a possible misunderstanding arising from what I said earlier. He is right in saying that amendment No. 16 relates to the initial capital expenditure, which, as we know, has been said to be £750,000 a year for two years, totalling £1·5 million.

I suppose that it would be difficult to ask any councillor or any public body to say that it had taken complete account of the possible inflationary consequences in any transaction over the period in question, but the council believes that it can ensure that the costs are contained. I think we would all want to say that some account must be taken of inflation. The latest estimates are that the rate of inflation will be falling again towards the end of this year. We all know the difficulties where inflation is governed by world trading and financial circumstances. Therefore, although I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, I do not think that the council can commit itself to meet his point completely.

I am trying to emphasise to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Lady that, with regard to the initial capital expenditure spread over two years, the council can ensure that it will be kept within the limit estimated. It accepts the point that the hon. Lady has emphasised about the importance of annual accounting, which we all accept. Furthermore, I am delighted to emphasise that the council is able to accept fully the principle set out in new clause 1. I am putting that total package to the hon. Lady, because the council has done as much as it can in capital terms to accept her amendment.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will my hon. Friend agree that Birmingham city council has taken immense trouble over a long period? There were many doubters at the outset. Am I right in saying that the financial conclusions were not reached without the burning of much midnight oil?

Sir Reginald Eyre: My hon. Friend is right to make that point. The sceptical view taken by some people, in a quite healthy way, has caused much care to be taken in the preparation of the Bill, and the degree of care has increased as time has passed.

Mr. Ashby: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Reginald Eyre: Perhaps my hon. Friend will excuse me for just a moment. I was describing the preparation to Opposition Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) is right—none of us believe that the city of Birmingham would be anything other than responsible when calculating such expenditure. The issues of sensitivity which the hon. Member for Hodge Hill mentioned are well understood because there is a desire to use the money in other ways which it is believed would be advantageous to the city.

Ms. Clare Short: I have listened carefully to everything that the hon. Gentleman has said. The trouble with acceptance of new clause 1 but rejection of amendment No. 16 is that it would be possible to spend massively over the capital projection, to find within five years that the whole thing is losing money and close it down. It is surprising that the city council is not prepared to accept the amendment, or something like it, if it has any confidence in its cost projections. A document prepared for the city council on the financial implications of a motor race in Birmingham told us that a contingency of 35 per cent. to allow for inflation and unforeseen difficulties had already been included in the capital figure. We are now told that the capital will be spent over two years, but that a limit of £1·7 million in one year is not acceptable. That seems quite extraordinary.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I am not saying that capital expenditure of £1·7 million is not acceptable. I am saying that the strict terms of amendment No. 16 would be difficult for any responsible body to accept. As I have explained, the job will be phased over two years, during which time there might be some unforeseen event. It might cost only £300,000, but if that sum took the total over the limit, the city council would be in far greater difficulties than any of us would like. That is the difficulty with specifying a figure. The reason is a business reason.

The council is being terribly responsible in responding to the amendment. It has given full reasons why it cannot accept the amendment in strict detail, but it has declared that it will do everything possible to ensure that planned expenditure is not exceeded and that the job is done in two years so that it can conduct the business effectively. In view of that attitude, acceptance of new clause 1 and acceptance of annual accounting, I hope that the hon. Lady will be able to accept this as a reasonable package.

Mr. Ashby: Has my hon. Friend considered what I said about payments of compensation and damages? Has he insisted that the Bill provide that such claims be settled in 12 months? How would they affect the profit income?

Sir Reginald Eyre: I believe that, in regard to compensation and the involvement of the Lands Tribunal, my hon. Friend does not accept a principle that has been established in much legislation in which power is given to a public authority to carry out major works.

The Lands Tribunal has always been accepted as the eventual appeal body for calculations of compensatory damages. The matter was carefully considered in Committee and an obligation was placed on the city council in regard to the acceptance of liability. The rights of anyone who may have a claim will be much improved; he will not have to go through the usual process of law, but it follows that a claim will have to be initiated within a shorter period. I ask my hon. Friend to consider the balancing legal points. They secure the interests of individuals and put a severe responsibility on the city council.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before we proceed too far down this line, may I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that I think this matter would be more correctly discussed under amendment No. 12, which deals with compensation.

Mr. Rooker: I did not realise that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) had finished. He has completely ignored amendment No. 7, which is obviously a non-runner. The thought of getting the necessary capital expenditure from a source other than the repair bills of my constituents obviously never crossed the minds of those who wrote the hon. Gentleman's brief.

Amendment No. 7 is an alternative to amendment No. 16, which is also unacceptable to the city council. The hon. Member for Hall Green made a telling observation when he said that the city council was beginning to think about the problems as time runs out. Even at this late stage, I cannot see why the council cannot seek some external financing sponsorship for the capital expenditure involved. A total of £1·5 million at 1984 prices—most of the calculations were put together in 1984 — is chickenfeed to big business.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Hall Green told us about the influential organisations that supported the Bill. He read out a list of home-grown and foreign-based multinationals in the motor industry in and around Birmingham. The list included Austin Rover—I would not include that company as a top profit-maker; Shell UK Oil—as far as I am aware, that company is making no losses; Cadbury Schweppes, a home-grown multinational, based, for all practical purposes, in Birmingham; IMI, a massive multinational which, to its credit, retains its headquarters in the inner city of Birmingham and puts its money into industrial units; GKN, one of the most profitable companies in the land, with its headquarters and many plants in the west midlands; and Davenports, the local brewers — I do not know much about their financial position, but I do not think that they are making a loss. The Holiday Inn kept writing to hon. Members asking them to support the Bill. It will make money for the hotel and create an occasional job for an apprentice.

Why cannot those big companies put their hands in their pockets? I suggest that £200,000 apiece would do the trick. They could lose such a sum in adding up the third column of figures beyond the decimal point. It would be that small. The scaffolding, crash barriers, new lamp standards and seating could be adorned with their names, and rightly so. What is wrong with that? At this late stage, why cannot the city council try to obtain the initial capital expenditure from elsewhere? The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) wants the ratepayers to put their hands in their pockets to provide the spin-off for all the companies to which I have just referred. I believe, however, that they ought to make a contribution to the city, and it is not too late for them to do so.

9.30 pm

We accept the sincerity of the hon. Member for Hall Green. Nobody disputes his integrity. However, we cannot control what happens in the other place. The hon. Gentleman said that he has experience of legislating. I acknowledge that he has been a Member of Parliament longer than I, and he has also served as a Minister. However, I have been a Member of Parliament sufficiently long to know that not every statement made in this House is translated into legislation in the way that was originally envisaged.

I should prefer new clause 1 and amendments Nos. 16 or 7, which are alternative amendments, to be included in the Bill without a Division. If the figures are wrong, I should be prepared to allow indexation in the case of amendment No. 16. We are endeavouring to insert the intention behind the background briefings that were provided by the city council. We do not want runaway spending——

Ms. Clare Short: Another Concorde.

Mr. Rooker: That is right; we do not want another Concorde.

The city council says that the project will cost only £1·5 million in 1984 prices, or £1·7 million in 1986. The council has built into its calculations massive variations of the money that it will get from television rights. They amount to as much as 35 per cent. The financial department of the city council runs a fairly tight budget and ship under Councillor Dick Knowles, so I am confident that if it says that the price will be £1·5 million in 1984 prices, it can be accepted. I shall keep the council to it.

Financial discipline must be imposed not upon the city council but upon the people with whom it does business. Contract after contract will be let to the private sector. I want extra jobs to be created, but the private sector must be told that this is not a gravy train. It must not be led to believe that no financial ceilings will be imposed, just because this new tourist venture has been sanctioned by Parliament, and that it must be got on the road at all costs because the council does not want to lose face and therefore an extra 5 per cent. on this or an extra 10 per cent. on that, or an overrun on something else, will be met by the city council. If the private sector realises that a financial ceiling is set upon the city council's expenditure, it will be forced to keep within financial limits.

Ms. Clare Short: The feasibility study which has been circulated to hon. Members by the RAC demonstrates that considerable road works will take place. There will be road widening and the removal of roundabouts. The RAC also says that further discussions will take place and that further requiremens may be imposed. Does my hon. Friend agree that it might help if the city council said that there was a limit upon the amount of capital that it could spend and that the road race project could go ahead only within those financial limits?

Mr. Rooker: Yes, that is right. If there were problems of unforeseen expenditure and of expenditure going out of control, the city council could say that Parliament had limited the expenditure. It would be open to the city council to obtain money from elsewhere if there were an overrun for some reason. Big, profitable businesses based in Birmingham, living off the motor industry and its component suppliers, such as hotels, would put their hands into their pockets if they believed the venture to be viable. It is in the interests of the city council and of its contractors to see that there is no bottomless pit and that a limit is built into the capital expenditure allocation.

Is there any limit that the city council will accept? Will it accept a limit of £2 million, for example? That figure is way above its original estimate. Does the council say that to have any limit in the Bill would be unacceptable, for the reasons that the hon. Member for Hall Green gave? If the council is not prepared to accept a limit, that throws into doubt all the calculations that have been made.

I do not know whether that matter was covered in the opinion polls and the report sprung on us at the last moment by my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). None of us had seen a copy of the report. He seems to be the only person to have a copy. I do not know whether money was mentioned in the opinion poll or whether questions about capital expenditure were included. I do not know whether my hon. Friend asked for the report or whether it was offered to him. I should like to know whether the financial side of the race is dealt with in the report.

Mr. Terry Davis: Does my hon. Friend agree that the cost of the report, which has been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), should be included in the costs of the motor race?

Mr. Rooker: Opinion poll companies do not work for nothing. Even those that work for the Labour party do not work for nothing. Someone has to pay for their work. The city council must be paying the bill.

We are talking about £1·5 million of capital expenditure. Like my hon. Friend, I question the city council's priorities. I do not believe that the race is a suitable priority. I intervened during the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East only to make the narrow point of whether we need the Bill. The need for a Bill gives us an opportunity to question the city council's priorities. Normally I should not consider doing that. I disagree a great deal with the city council's priorities, whichever party is in control. It is not within my competence, however, to tell the city council that its priorities are wrong and that it should do what I say. In this case, however, it requires the approval of the House of Commons. I am prepared to say that the city council's priorities are wrong. I have the opportunity to do that, and, what is more, I have the opportunity to influence its priorities. It is an opportunity that I do not normally have.

Birmingham does not spend all its capital receipts from housing on housing. This is a highly technical subject, and I do not claim to understand the ins and outs of it all. We could spend all those capital receipts on housing. There is nothing in the legislation to stop us from doing that. Indeed, we should be doing that. That was one of the manifesto commitments upon which the Labour party won the last city council election. We are not doing that. Therefore, I question the expenditure of £1·5 million that could be spent on maintenance and remedying defects in some of the worst housing conditions in Birmingham.

A distinction is drawn along party lines. It is not too late to ask the private sector to put its hands in its pockets. It does so for the greater good of Birmingham and for the benefit of its companies, and I believe that the House should ask it to do so this time. The city council should not be given carte blanche—in effect, an open cheque—by a refusal to accept amendment No. 16. I would not argue with the idea that the other place can include an indexation provision in the Bill, but I should like this House to insert such a proposal.

I accept what the hon. Member for Hall Green said about new clause 1. I accept his integrity. There is no reason why we cannot include new clause 1 and let the other place mess about with the wording and change it. We all agree. The promoters say, "We accept the thrust of the new clause." What is there between us? If things go wrong in the other place, there will not be the opportunity that the House needs to put this right. I am not prepared to leave this provision to the other place. Some Members of the other place are root and branch opposed to the Bill, whatever concessions are given. Others favour the legislation. Who is to say how the votes will be carried?

If we agree on the thrust of the new clause, we should include it in the Bill and make progress with the other amendments. I hope that this will be done with the same friendliness as has been shown so far in the debate.

Mr. Corbett: Presumably, my hon. Friend received a letter from the leader of the city council, Councillor Dick Knowles, in which he gave an undertaking that "the race shall not take place if an operating loss is still made in the fifth year of the event."

That gives added importance to the question that my hon. Friend has just posed to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre): what are we arguing about?

Mr. Rooker: We are arguing about very little. We are arguing about whether to include the provision now or to do so later. I believe that it should be included now. The city council has woken up to some of the points that my colleagues have been making for months. The council has left it until the last minute to seek a meeting of minds. If Conservative Members had taken the same view, either before or just after Second Reading, instead of giving a blank cheque with respect to financial provisions, we would probably not be in this position now. Members of Parliament representing Birmingham and elsewhere agree that there is nothing between us on the point of principle. Therefore, there is nothing to stop us doing the deed and having the technicalities corrected in the other place. After all, the House of Commons is really the upper House, whatever the terminology used by the press to describe the two Houses.

Mr. Terry Davis: I support the new clause and the amendments.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) has explained, there is little difference between us on the new clause. According to its wording, it will be incumbent upon the city council to stop holding a motor race if it is not making a profit after five years. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) says that he accepts the spirit of the new clause. He knows that the city council is anxious to accept it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) has mentioned, we have received a letter to that effect from Councillor Dick Knowles. There is no disagreement on that point.

There is also no disagreement on the need for separate accounts. Separate accounts are essential if we are to know whether the race is making a profit during those five years. A few months ago, the chairman of the general purposes committee gave us an assurance that accounts would be kept. I am not clear whether accounts have already been kept and whether we can see 1984-85 accounts on the expenditure that has already been incurred, for example, on entertainment of Members of Parliament. I hope that cost is included in the accounts as well as a contribution towards the cost of the survey conducted by some organisation of behalf of the city council. Apparently, the survey's findings have been communicated only to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape).

Mr. Snape: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davis: No.

Mr. Snape rose——

9.45 pm

Mr. Davis: All right, I shall give way to my hon. Friend because he seems so upset. Obviously he has more information than hon. Members representing Birmingham.

Mr. Snape: I should like to make two points. First, I have no idea what has been spent on entertaining hon. Members on either side of the House with regard to the Bill. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that not a penny has been spent on entertaining me, and that that is not the reason behind the attitude that I have taken. Secondly, I have only just noticed that, although the survey was conducted in May, the date on the document is June. I can assume only that it has been published today or recently.

Mr. Davis: I accept my hon. Friend's assurances. I had already guessed that he went to the council house for a briefing this morning, and obtained the document during that meeting.

Mr. Snape: I have to ask my hon. Friend to accept that I did not go to the council house for a briefing this morning. I met somebody from Birmingham city council after a meeting of the west midlands Trades Union Congress that I had attended. It was only because I happened to be in Birmingham this morning that the document became available to me.

Mr. Davis: I knew that my hon. Friend was in Birmingham this morning because he told us how he drove through the constituency of Ladywood. But let that point rest. The important matter is the new clause.

I also leave on one side the need for annual accounts, which is a serious point because the expenditure that has already been incurred should be accounted and set against the income from the motor race.

I agree strongly with the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr. The hon. Member for Hall Green has assured us that the city council will seek to amend the Bill in the other place. But it is not within the power of the city council to amend the Bill. That responsibility rests with the other place. Therefore, it is important for the hon. Gentleman to accept the new clause. If he does not, it will be possible for the new clause drafted by the promoter of the Bill to be rejected by the other place. If it is rejected, the issue will not come back to the House of Commons. The only way in which the House of Commons can be sure of our joint wishes being put into effect is by accepting the new clause, so that, if a different view prevails in the other place, the matter must come back to the House of Commons because the Bill will have been amended since it left the House of Commons.

In no way am I casting aspersions on the integrity of the hon. Member for Hall Green or his assurances. Nevertheless, I cannot understand why the hon.

Gentleman cannot accept the new clause. Then it can be amended in another place to give effect to the accounting expression that he described as being slightly different from the wording that has been used by my hon. Friend. If we accepted the new clause, we could make the progress that hon. Members on both sides would like.

Amendment No. 16 would restrict the city council to a capital expenditure of £1·7 million in 1986.

I should like to deal first with a detailed point because the hon. Member for Hall Green said that the city council told us that it wishes to incur its expenditure over a period of two financial years. That point was not relevant because the expenditure would be in the calendar year 1986 to which the amendment refers. I recognise that the expenditure would fall into the financial years 1985-86 and 1986-87, but it would almost certainly be in the calendar year of 1986. We shall not quibble if some items of capital expenditure are incurred before the end of the calendar year.

An important principle has been advanced by my hon. Friends concerning the confidence that we can have in the figures that have been advanced. I must correct my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr, who referred to the estimate of £1·5 million as being at 1984 prices. In fact, that estimate is not given at 1984 prices. It is clear from the information that we have been given that the city council estimated the capital expenditure at August 1984 prices and added 35 per cent. to cover the contingencies and inflation between 1984 and 1986. Therefore, one quarter of the capital estimate of £1·5 million is to cover contingencies and inflation. My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood is generously adding a further £200,000 to that estimate.

I wonder how much leeway the city council requires. I accept the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr, when he asked whether the council would accept a limit of £2 million. What figures does the council have confidence in? There must be a figure which the city council is not prepared to pay for a motor race. I am prepared to accept whatever figure it gives, unless it says £20 million, which is not realistic. It may set the figure at £2 million, £1·7 million or £2·5 million, but there should be a limit.

Alternatively, the city council could accept amendment No. 7 because it goes to the heart of our objections, which relate to the use of the capital allocation by the city council for a motor race. Personally, I would not press amendment No. 7 because the city council has moved a long way towards meeting us. Indeed, it has moved much further towards our position compared with its previous position. It has virtually accepted 90 per cent. of our argument about the need to ensure that £1·5 million will remain available for all the priorities which I share with my hon. Friends the Members for Ladywood and for Perry Barr. Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr to withdraw amendment No. 7. Although I agree with his original intention to tell the city council to look for external money for capital expenditure, the objective was to meet our objection to the Bill. It was a good idea, but now the city council has gone past that point in its offer to us this afternoon.

On amendment No. 16, I cannot understand why the city council will not accept a limit. I recognise the force of the argument of the hon. Member for Hall Green about unforeseen contingencies and that in the normal course of events it would be unwise to limit the city council in this way. Nevertheless, it shows a remarkable lack of confidence in the council's figures that the council can conceive that the expenditure will be so much more than the estimate. The council must have estimated that the cost would be about £1·2 million. It increased the figure to £1·5 million, and we are adding £200,000. In other words, we are providing a 50 per cent. contingency and inflation fund. How much more inaccurate can the estimates be? If they are more inaccurate than that, I do not think much of the figures, and I would be surprised if the city treasurer thought that he had produced such loose estimates.

I ask the hon. Member for Hall Green, who has been most accommodating in his approach to our amendments, to reconsider the possibility of accepting them.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I wish to reply to the points raised by Opposition Members. I begin by apologising to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for not having referred to amendment No. 7. I did not hear it called and did not think that it was grouped with the amendments; otherwise I would certainly have spoken to it.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) showed a degree of reservation about the amendment. It would require the city to raise the initial capital cost externally from sponsorship. It is extremely difficult for the city to accept the amendment because it would prove difficult to raise such funding in advance of the facilities being available to run the race. Sponsorship is much more likely to be related to special events at specific times when such matters as television coverage, timing and races are arranged. A large part of the initial capital cost would not relate to expenditure with which sponsors could identify easily. Sponsorship and advertising income would help to ensure that the race is run at a profit each year, after allowing for the financing of the initial capital cost.

The aims are agreed in the city council's proposal. The initial cost will effectively be funded over a period from race proceeds. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the principle of his amendment is fully accepted. The intention is to recoup the cost of setting up the event from the income that it generates. I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that it is simply a matter of timing. He is keen to take this money from a sponsor or industry, and I believe that it will be possible to recoup the cost, but it is a matter of timing. The city council believes that it cannot raise that funding in advance of the scheme proceeding and sponsorship beginning to operate.

I should tell the hon. Member for Hodge Hill that amendment No. 4, which is to correct a drafting error, is accepted. The hon. Gentleman says that we must accept amendment No. 16 although we know that it is inaccurate.

Mr. Terry Davis: I am urging the hon. Gentleman to accept a new clause 1 despite the fact that it is inaccurate.

Sir Reginald Eyre: The hon. Gentleman is saying that we should accept new clause 1 and amend it in another place. I am sorry, but I believe that that procedure would be without precedent. It would reflect badly on the House, especially when one considers that there is a difficulty in using the terms of the definition. However, I have given an undertaking on behalf of the city council. I believe that we have settled the matter. I ask him and the hon. Member for Ladywood to accept my undertaking that the matter will be dealt with properly in another place.

Ms. Clare Short: I believe that we should vote on new clause 1 and on amendment No. 16. I accept the hon. Gentleman's integrity and commitment, but undertakings have been given in the House before by Governments, not by Back-Bench Members, which have not been fulfilled. That is why I wish the House to vote on the new clause and the amendment, but I make it clear that I accept the hon. Gentleman's integrity and commitment to accepting the amendments.

Sir Reginald Eyre: I understand the hon. Lady's point, although I am sorry that she wishes to press the matter to a vote.

There is not much more for me to say, except to explain my reasons for rejecting amendment No. 16. The hon. Member for Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) wants the amendment to be accepted. The difficulty in answering his point, at my present stage of instructions and present responsibility, is the unforeseen incident which might push up the figure. Opposition Members have won substantial concessions, including yearly accountability, a two-year limitation agreed, although not inserted in detail, and five-yearly full accountability. I have done my best to construe those matters in terms that are acceptable to the Opposition, and in view of what the hon. Lady said, I can go no further.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

10.10 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): I beg to move

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (Third ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 23rd May, be approved.

As hon. Members will be aware, the Lomé convention is the treaty which governs economic relations between the European Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific group of developing countries. The third ACP-EEC convention, or Lomé III as it is commonly known, was signed on 8 December last year and covers the period 1985 to 1990.

The draft Order in Council, to which the motion refers, allows effect to be given to the provisions of the convention in United Kingdom law. This in turn opens the way for ratification of the convention by the United Kingdom. The convention will come into force when it has been ratified by all the member states, the European Community and two thirds of the ACP states. This will probably be early next year.

I am grateful to the Select Committee on European Legislation for agreeing that the debate on the draft order also provides an opportunity to consider other Community documents which it has recommended for debate. I shall not take up the time of the House discussing each of those documents in detail, though I shall deal with points that hon. Members raise when I reply to the debate. However, there are a few general aspects of the documents to which I should draw attention.

By and large, they have been overtaken by, or been subsumed in, the new Lomé convention. This is particularly the case with the Commission memorandum on the Community's development policy, which came to be known as the "Pisani memorandum."

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Because of the discussion that is taking place among hon. Members assembled just beyond the Bar of the House, I am having difficulty in hearing what the Minister is saying.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I, too, am having some difficulty in hearing the Minister. If hon. Members who are standing beyond the Bar will leave or come into the Chamber, we will get on with the debate.

Mr. Raison: Perhaps they would care to join the debate.

What came to be known as the "Pisani memorandum" was thoroughly discussed by Development and Foreign Ministers in 1982 in preparation for renegotiating the Lomé convention. Some of its main ideas, such as that the Community should promote food security in developing countries and hold a policy dialogue with aid recipients, were pursued in the Community's mandate for the Lomé negotiations. Others, such as improved co-ordination, were the subject of separate Commission proposals.

Similarly, the 1983 review of EEC-ACP relations in the mining sector concluded that, in negotiating the third Lomé convention, the Community should seek to help the ACP to develop its mineral resources and thus also ensure security of supply for Europe.

The Commission's paper on the European Community and Africa did not require Council decisions but provided a timely analysis of recent African experience and the barriers to growth there. The problems of Africa have remained very much to the fore in Community discussions, and the Development Council, on 23 May, reviewed the Community's response to the present crisis.

It is perhaps appropriate for me to clarify the role of the Lomé convention in meeting both the immediate and longer term needs of Africa. For the most part, the Community's role in providing food and emergency relief is financed from the Community budget and does not, therefore, come under the Lomé arrangements. However, one ingredient in the Dublin summit's commitment to provide at least 1·2 million tonnes of cereals was the allocation of £45 million from the emergency provisions of the second Lomé convention. This is now being implemented.

The main contribution of the convention is long-term development. Ninety four per cent. of commitments from the fifth European development fund, under Lomé II, have been made to Africa. These include projects like that at Jebel Marra in the Darfur province of Sudan, which I visited in February. As Commissioner Natali reminded the ACP-EC Council of Ministers in Luxembourg last Friday, the new convention will give added emphasis and finance to such schemes.

The Court of Auditors report on the co-ordination of Community aid to third countries is a useful reminder of the benefits which increased co-ordination of aid can bring. I share the Commission's hope that the policy dialogue provided for in Lomé III will improve aid co-ordination.

The Development Council has devoted continued attention to co-ordination, adopting at its meeting on 23 May a format for joint aid reports by the missions of Community member states and the Commission in developing countries.

Finally, I should mention specifically the decision enabling the Council and the Commission to conclude the third Lomé convention on behalf of the EEC itself and of the European Coal and Steel Community. This must be approved by the Council before the convention can enter into force. The Government have no difficulty with the proposal, which is a matter of common sense. As I have said, I should be happy to deal more fully with these documents in winding up if hon. Members wish.

Ten years since the first Lomé convention was signed, this is a good time to take stock. Ten years ago the convention was seen by many as a new way of organising and managing relations between rich and poor countries. What has been the record? We have to recognise that development in many ACP countries has slowed or gone into reverse. The proportion of the Community's trade going to the ACP compared with the rest of the world has diminished. The share of ACP exports taken by the Community market has also dropped. We have ourselves expressed concern about the quality of aid from the European development fund.

[Mr. Raison]

Against this, it is clear that the convention constitutes a form of co-operation that is valued on both sides. It cannot guarantee that world trade will grow. But it does offer the ACP states free access to the Community market for 95 per cent. of their exports to the Community, and they receive assurances of substantial long-term aid commitments. For the member states, Lomé provides a European dimension to our overseas aid programmes. Moreover, 35 of the 66 ACP states are members of the Commonwealth, which thus gain privileged access to European markets and European aid through the convention.

Against this background one of our main goals in negotiating the new convention was to get a more effective instrument of development, and I think that this is reflected in the third convention.

The main objectives are clearly set out in a new introductory section: there are tighter procedures for planning EDF aid; stronger provisions for appraising and evaluating projects; a new provision to allow for fast disbursement of aid to maintain existing investments; a new chapter on drought and desertification; more stress on promoting investments; and throughout there is a strong and welcome emphasis on food production and agricultural development. That reflects the priority I gave in the negotiations to food security, and the final text incorporates most of the substance of what I proposed.

Underlying those improvements is the basic thrust of the arguments in Mr. Pisani's memorandum: that the Lomé partners share a common interest in following policies which lead to much better rates of economic growth and more balanced forms of growth than we have seen in the past. There is no sense in pouring large sums of money into projects which are plainly unsuited to the economic, geographic or climatic conditions of the country concerned—"building cathedrals in the desert," as Commissioner Pisani once put it. Nor is it productive to provide aid in sectors where mistaken policies are being pursued or where overall economic policies counteract the potential benefits of an aid project.

This is a sensitive area. The ACP states rejected the Community's initial proposals for a "policy dialogue", fearing that they would result in what they felt to be unwarranted interference in their internal policies. I cannot pretend that the wording eventually agreed is ideal. Whether or not it enables the Community to concentrate its aid on those countries and on those sectors in which viable economic policies are being pursued still remains to be seen. We have made clear to the new Commissioner, Mr. Natali, our strong commitment to the principles on which the Community negotiated, and he has assured me of his own commitment to them. The first missions to programme EDF funds will leave Brussels in July, and we shall support and encourage them to the best of our ability.

But the task of making the convention a more effective instrument for promoting the development of the ACP states cannot rest with the EEC alone. Many of the ACP states themselves now realise that their inability to feed their own populations and their consequent dependence on imported food is a major handicap in their struggle to improve living standards. That handicap can be overcome only by developing coherent long-term policies and strategies, and that must be the responsibility of the Governments concerned,. The Lomé relationship, as has been frequently stressed, is one of partnership—a team effort in which all participants share responsibility.

The emphasis in Lomé III on the greater effectiveness of Community aid has resulted in a move towards Community support for key sectors or policy programmes rather than individual projects. Food strategies are one example—we have them for Mali, Zambia, Kenya and Rwanda. The fight against drought and desertification is another. Both areas are given prominence in the convention with a complete new chapter being devoted to long-term efforts to combat drought and desertification.

As a corollary to the shift of focus from individual projects to policy programmes, the convention also stresses the importance of regional co-operation and programmes intended to help more than one ACP state. The Community—itself a group of sovereign states—may often be better placed to provide assistance for such schemes than individual member states acting alone.

The total financial allocation for the sixth European development fund has been established at 7·5 billion ecu, or £4,438 million. The size of EDF VI was, not surprisingly, a central feature of the negotiations for the ACP states, and they felt bound to express their disappointment at the outcome. I think, however, that they will soon come to realise that the offer is remarkably generous. EDF VI will be 60 per cent. larger than EDF V. That represents more than maintenance of value in real terms at a time when most other multilateral aid organisations have been obliged to restrain or cut back their budgets. In addition, up to 1·1 billion ecu—£651 million—will be made available to the ACP states in the form of loans from the European Investment Bank's own resources.

As hon. Members are aware, the Government are firmly of the view that no amount of development aid can substitute for improving trade links between the developed and the developing world. The long-term economic security of the ACP states depends on their ability to increase trade flows by finding new markets for their goods. The ACP states themselves realise this. The income earned by the ACP states from trade with the Community is two to three times greater than the financial flows resulting from aid from all sources, and more than 30 times as great as EDF aid alone. We therefore argued throughout the negotiations for further improvements in access to Community markets for ACP goods and for the removal of all remaining duties on agricultural products.

Most member states were prepared to see a relaxation of controls on some products, though not in cases where member states' agricultural produce competed most directly with that of the ACP countries. We were able to achieve agreement that in future ACP requests for improved access for particular products will receive a more rapid response. In considering those requests the Community will take account of concessions granted to other developing countries. We shall work hard to make a reality of that undertaking. It would have been better for the ACP had we been able to do more. Nevertheless, the existing Lomé trade arrangements are probably the most liberal on offer to any group of developing countries.

One significant improvement which we were able to obtain was relaxation and simplification of the convention's rules of origin.

I should also mention that the special trade arrangements for sugar, bananas, beef and rum—which are of particular importance for Commonwealth ACP states—have all been consolidated or improved in the new convention. On sugar, bananas, beef and rum, we had to fight hard to maintain the preferential access for our Commonwealth partners to the Community market which was provided under Lomé II. We were successful. Indeed, on rum we managed to obtain a substantial increase in the growth rate of duty-free quotas for the rest of the Community and a minimum Community import level of 170,000 hectolitres at the expense of a slight decrease in the growth rate of the quota for the United Kingdom market.

In addition to trade and aid, private investment has an essential role to play in developing ACP economies. I was delighted to find greater awareness than ever before amongst the ACP states of the need to create and maintain a stable investment climate. This attitude is reflected in the provisions of the investment chapter of the convention which is much more substantial than its predecessor.

Lomé III, like its predecessors, offers British business an opportunity to participate in the development partnership. Over the past few years, British business has won a growing share of EDF contracts. For the first time, in the first quarter of this year the percentage of EDF V contracts placed in Europe which were won by British businesses rose above 20 per cent. That is a good achievement. It recognises the quality and expertise which this country has to offer, but we can do better still. As they become better acquainted with administrative procedures in Brussels and in the ACP states, British firms will be better placed than ever to improve their performance under EDF VI. Firms which have not yet tendered for EDF contracts should not be deterred by unfamiliar procedures and requests. Their perseverance will, I am sure, be well rewarded.

Before concluding, I should like to take this opportunity to extend a welcome to the new members of the Lomé partnership. Angola and Mozambique played a full part in the negotiations and both countries have now signed the new convention. An additional protocol to the convention will drafted to provide for the accession of Spain and Portugal, both of which have agreed during the enlargement negotiations to shoulder their share of the financial burden.

I should like to end on what I am sure will be a point of particular pleasure for the House, especially the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston). One of the innovations contained in the new convention is the amalgamation of the ACP-EEC consultative assembly and its joint committee into a new joint assembly, composed of Members of the European Parliament and Members of Parliament or designated representatives of the ACP states. I am delighted to inform the House that the United Kingdom Members of the European Parliament have persuaded the joint assembly to hold its first meeting in Inverness this summer. It will be the first time that a meeting of this type has been held in the United Kingdom, and we very much look forward to welcoming delegates to this country.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): It is widely recognised that the first Lomé agreement was a successor to the Yaoundé agreements, which were dominated by the need to accommodate the interests of former French and Belgian colonial territories in Africa. The agreement was widely criticised at the time, but Lomé I was seen as a major and path-breaking step forward. It is of some relevance to the criticisms that we shall make of the Government's attitude to Lomé III to observe the conditions under which Lomé I was achieved.

There was considerable confidence among commodity producers following the success of OPEC in raising oil prices, and there was some disarray among some Community countries at the time, which were not sure to what extent other commodity producers might manage to gain similar advantages. There also was political support for Lomé I and the interests of Third world countries, such as that shown by my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart)—then Minister for Overseas Development—who very much regrets that she cannot be with us tonight, Claude Cheysson of the EEC commission and Jan Pronk, the Minister for Development in the Netherlands. In other words, there was a pull from the ACP countries and a push from Europe.

However, those high hopes were not fulfilled. They did not work out, for various reasons. There was not enough money and the Stabex commodity scheme was too small and had too limited a range of products. By the time of Lomé II, optimism had faded. In the event, Lomé II closely resembled Lomé I in form, but not in substance. The only substantial innovation was the introduction of the Sysmin scheme for financing the rehabilitation of ACP mining industries. There was no specific fund for industrial development and in real per capita terms, the decline in European investment bank and European development fund money was about 20 per cent.

The Minister stressed that as we approach Lomé III, the economies of several of the countries concerned are in a precarious state. It also is worth stressing that the group contains more than two thirds of the world's least developed countries. Key social indicators such as literacy, school enrolment, life expectancy and child death rates are among the worst in the world.

The size of the Lomé countries is not so great in the global economy. They represent about 12 per cent. of the Third world's population. India alone has about twice the population of the ACP countries. However, the deprivation, poverty and backwardness of those countries and their lack of productive structure is recognised on both sides of the House as a severe handicap. Therefore, it is critical that in facing the challenge of the global crisis, the challenge of trade and the challenge of a renewal of the Lomé agreement, there should have been more than an adequate response from the EEC to the needs and demands of the ACP countries.

As the Minister said, the EEC response has been 7·5 billion ecus, with about 1·1 billion from the EIB. But the total of 8·6 billion ecus will only just preserve the Lomé II levels, taking inflation into account. It will not preserve those levels if population increase is recognised. It would need 10 billion ecus to get back to the levels of Lomé I. That is against a background in which the ACP countries, as illustrated by the Lords Select Committee report and other sources, have been asking for 11 billion ecus. Therefore, there have been cuts.

Have the Government been pushing for the higher sums or arguing for the lower sums, as they recently pressed for a £22 million cut in the EEC food aid budget for next year? What has been the Government's role during the negotiations? Did they fight in the Community for the higher figure or were they—as we understand that they were—the mean men of Europe, paying lip service to the problems, but not putting the resources where they are needed?

There is also the key issue, to which the Minister did not address himself, of the pace of Lomé procedures—slow, slower and stop, as they are widely known in many countries. Despite what the Minister said, funds remain unspent from the days prior to Lomé I in 1975-80. In March 1984, just one year before Lomé II expired, only 20 per cent. of its aid funds had been spent and only 50 per cent. had been committed.

The fund established under the Sysmin scheme in Lomé II for assisting the mining industries of ACP states has been notoriously slow. At the beginning of this year, only one third of its 282 million ecus had been committed and only a very small amount spent.

We recognise that Lomé III introduces a range of measures to speed up the aid cycle of EC, and those are to be welcomed. We trust that they will also be adhered to. European Economic Community procedures are certainly over bureaucratic, and the understaffing of the directorate general for development of the Commission certainly does not help.

We also recognise that some of the responsibility for slow aid spending rests with the ACP states, but we trust that the Minister also agrees that in many cases they are administratively weak and that recently they have been overwhelmed, especially in Africa, by the scale of the drought crisis. Technical assistance to some extent can overcome this constraint, but a better relationship between ACP programmes and other programmes and the adequate funding of some other programmes is also important if the ACP framework and the Lomé convention are to succeed.

The Minister referred to ex-Commissioner Pisani's reference to cathedrals in the desert—not original for ex-Commissioner Pisani. Many such cathedrals in the desert have been found in southern Italy by some critics. But we recognise the point. In many cases the preference for mega-projects versus micro-projects has done little to help agricultural development. The sectoral focus of the new Lomé convention is very much open to question. Precisely how the strategic approach will work is not yet clear. The European Community is involved in the pursuit of food sector strategies already, with the Governments of Mali, Ruanda, Zambia and Kenya. This approach may hold the promise of poverty-focused, better quality aid, but to be effective it is essential that the community should get the backing of individual member states rather than that the Government should drag their feet, as they have, over providing resources for those projects.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I am very much a tyro in this debate and am learning as it proceeds. If the Labour party were to form the next Government and took Britain out of Europe, would that strengthen or weaken our contribution to Lomé?

Mr. Holland: I think the hon. Gentleman said that he is an amateur in this kind of debate. If he followed Labour party policy he would see that it wishes to work with other European countries not only to counter the drought problem but to promote economic recovery and trade with Third world countries. I have just been to a conference in Sweden that was attended by many other parties, several of which are in Government. Those parties — for example, the Italian Government—have been pushing for an increase in aid programme resources at a time when the British Government have been dragging their feet and proposing cuts in European food aid.

Returning to the link between emergency aid and development aid, it is important that there should be a proper link. Lomé II had an emergency aid budget of about 202 million ecus. During Lomé II the European Commmunity refused to use this money for longer term rehabilitation and development after the emergency had passed, and a period of six months was stipulated. In Lomé III the energency aid is split into 210 million ecus for emergencies and 90 million ecus for refugees. The latter can be used for the long term integration of refugees, through the provision of tools and equipment, seeds and so on.

This is to be welcomed, but it does not go far enough, not least because the finance is a pittance. It is just over 4 ecus per head for Africa's refugees. Both the ACP and European non-Governmental organisations want the concepts and procedures of emergency aid to be modified to include long term developments and activities. At a more general level, given the drought situation in parts of Africa, the transition from emergency to development aid is one of the key problems of the day. But the Government are not adequately addressing it. They have not been supporting the Commission's proposals for food aid and are not supporting the ACP countries over the higher resources that they wish to be allocated to longer term agricultural development.

We also have to question the sector strategies. The food strategies, especially with their reliance upon small-scale farming, are excellent in themselves but do not admit the kind of problems that ACP countries are facing over some of the commodities to which the Minister referred at the end of his speech. For example, one of the problems with bananas is that that product is distributed on the world market by a handful of companies, and very little of the income goes to the producers. On average, producers receive only just over 10 per cent. of the final value of the bananas that are sold in the shops. The ripeners receive over 20 per cent. and the retailers receive 30 per cent. The income that goes to those who produce the bananas is a fraction of the 10 per cent. That is the underlying type of problem with commodities. It is not just STABEX or commodity stabilisation. It is a great problem for the ACP countries and is not addressed adequately by Lomé.

Lomé also is contradicted by the EEC's common agricultural policy. One of the ways in which Lomé is designed to promote the development of the ACP is through supporting both trade with the Community and ACP exports to the rest of the world. But that objective is undermined by the operation of the CAP.

Agricultural protectionism bars a range of ACP exports to the Community market. The United Kingdom Government have failed to have those barriers removed during the Lomé III negotiations. Botswana in southern Africa and Burkina Faso in western Africa claim to have lost regional markets for beef exports due to subsidised EEC beef exports. I have been to Burkina Faso, and I trust that the Minister has been there. It is, as the Minister will be aware, one of the poorest countries of Africa. It is wracked by drought and desertification. For the EEC's beef exports to be undermining the export trade of that country contradicts the objectives of Lomé.

Similarly, the annual sale of about 5 million tonnes of EEC beet sugar on world markets has contributed to the decline in world sugar prices to their lowest level for 15 years. That has robbed acutely dependent traditional ACP cane exporters in the Caribbean of their markets. Those policies are detrimental to the development of EEC, ACP and intra-ACP trade and should be reviewed as a matter of priority.

The EEC has also produced large grain and dairy surpluses which, in the form of food aid, have contributed to the undermining of Africa's food self-sufficiency. The directorate general for development of the Commission has been trying to reduce the negative impact of non-emergency food aid. The development council adopted a policy in 1983 which would introduce into Lomé III a stipulation that food aid must be integrated into the recipient's development policy, that financial assistance can replace food aid in some circumstances and that the EEC will continue a policy of triangular operations—in other words, buying foodstuffs in Third world countries to supply other Third world countries.

Those measures are to be welcomed. However, when the exceptional demand for food aid caused by the famine subsides there will be a strong temptation to keep food aid at the exceptionally high current levels. That must be resisted and the adopted policies must be adhered to.

More importantly, the growing EEC-US trade conflict over subsidised grain sales has crucial implications for the prospect of food self-sufficiency in Africa and the ACP in general. Should a price war break out and the international market become flooded with cheap grain, it will undermine the will of Governments to undertake the difficult reforms of agriculture designed to increase the participation of peasant farmers in national food production.

In that respect, it is relevant to refer to the role of other agencies which operate in ACP territories. That refers especially to the International Food and Development Agency. Granted that IFAD does good work—I am sure that is admitted by both sides of the House—that every £1 the United Kingdom puts into that IFAD leads to a procurement in the United Kingdom of £2, granted that Great Britain has the highest rate of procurement and that one third of IFAD's work is in Commonwealth countries, why are the Government not supporting IFAD and aiming for at least a $30 million replenishment over a four-year period?

If lip service is paid to the general objectives of the ACP arrangements, whereas in reality the Government are not prepared to put their money where their mouth is for long-term agricultural development, the Government will be taking with one hand while giving with the other.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Newport, West): The hon. Gentleman has given us a catalogue of suggestions for increased resources. If I read his criticism of the agreement that has been put together correctly, it is that the Government did not argue strongly enough in many sectors for additional increased resources. Is it the Labour party's policy that there should be increased resources for all the sectors to which the hon. Gentleman referred? This is only a small part of our overall aid package. Is this the focus of the Labour party's policy, or does the hon. Gentleman believe that this should be extended across the aid board? Would the Labour Government have the funds to achieve this aim?

Mr. Holland: It might have been a good idea if the hon. Gentleman had attended the recent debate during which I was asked basically the same question by a Conservative Member. He asked what the Labour party was going to do. It is the Labour party's policy to increase aid as a proportion of GNP to 0·7 per cent. within the lifetime of one Parliament and to aim at 1 per cent. Granted the way in which the Conservative party has cut the aid programme to 0·33 per cent., which is the lowest level recorded since we started a development and aid programme in Britain, that would give us tremendous resources to disperse in other countries. It would amount to an increase in spending in current terms of about £1 billion over the lifetime of the Parliament. We certainly would have no problem in supporting the replenishment of IFAD and IDA. As for food aid and agricultural programmes in ACP countries, we certainly would want to be able to match the Socialist-led Government in Italy and their increase in the aid programme within the Community framework rather than follow the lead of this Government who have introduced cuts.

I do not want to delay the House long on a detailed analysis of the various proposals in Lomé III, but STABEX is especially important. Under Lomé III, it has received 925 million ecu, but only three new products have been added to the list of 45 ACP products covered by the scheme. The ACP—the Minister did not point this out—had demanded that more than 40 new products should be added. In line with the EEC's line on financial rigour, the administration of STABEX has been considerably tightened—at least on paper—and ACP is now required to furnish much more information, reporting on the use to which STABEX funds are put. We recognise that there is the so-called "fangibility problem", which was popularised by Hans Singer, about the tracing of the precise use of STABEX resources. In practice, STABEX has been benefiting only some commodity producers. Over the years, these have tended to be the more affluent among the ACP countries.

There are basically three problems with STABEX. First, it is useful because in principle it rapidly responds to genuine needs arising from fallen export revenues in export states. But the introduction of bureaucratic procedures is likely to slow down the process and dilute the value of its transfers. Secondly, although the Government recognise that there is the fungibility problem, it is not clear how the EEC will in practice monitor the use of STABEX funds. Thirdly, the wisdom of investments in export commodities, currently in structural surplus in the international economy, has to be questioned. Emphasis in many of the ACP states has to be on the use of resources for diversification rather than on continued commodity support.

Also, STABEX provides no more than partial compensation for falling export revenues. In 1980 and 1981, the available funds met only 52·8 per cent. and 42·8 per cent. respectively of legitimate ACP claims. that is a 50 per cent. success record. The ACP is still seeking to be reimbursed for the shortfall. STABEX cannot replace commodity agreements designed to stabilise prices and does not undermine the rationale for increasing the size of straight loan compensatory finance facilities. UNCTAD work on a global compensatory fund requires the serious attention of the European donor states and should command the Government's support.

There are a number of interesting dimensions to Lomé III that certainly were not in Lomé II or Lomé I. One concerned the role of women in the Third world and the ACP countries. Several resolutions in the European Parliament, and the resolution adopted by the development council in November 1982, have recognised the crucial role played by women in the economies of the Third world, especially in the rural sector where they work as unpaid labour. Article 123 of Lomé III for the first time specifically recognises that, and proposes that women in the ACP should gain access to training, technology, credit and co-operative organisations themselves, of their own right, and not simply through the male head of the household, or through male peasant farmers. That is welcome, since EEC aid, along with most aid, has tended to ignore the critical, indeed overwhelming, role played by women labour in the rural sector in Third world countries.

If the EEC is serious about supporting efforts towards food self-sufficiency in the ACP states, women will have to be the main beneficiaries of aid programmes. However, the Minister was talking about the progress that some of the ACP countries could make by better acquainting themselves with EEC procedures in Brussels. The women may have some difficulty. A women's unit was introduced in DG8 in 1982, but with only one woman member of staff. Only a handful of the 58 EEC delegates abroad are women. The participation of women in the EEC aid programme both in the EEC itself, in Brussels, and in the ACP, must now be strengthened, as I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) will agree.

There is also the attitude that Lomé has taken in relation to apartheid. Despite the opposition of the British Government—I stress that—article 4, annex 1, of Lomé III pledges the ACP member states "to work effectively for the eradication of apartheid, which constitutes a violation of human rights and an affront to human dignity."

Since Lomé III was signed, pressure has been mounting in Europe and the United States for Governments to take a firmer stand against apartheid. The United States Congress has proposed economic sanctions against the Pretoria regime. At the April plenary session of the European Parliament, a Socialist-sponsored motion was adopted by the 434 members of the advisory assembly. The resolution advocates the ending of investment in South Africa, the halting of state guaranteed bank loans for export financing and the reducing of commercial contacts and relations. The resolution also advocated strict adherence to the United Nations arms embargo and the suspension of sporting and cultural contacts.

The EEC Commission has declared itself willing to consider any measure

"that will bring South Africa to its senses."

It has formally requested the EEC states to consider appropriate action against South Africa. EEC Foreign Ministers have also agreed to meet their counterparts in the front line states of southern Africa. It is crucial that this Government, the British Government, with the special links that we have had with South Africa in the past, should be seen to be supporting such sanctions against South Africa, and give substance to the commitments made by the EEC Governments in Lomé III.

A further point concerns the ACP and EEC enlargement. While the Minister welcomed new members to the ACP, and while I welcome new members to the European Community, it is clear that there will be problems. Spain and Portugal signed the treaty of accession on 12 June this year. The EEC tends to emphasise the positive opportunities for ACP trade with the Spanish and Portuguese markets, although in practice it is doubtful whether those countries will switch from traditional Latin American suppliers of raw materials and commodities.

However, the ACP is concerned that Spain will displace a range of ACP exports in the EEC market, particularly fruit and vegetables, leather goods, wood products, textiles and aluminium. One particular problem concerns the export of ACP sugar to Portugal. The ACP currently supplies about 120,000 tonnes of cane sugar to Portugal, and Portugal requested an import quota of 200,000 tonnes during the initial seven-year transition period. However, the Community has insisted upon 75,000 tonnes of cane sugar at a reduced levy over those seven years. Thus a large proportion of ACP sugar exports to Portugal will be wiped out at a stroke, while Portugal comes under increasing pressure to consume EEC beet sugar. It is possible that ACP sugar exports to Portugal will disappear altogether after the transition period.

As we understand it, the United Kingdom Government tried to increase the 75,000 tonne quota allocated to Portugal—where we observe that Tate and Lyle has four refineries—but failed to do so. The lip service that the Minister is paying regarding those commodities appears to be contradicted by the facts.

Lomé III introduces a consultative mechanism for discussing such ACP concerns about EC enlargement. It is essential that the EC enters into a meaningful dialogue with and gives a sympathetic hearing to ACP countries on these matters.

Overall, Lomé III has been mixed. It has had items of remarkable interest, not pressed by this or other Conservative Governments in the EC, but demanded, as in Lomé I, by third world countries, in this case ACP countries themselves. The Minister ended his speech by referring to the role of Commonwealth countries within the ACP. Certainly, at a time when the global multilateralists approach through the United Nations has been blocked in too many cases by the United States, whether regarding IDA replenishment, the law of the sea or other measures, it is especially important that regional groupings such as the ACP and the Commonwealth, play a positive role in bridging the gap that has been left by the derogation of the United States of its international responsibilities for development.

The Minister referred to the importance of trade, and to the fact that trade alone is 30 times the EDF aid contribution. But we need a recovery programme to promote that trade. The Government have responded with a low Lomé. They have opted for the lower figures, and the cautious and inherently conservative approach. When it came to proposals from the Commonwealth, as made, for example, at New Delhi in 1983, the Government did not even say yes to a low recovery programme, but no. That is why in practice we have reservations about Lomé III and are critical of the role that the Government have played in its negotiation. There has been no response to the genuine needs of Third world countries, such as was shown in the negotiation of Lomé I, by Claude Cheysson, Jan Pronk and my right hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale. For that reason, although we shall not oppose the order and although we wish the ACP countries well in achieving the ambitious objectives of Lomé III, we criticise the Government's response to those demands and the way in which they have negotiated during the past 14 months.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): It is sad that this seems to be the only debate that we shall have on the Lomé convention and its signature. I sincerely hope that the Opposition and my right hon. Friend the Minister will press for a longer debate. Although I do not criticise the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) for taking fully half an hour of a one and a half hour debate on this important subject, the time allotted to the House is too short for this important question.

Although the Lomé conventions have anticipated trying to increase trade with the ACP countries, they have succeeded in reducing the volume of trade that the ACP countries have enjoyed with the European Community. In 1974, 17 per cent. of the European Community's imports came from ACP countries. By 1982, only 13·8 per cent. of total imports into the EC came from ACP countries. Therefore, despite the intent of the Lomé agreements entered into by the right hon. Member for Clydesdale (Dame J. Hart) and others, the agreements have failed to increase trade with ACP countries. That is a stark fact, and from that background we should approach our approval or lack of it for Lomé III.

Unfortunately, Lomé III does not alter the position. Indeed, the trade provisions have been translated straight from Lomé II into Lomé III and, therefore, there has not been much improvement on that.

I shall confine my remarks to one or two observations rather than try to make an overall assessment of the Lomé III agreement. First, I mention the promotion of dialogue by the EC and the rejection of that by the ACP countries on the grounds that we were interfering in their internal affairs. If there is to be a relationship between the EC and the countries that we are trying to help, there must be agreement on the economic backgrounds at which they are aiming so that the projects financed by the EC fit into the pattern that is agreed between the partners in the development of trade and infrastructure. To reject that sensible approach is a retrograde step.

The way in which human rights are dealt with in those countries was severely watered down by the ACP countries' negotiators, although my right hon. Friend managed to get into the preamble of the convention a reaffirmation of the contracting partners' adherence to the United Nations charter and their faith in fundamental human rights. During the three Lomé agreements, EC aid persisted to countries which were in flagrant violation of human rights conventions and all decent human behaviour. I remind the House especially of Uganda under President Amin, when EC assistance persisted unabated to that regime. More controversially, EC aid continued to the Grenada revolutionary government.

Hon. Members are in serious difficulties when they try to find out what is happening to the administration of the EDF by DG8 in Brussels. All that we get from my right hon. Friend in answer to questions is that he does not know, because these are the responsibilities of the European Community, not his. We allocate a large sum from our ODA budget to those people in Brussels and then forget about it. We do not ask, nor do we know, how it is being administered. We cannot ask questions or get sensible and properly detailed replies.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's comments about the aid given to Uganda during Idi Amin's regime, but I expected him to deal with the present position there. I hope that he will not disappoint the House in that respect.

Mr. Wells: I am being invited to take more of the House's time. I hope that it will not be to the disadvantage of the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who will wish to speak in the debate. The present position in Uganda is equally horrific, as far as I can gather, especially from reports in The Sunday Times this weekend. We must re-examine our bilateral aid in that connection, and the fact that we are stepping up bilateral aid to a regime that is obviously unable to control what is happening in terms of human rights.

I should deal briefly with co-ordination. It is terrible that, in some overseas countries, the EC representative is often in competition with bilateral aid representatives, such as the ODA development division or the diplomatic mission from France, in respect of funding projects. If the host country cannot get money from anywhere else, it will go, reluctantly, to the EC, which gets the worst projects that no one else will pick up. Of course, the EC picks them up with alacrity. However, the host country does not go to the EC in the first place, because the administration of programmes by Brussels is, to say the least, Byzantine. Indeed, the word "Byzantine" could be overtaken in modern parlance by the word "EC-tine", if that is not too horrible a word.

It takes endless time to negotiate money out of the Community. I refer the House to the extraordinary behaviour of the Community on replacement aircraft for the Leeward Islands Air Transport. After immense investigation, it recommended that it would not supply the aircraft requested—the British Aerospace 748—but that it would supply an aircraft which had not yet been built or tested—and in two years' time, although the Caribbean islands wanted it to support their tourist trade this year. Extraordinary administration and rules can result in extraordinary decisions. I hope that my right hon. Friend will increase his supervision of the programme and sort out the administration in Brussels so that it works properly.

What is meant by the new chapter on sociocultural co-operation? I have no idea what it means. If it means that more money will seep into the sand by spending it on beautiful girls dancing with hoolahoops in the Pacific or under flaming swords in the Caribbean, I do not think that is a proper way to spend money.

I support what the hon. Member for Vauxhall said about sugar. Events in connection with Portugal are a disgrace. We export sugar and depress the world market, so not enabling countries to earn their own living. That is something that we must redress, and it is worth far more than the money coming through the EEC.

The multi-fibre arrangement is a restriction on trade by the Community which is unjustified by the figures. The EEC may fear competition from within its ranks, in particular in Britain or from north America, but not from Commonwealth countries or the poorest countries in the world.

We must consider the whole of the package in relation to our whole aid budget. We are in extreme difficulty because of the contraction of the budget. The effect of that contraction is serious. The amount of money devoted to multilateral aid, including EEC aid, has increased from about 19 per cent. of our bilateral aid budget five years ago to nearly 45 per cent. That explains why we have had to be a little parsimonious in relation to the agreement. It also explains why we are pushed in every other way in our bilateral aid programme.

We have no alternative but to press the Government to increase the resources available to the ODA budget. The way to start is to replace the £100 million spent extraordinarily last year on aid to sub-Saharan Africa so that that extra amount is available for bilateral aid.

Much more could be said about the Lomé agreement, but I cannot sit down before congratulating my right hon. Friend on the way in which he has negotiated the agreement, which will provide major benefits to some of the poorest countries in the world.

11.8 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells). His knowledge and concern about such matters are special and deserve recognition. Time is short and I shall try to be brief. The hon. Member is right to criticise the usual channels, or the Government — or whoever determines the length of our debates.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Government.

Sir Russell Johnston: I have no reason to dispute that the Government determine the length of debates.

As the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) said, the sad aspect of the debate is that, despite the reference to women and other matters, Lomé III is not fundamentally different from Lomé II. The EDF is much the same, allowing for population growth and inflation. ACP exports are not in a notably more favourable position. Indeed, as the Minister said, they have even declined. However, in fairness, it must be said that the United Kingdom adopted a more flexible position than other countries—partly as a reflection of our less significant agricultural sector. I admit to a certain amount of cynicism in these matters. I suspect that if we faced the same agricultural pressures as the French, we would probably take the same attitude. Therefore, it is not really all that fancy to take a superior view.

The Alliance believes that the Community has failed in the negotiations to respond to the gathering Third world crisis that has been so well summed up in Brandt 1 and Brandt 2. We have had caution where a certain amount of boldness was required and prudence where generosity was needed.

The Minister said—and I agree with him—that trade is the touchstone of a genuine wish to help the developing countries within the ACP to achieve progress in a developing world, and it was certainly a prime objective of the negotiations. There was the resistance of France, Italy and the other southern European countries to any openness about CAP product competition. That is understandable, but it means that the trade balance between Lomé and the EEC has moved very much towards the EEC.

I understand that the ACP countries were looking for 10 billion ecu for aid, but received 7·4 billion. That reduction was, in the main, due to the resistance of the British and the Germans. That is regrettable. The Minister has his perpetual look of slight puzzlement——

Mr. Raison: How the hon. Gentleman can talk about a reduction when there was a 60 per cent. increase baffles me. That was why I was looking puzzled.

Sir Russell Johnston: Statistics can be made to prove almost anything. I certainly do not think that, in real terms, aid has been increased by 60 per cent. If we take into account population growth and inflation, that sort of figure is not real. For a Minister who is part of a Government who have cut back the United Kingdom's aid contribution to its lowest point to say that is not to be reasonable.

I wish to make two brief points to underline what has been said by other hon. Members. First, I hope that the Minister will say something about the pace of procedures, which the hon. Member for Vauxhall rightly criticised. As we are supposed to be the efficient part of the world, surely we should be able to do something about that.

Secondly, I admit to being equivocal about the issue of dialogue and human rights raised by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford. It is natural to say when looking at Amin — or, now Obote — that we should not be helping such a tyrannical Government. At the same time, I find it difficult to accept the argument that some poor peasant's irrigation will be stopped because he is unlucky enough to be saddled with a tyrannical Government. This is not a simple issue and it will never have a pat solution. I appreciate the Government's difficulty but that difficulty would exist in any event.

Although the hon. Member for Vauxhall was right to say that general commodity agreements would have been better, STABEX was an inspired concept. It made a notable difference and could have made more of a difference. Only a minority of ACP countries have been major recipients, and the fund, as has been said, has been severely under-financed.

It is regrettable that there has been no evident improvement as a consequence of Lomé III in the funding and extent of STABEX, and that also represents a criticism of the commitment of the EC countries to the the development of trade, because the two aspects are inextricable.

I said that the Lomé concept was good, even if many of the poor countries were excluded for historical reasons, but I cannot say that we have succeeded in seeing a sustained advance through Lomé I to III, and part—I agree not all—of the responsibility for that rests on Her Majesty's Government.

To end on a positive note, I respond happily to the Minister's reference to the impending Lomé assembly in Inverness. It is greatly to be welcomed that such international conferences are not to be confined to the metropolitan centres of the United Kingdom. At Eden Court, Inverness has the most modern theatre in the United Kingdom. and I know that the ACP and European Parliament representatives will find in Inverness not only a warm Highland welcome but facilities second to none.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I, too, will be brief, because at least two of my hon. Friends wish to speak before the Minister replies.

We are dealing tonight with an agreement which, although it relates to many Third-world countries, concerns about only 15 per cent. of the Third-world population. Most of the countries are former colonies and what we have seen in the institutionalisation of Lomé I, II, and III is the creation, as it were, of a network of client states gathered around the EEC. Many of them might wish to be doing something else in terms of their trade with the rich countries, but they are stuck with the Lomé system, and most of them are too scared and not in an economic position these days, in view of world recession, to escape from it.

The impetus, therefore, is on the rich countries of the EEC—the 10 member states—to try to improve the terms of Lomé from one Lomé convention to another. That has not happened on this occasion.

As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) rightly said, the amount of aid is roughly equivalent to Lomé II, allowing for inflation. I am not certain that it has allowed for population increase—indeed, I do not think it has—but I shall return to that shortly.

A disturbing feature of the aid package is the increased emphasis on programme aid. I have grave reservations generally about programme aid to developing countries, partly because we cannot monitor it sufficiently well and partly because, in principle, it is objectionable. We should be concentrating on development projects, and they should be responsible for raising the revenue. If they cannot do that, we must look more fundamentally at their production, agriculture, and so on, rather than just give them money on a temporary basis.

There is also great emphasis on private capital. That may be part of the Government's general economic policies in relation to the rest of the world. We are dealing with some of the poorest countries, and I cannot believe that there are many profitable opportunities for private capital in many of the 65 or so Lomé convention countries. To believe that private capital would make up the differences is to indulge in wishful thinking.

One of the factors that is worsening conditions, apart from the general world recession, is the rapid growth in population, especially in African countries. Does the Lomé convention say anything about the need for appropriate population policies in such countries? Is any part of the aid programme geared, as is part of our own programme, to mother and child health care, family planning and the provision of contraceptive facilities, for example?

Lomé III is not better than Lomé II, and it might be slightly worse when it comes to trade. As the Minister fairly observed in his opening remarks, the proportion of trade between the ACP countries and the Community has declined. The Community has probably benefited slightly in that its share of trade has fallen less than that of the ACP countries in Community markets.

There is a difficulty, because many of the countries with which we are concerned are basically agricultural communities, and they come up against the protectionism of the CAP. That is a major factor which inhibits the growth of exports and their means of earning sufficient foreign exchange to enable them to pay for essential imports and to improve their living standards generally. It is regrettable that, unlike Lomé II, no sugar arrangement has been negotiated. I do not know whether that is still on the cards and may come about subsequently. Sugar arrangements are important to a number of countries, not only those in the Caribbean. For example, they are important to Fiji and Mauritius.

The Lomé agreement is supposed to be a marvellous example of North-South co-operation, but it has become institutionalised. It is concerned solely with trade and aid; but I recognise that both are important. However, the ACP countries have not been able to get the 10 member states to change their policy at the World Bank and the IMF. Such institutions have a much greater impact on the life and economic development prospects of ACP countries than anything which happens under Lomé I, II or III.

The debt problems of many of the countries that come within the debate have not been addressed by the convention. If it provides a forum for some sort of North-South discussion, these matters should be alluded to, discussed and referred to in a communiqué with continuing discussions after the ratification of the convention. The agreement is not a good one, but it is probably the best that could be hoped for from the EEC. There is a danger that Lomé agreements will become increasingly institutionalised, bureaucratic and set in their ways. That is unfortunate, because we need above all greater openness and flexibility and a willingness to consider the point of view of the other side. I do not think that we are seeing signs of that at present.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Newport, West): I shall not detain the House long because I know that Opposition Members wish to contribute to the debate. I welcome the fact that the agreement has been reached and that the order is before the House.

The point made by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) is worth repeating. The Government showed considerable flexibility in the negotiations compared with some of our European partners arguing their case both strongly and strenuously for improvements, not all of which they were able to achieve at the end of the day.

Having listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), I could not help thinking—this case was advanced eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells)—that the Lomé agreement is not the handle upon which to hang the case for increased development assistance.

We are well aware of the problems in Africa—the drought and the need for food aid. I agree with the hon. Member for Vauxhall that as soon as practicable we must move the emphasis from emergency food aid and look seriously at the medium and long-term programmes for giving support in the drought-affected countries, and also learn the lessons of the second major drought in 10 years. We must find a way to provide additional resources for such programmes, in the hope that, as the years go by, we can help to prevent a recurrence of that sort of tragedy. I do not think that the Lomé agreement is necessarily the means to achieve that aim.

We have heard this evening about the slowness of procedures within the EEC and the difficulties that the signatories to the Lomé convention have in battling their way through them. Although some Lomé signatories may be disappointed with the end product of the agreement, I still believe that our Commonwealth friends will welcome the third agreement as the best that could be achieved in the circumstances. Certainly it should be seen as yet another important landmark in the continuing co-operation with our Commonwealth partners.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson) made a very telling point, not so much in his speech as in his intervention, when my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), certainly to my satisfaction, was able to remind the House of the importance of resources. It is not enough to talk about new means of negotiating, agreeing, getting together, drawing up future structure plans, and so on, if the resources are not to be made available. To that extent, the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) was right to mention the Government's record on aid, but an increase of 60 per cent. to a country with inflation running at 800 per cent. does not represent very much.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) was right to remind us that the ACP countries represent 65 Third world countries, and only 15 per cent. of the population of the Third world. That is a very limited number of people in relation to the full potential available to the EEC and the challenge that lies before us.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for his references to Uganda. I appreciated the fact that he reduced the length of his speech to enable some of us to take part in the debate. I wholly endorse what he said. There is a growing worry about current events in Uganda. If the recent report of Amnesty International in yesterday's Sunday Times is only half right, we should be worried.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Is there not a danger that, with the press publicity given to Uganda, we shall concentrate too much on Uganda and ignore some of the other signatories to the Lomé agreement? It may be that in Uganda the Opposition parties are not being dealt with in accordance with the standards that are accepted as normal and reasonable in Western Europe, but, after all, they do have an Opposition. There are other Lomé countries, such as Mozambique, Angola and Ethiopia, which do not even allow an Opposition to exist.

Mr. Clarke: I have never believed that one ought to be selective about human rights. If the right hon. Gentleman takes that view, he will join us in saying that, leaving aside the Opposition in Uganda, there seems to be clear evidence of the type of unacceptable oppression that took place under Idi Amin. That must be just as unacceptable today.

Lomé has funds, but it is not yet appearing as an instrument for development to the extent that we should all like. The Minister is in danger of being oversensitive yet again—I remind him that he has the right of reply—as he told the House of the words of Edgard Pisani, who also said:

"The fact remains that without major changes ACP/EEC co-operation will soon appear to be useless through its failure to get to the roots of the ills that it sets out to cure."

That is a fair comment. When considering these matters, it is reasonable to bear in mind the immediate problems and how much progress is being made in development policies and in encouraging the countries involved to take development seriously.

I accept some of the Minister's criticisms about duplication in projects and too many prestigious projects. I have said much the same in earlier debates. I accept his anxieties about food self-sufficiency, but we should remember what the President of Botswana said about the need for a new international economic order. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow rightly reminded us of the problems of the world debt crisis, inflation, recession and the decline in exports and the falling commodity prices of Third world countries. I regret that Lomé III does not appear to address itself to those problems.

Nevertheless, I wish Lomé III well in the spirit of urging an end to the political in-fighting so that a strategy for the future might be prepared. The important role of agriculture, food production and development should not be forgotten. If the ACP countries take that view, there can be a genuine response from Europe, which will therefore accept some criticism about its policies, especially about protectionism and the growing food surpluses. If we can achieve that, we shall have made tremendous strides.

Mr. Raison: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate. I cannot take up every point that has been made—there have been many—and I shall write to hon. Members about matters that I am unable to deal with.

The response of the House has been a little too niggardly. I realise that party politics occasionally enter our deliberations and sometimes lend a certain colour to the attitude of the Opposition to what the Government are doing. I have been frank about the weaknesses of Lomé. I have not tried to pretend that it has all been perfect, but we are discussing something of real importance in respect of which the balance of advantage is clear.

Lomé III is different from the predecessor conventions in a number of worthwhile respects, some of which were mentioned in the debate. The trade provisions have been strengthened, and that was brought about by the British effort. We made the running in trade matters.

There are other ways in which the new convention is an improvement on its predecessors. One is the so-called policy dialogue. We did not get all that we should have liked, but I was closely involved in the negotiations and the new provisions will ensure that we can have a more thorough discussion about the policy context in which aid is given than has been possible in the past. The Government believe that that is necessary and I believe that it will make the new instrument more effective than its predecessor. It will include an emphasis on sectoral matters, a topic that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) queried. Sectoral discussions are at the heart of the policy dialogue—moving on from a discussion of the project in isolation to look at a whole area, whether farming, mining or whatever.

There are also other respects in which the new convention is better than its predecessors. In terms of the resources made available, the ACP countries have got a very good deal.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Minister in his opening speech said that provisions for sugar, rum and banana crops had been improved. Would not it make sound sense to the ACP cane sugar producing countries if Portugal took much more cane sugar and much less EEC-produced beet sugar?

Mr. Raison: I do not dispute what the hon. Gentleman says. It would be better for the ACP countries if Portugal took more than the 75,000 tonnes that was agreed. But no one fought harder than the United Kingdom on behalf of the ACP sugar producers. If we had not fought the battle, they would not have got the 75,000 tonnes. We can again claim that the British contribution was one of considerable importance.

[Mr. Raison]

It is not possible for me to cover everything in the three minutes that remain, but the important matter of human rights was mentioned by a number of hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), who, as always, made a thoughtful and interesting speech. The issue was looming throughout the negotiations, but it was not settled until the end. It was unquestionably one of the difficult aspects of the negotiations.

The United Kingdom and a number of other Community member states felt that it would be wrong entirely to dissociate the granting of Community aid from respect by recipient countries for human rights. It is well known that a number of ACP countries objected to that, because they claim that the basis of the Lomé convention is that it is a treaty between equal parties and that it imposes a contractual obligation to give aid, regardless of anything else.

However, we are concerned about human rights, and the final text agreed with ACP states clearly reaffirms the contracting parties' adherence to the principles of the United Nations charter and their faith in fundamental human rights. That is a firm basis on which we can build. We are also able to reach agreement with the ACP states on a joint declaration reiterating our deep attachment to human dignity and reaffirming our commitment to work to eliminate all forms of discrimination. That includes apartheid.

Those texts will not, in themselves, bring about a radical improvement in human rights in many states. The contractual nature of the convention and the need for predictability in planning development mean that the disbursement of aid cannot simply be a function of changes in the degree to which human rights are observed. Nevertheless, the texts are contained in the covention and can therefore be invoked in the most flagrant cases in which elementary human rights are abused. They are important and reflect the concern that has been expressed this evening by hon. Members.

The multi-fibre arrangement was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has told the House that the Government, while favouring a further multi-fibre arrangement, want it to be more liberal, with improvements concentrated upon suppliers who themselves have liberal import regimes and, of course, upon the poorest suppliers. That has always been the point of view of this country——

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business).

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft European Communities (Definition of Treaties) (Third ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 23rd May, be approved.

Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

11.40 pm

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): I am initiating a debate on a proposed cut in funding of £1·1 million from a budget of £1·7 million for the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering at Bush estate, Penicuik. This is part of the overall reduction of about £4 million in agricultural research expenditure.

The lunacy of cutting back upon agricultural research in Scotland is compounded by the swipe that is being taken at the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering, to be found in the consultative document. Mr. David Hinton, convenor of the labour and machinery committee of the Scottish National Farmers Union, said:

"Our initial reaction to this document"——

he was referring to the consultative document——

"is one of concern. The Scottish Office have proposed massive cuts in the funding of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering. The engineering work carried out at the SIAE has concentrated on the special needs of the Scottish industry, many sectors of which are markedly different from those in England and Wales. Provision must be made to continue an adequate basis for Scottish Research in this important field . . . The union is in the process of assessing the complete Agricultural Research and Development picture in Scotland. We will—in due course—be submitting detailed suggestions on the future of Research and Development in Scotland. We recognise the need for increasing efficiency but we reiterate our opposition to the scale and timing of these proposed cuts which owe more to dogma than logic."

I suggest that dogma and logic are a regular hallmark of this Government's actions. When challenged one can only describe their answers by using Edmund Burke's classic descriptiion: the economy of truth.

It was a classic example of hamfistedness when the staff of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering at Bush estate, Penicuik, read in The Scotsman that their jobs were under threat. The policy of "shoot first, tell later", was confirmed on 18 May when they learned that the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, which finances the seven Scottish agricultural research institutes—the Bush estate, Penicuik section being one of them—had published a discussion paper entitled "A Strategy for Agricultural Research and Development." It detailed the financial cuts to be made in applied agricultural research in Scotland.

At present, only 7 per cent. of the £31 million Scottish agricultural research and development budget is spent on engineering. The proposed cuts would reduce this figure to less than 2 per cent., a cut of 70 per cent. The annual budget of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering of £1·7 million will thus be reduced to about £500,000 or £600,000. One would damage one's eyesight if one tried to find any reason in the document for singling out engineering for such a savage cut. That outrageous proposal is made to stand on its head when one realises that just three months ago the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland published a document entitled "Agricultural Research and Development 1985" in which much of the work of the Bush estate institute was highlighted as being topical and of high priority. Within two months, the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland did an about-turn. Long-term research programmes given priority in March were discarded in May.

Today, I have received a letter from the Scottish NFU. It will be making a submission. The union will be pointing out that over four months the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has completely altered its view of the value of agricultural research in Scotland. I do not want to go into the letter in detail, but it is a powerful indictment of the Government's policy and attitude.

A study of the consultation document reveals a number of striking inconsistencies, omissions and errors of logic in addition to a number to debatable statements and conclusions.

One criterion put forward by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland for the allocation of research and development funds is that output at present in surplus should receive less support. However, a respected committee of the Royal Society headed by Professor Bernard Crossland showed recently that a lack of research and development in the agricultural engineering industry between 1966 and 1980 led to a 2·6 per cent. decline in exports and a 112 per cent. increase in imports. Applying the logic of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, the industry merits the additional funding recommended by that committee rather than the proposed cuts.

The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland states its intention to support high quality research, some parts of which serve as the United Kingdom's focus of excellence. It fails to acknowledge that section of the Bush estate as a United Kingdom centre of research into the mechanisation of the potato crop in which it has an international reputation.

The Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering on the Bush estate is also internationally recognised for its work on soil compaction, and on the behaviour of agricultural machinery on sloping ground.

The potato crop and soft fruits are singled out as important commodities in Scottish agriculture and yet those are the sectors of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering expertise which in the past have received a low priority, or have been discouraged by the agricultural heads in New St. Andrew's house in Edinburgh.

I wish to deal with some of the economic benefits of the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering. There are considerable potential economic benefits from the application of its research programmes. For a modest cost to the Department of £1·7 million per annum as well as reductions in input costs those benefits include, first, increased cereal yields through a combination of optimum soil structure, the elimination of losses due to compaction effects from straw disposal, adoption of a zero traffic system with broadcasting, and subsoil loosening. These have a potential worth of £177 million per annum in Scotland alone. The use of soil engineering to limit forest windthrow could be worth £7 million per annum in Scotland.

Secondly, grazing improvements in Scotland through strip seeding have an estimated potential value of £39 million per annum. Improved straw incorporation techniques could save £1·8 million per annum while gains from shallow ploughing could be £5 million per annum. Examples of the value to Scotland of ad hoc development work are the chicken feeder, with a saving of £2·5 million per annum, and crop deflectors, with a saving of £500,000.

Thirdly, the introduction of the institute's developed equipment and techniques to reduce potato damage could save up to £126·7 million per annum.

Fourthly, the elimination of tractor overturning accidents could save United Kingdom resource costs of £3·8 million per annum.

Fifthly, optimal forage conservation in the cool wet climate of Scotland could increase the value of home-produced forage for this region by up to £190 million per annum.

Sixthly, agriculture energy savings of £5 million per annum could be achieved in Scotland simply through efficient management based on the institute's work at the Bush estate.

Seventhly, the machine loads investigation could lead to savings for the United Kingdom in material costs of non-rotary soil working tools of £1·4 million per annum.

Eighthly, adoption of mechanical harvesting of raspberries by Scottish growers, based on the institute's machine specification, would increase profitability by £1·4 million per annum.

The benefits identified for Scotland alone would total £424 million per annum. For northern Britain, this figure could be doubled. Addition of the benefits identified for the United Kingdom as a whole — £101 million per annum—gives a total of £949 per annum. The potential benefit:cost ratio from the application of that programme in asingle year would be 500:1. If even 20 per cent. of the benefits were achieved to give a benefit:cost ratio of 100:1, this would be excellent value for public money by any standards. The benefits that are achieved will continue far beyond the duration of the projects on which they were based. Meanwhile, the cost resources can be devoted to new work to generate new potential benefits. The scale of benefit projected for the present programme is broadly similar to that obtained for completed past projects—for example, the x-ray separator — and for similar work elsewhere.

In amplifying my case, I want to quote an unsolicited letter that I received from Findlay, Irvine Ltd. It is captioned:

"Scottish institute of Agricultural engineering."

The letter states:

"The proposal to cut the budget of the S.I.A.E. by a figure (according to the Press) of £1·1 million out of a budget of £1·7 million is a very damaging one. We have worked with The Bush for nearly twenty years, and although we cannot judge the quality of all their work, the projects with which we have been involved have been relevant to the needs of agriculture, and their research has produced useful devices.

For instance, the Bush Recording Soil Penetrometer which is made here and sold worldwide, was originally designed at The Bush. Sales are steadily growing and make a worthwhile contribution to employment by a small local manufacturer. Research institutes in the USA, Australia, New Zealand, India, Malaysia, and Iran have all bought this instrument simply because it is the most advanced in the world.

Cuts in civil service expenditure have my full support but one has to be selective. Cuts at the S.I.A.E. would strike at precisely the kind of wealth-creating process the Government is trying to foster."

I should like to call in aid a report on tractor safety, for the saving of lives should have the same priority in the agriculture industry as in any other industry. The institute's work on safety is unique in Britain. It is of vital social concern, and has a worldwide reputation. The

[Mr. Alexander Eadie]

United Kingdom focus of excellence on that subject is at the institute. It is a proper research topic for public funding. The institute's work is highly valued by the Health and Safety Executive, which respects its independent position and is unable to commission similar work at any other centre in Britain, including its own research laboratories.

There are an estimated 85,000 farm accidents annually in Britain, of which 1,244 are tractor overturning accidents. The total resource costs to the British economy of those accidents is £94·3 million and £3·8 million, respectively, but the average cost of tractor overturning accidents is disproportionately high at four times the average cost of other accidents. Small and medium-sized farms account for more than 85 per cent. of total unreported accident costs. Those farms are situated predominantly in less favoured areas, and the clear relevance of tractor safety on slopes research to the hill and upland areas points to the acute need for funding such research in Scotland. The work is directly applicable to other land uses in the upland areas, especially forestry.

The institute has been conspicuously successful so far. The comprehensive research on the causes of tractor overturning accidents now provides standard training material used by colleges of agriculture, the Health and Safety Executive, the agricultural training board and the advisory services throughout the United Kingdom. The institute slope monitor and four-wheel drive engagement alarm have both been taken up commercially. The main goal of the institute's work, however, is yet to be reached —determining when a tractor is being operated safely on a slope and when it is not. Currently the tractor driver still has to operate in total ignorance of his degree of safety. If the institute's work is interrupted or terminated now, the real benefit of its achievements will be largely lost to the farming community.

The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland proposes to set up a form of contingency fund. The annual cost of that will eventually almost match the slash in the engineering budget. But the Department has no idea what it wants the fund for. Perhaps it is following too closely the example of our southern neighbour, the Agricultural and Food Research Council, from which it takes scientific advice. It has found a need for a contingency fund, probably because it is an organisation that stands alone. However, the Department is part of the Scottish Office and has always benefited from the flexibility — to the extent that it has never needed a separate contingency fund at any time in the past 40 years. It is therefore totally inappropriate to set up such a fund when drastic cuts in the budget are proposed.

The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has declared a set of priorities for agricultural research in Scotland. Engineering has a vital, often fundamental, contribution to make to each and every one of them. All that potential is put at risk by the ambition to have a contingency fund—the latest status symbol. Now it may be argued that the Department has been obliged to prepare its consultation document at short notice to satisfy the demands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce expenditure. However, the manner in which engineering has been selected to bear the brunt of those costs betrays a lack of knowledge and appreciation of the serious long-term consequences for Scottish agriculture. The indecent haste associated with the consultative document published in May — a response has been demanded for June—makes it vital that the Secretary of State should be made aware of the serious consequences that can only be described as senseless agricultural vandalism in Scotland.

All those concerned with the welfare of Scottish agriculture should ensure that their views are known to the Government. The Scottish Institute for Agricultural Engineering at Bush estate in Penicuik should be expanded, not contracted.

When I led a deputation on Friday to meet one of the Minister's hon. Friend's, and I argued that the consultation period was inadequate, he said that we had nothing to worry about and that the consultative period would be extended. Will the Minister confirm that the consultative period will be extended, and that we will not be involved in decision-making at the end of June after a May publication?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I congratulate the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) on raising this debate and on the way he has presented his case. I have listened carefully and with interest to the points he has made.

The Scottish Institute for Agricultural Engineering is one of seven Scottish agricultural research institutes which are funded by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland through the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. These institutes, together with those of the AFRC, constitute the agricultural and food research service which is an extremely powerful scientific capability available to meet the needs of the United Kingdom agriculture industry.

The programmes of research and development, which are commissioned by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, aim to advance scientific understanding and to improve the cost-effectiveness of the output of plant and animal production systems, taking into account social, environmental and animal welfare considerations. The Scottish agricultural research institutes are centres that significantly contribute to, and in some cases lead, the agricultural research and development effort in the United Kingdom.

Our financial commitment is significant. For the current financial year the maintenance allocation to the seven institutes will total £20·1 million, with a further £3·5 million for capital, a total of £23·6 million, while a further £7·4 million of the Department's funding of the agricultural colleges goes to support research and development, comprising £6·9 million for maintenance and £0·5 million for capital. Since we came to office we have increased the level of maintenance grant to the Scottish research institutes. In 1978-79, the year before we came to power, Government allocations towards the maintenance costs of the Scottish agricultural research institutes totalled £9·4 million. In the current year we have allocated £20·1 million, an increase in real terms of 13 per cent. The corresponding figures for the Scottish Institute of Agricultural Engineering were £0·7 million in 1978-79 and £1·7 million in the current year—an increase of 26 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Eadie: Are those figures at 1983-84 prices?

Mr. MacKay: If the hon. Gentleman had listened, he would have realised that I gave the prices at the same year spent in that year, and that the percentage increase was in real terms.

Mr. Eadie: What year?

Mr. MacKay: It does not matter what year, because the figures were expressed in real terms.

In last year's public expenditure survey, the Government decided to reduce the public funding of agricultural research and development in 1986-87 and 1987-88. That decision, which was announced in the public expenditure White Paper published in January, reflects our aim that the industry should make a greater financial contribution to the funding of the research and development from which it benefits. The reductions are being shared by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland in the ratio of their expenditure on research and development. That means that, in Scotland, the planned provision for expenditure of about £32 million on research and development work at the Department's funded institutes and colleges will be reduced by about £3·1 million in 1987-88. That means that, in 1987-88, expenditure will be £28·94 million, which is a considerable sum to spend on research and development, and which does not merit some of the hon. Gentleman's lurid descriptions.

Having sketched the background, may I move to the consultation paper issued by the Department. Good management of any enterprise requires that its activities be monitored and reviewed to ensure that the essential objectives and needs are being met, and that it is responsive to shifts in the patterns of need and the demand for the services. The needs of the agriculture industry do not stand still. The industry would generally acknowledge the contribution which the work of research has made to efficiency and profitability today. In terms of yields and efficiency, the industry has developed at a tremendous rate since the end of the second world war. But the position is constantly changing. We are all familiar with the problem of surpluses; there is greater public concern for the future of the environment and its interface with agriculture; there is pressure to improve the welfare of farm animals; and there is considerable interest in the relationship between diet and health.

Against that background, it is essential that we review our strategy for the future of agricultural research and development, and that we assess the extent to which our resources are being devoted to the priorities that we consider most deserving of attention. It is also necessary to ensure that our priorities are right and that the taxpayer is getting good value for his money. In this context, it does not seem at all unreasonable to expect the prime beneficiaries from the fruits of agricultural research and development to make a contribution towards the costs. This is a matter which the Agricultural Departments are pursuing with the industry.

The present pattern and distribution of research institutes has existed for many years. Obviously there have been modifications in their programmes of research over time, but from time to time it is necessary to stand back and take a good, hard look at what is going on and to assess carefully how we should go forward. The consultation paper does just that, and proposes a strategy for the future, having regard to future reductions in public funding. It has been distributed widely to all interested parties, including the trade union interests. All the comments made will be thoroughly considered before final decisions are taken on the strategy for the future and on any organisational changes which may be required in the structure of the present research institutes.

The Scottish Institute for Agricultural Engineering, which is the subject of immediate concern to the hon. Gentleman, is one of the more recent institutes, having been founded after the war. It has close links with the National Institute of Agricultural Engineering at Silsoe in England; indeed, both institutes are governed by the same governing body, the British Society for Research in Agricultural Engineering. However, the governing body has appointed a Scottish committee to advise on the programme, staff, finances and management of the SIAE and on matters relating to activities in Scotland.

The hon. Gentleman raised several specific points about the proposals affecting the institute in tonight's debate and in a letter to my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State, who will be responding by letter to the hon. Gentleman. I also have a copy of the response to the consultation paper from the staff of the institute. The latter document is lengthy and comprehensive, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that all the points that he and the staff have made will be fully considered. Indeed, the Secretary of the Department has told the staff representatives that he will be glad to met them early in July to discuss their representations in detail before putting the overall position to Ministers for their further consideration.

However, I wish to comment on a few points. The hon. Gentleman alleged that insufficient time was allowed for the submission of comments on the proposals. I cannot accept that we are proceeding with undue haste. A period of more than six weeks was allowed for the submission of comments, which is surely not unreasonable, as is borne out by the fact that the staff at the SIAE were able to put together such a comprehensive response as the one they sent to us within one month.

I should make it clear that the consultation paper proposes reductions in funding of research on engineering, but it should not be taken as implying that there will be a cessation of research in engineering in Scotland. We fully accept that agricultural engineering has an important role to play in improving the efficiency of farming practice, and we intend to maintain an engineering capability in Scotland. But the scale of the effort must be assessed in relation to the competing claims on our scarce resources. Other areas of work will have to be covered to meet the required targets. It is essential that the Department concentrates its funding within engineering and other areas on the most productive research opportunities.

I refer now to the developing relationship between the agricultural engineering industry and the Government. The commitment of Government to support the industry has been clearly demonstrated by the creation in 1984 of the agricultural machinery partnership. This is a new initiative aimed at creating——

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Dispute)

1. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current teachers' pay dispute.

2. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the current teachers' pay dispute.

3. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current position over the teachers' strike.

6. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the current teachers' pay dispute.

12. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current situation with regard to the teachers' dispute.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): On 23 May the management panel of the Burnham committee increased its 1985 pay offer to 5 per cent. The teachers' panel rejected this, refused to go to arbitration and declined to address my 21 May initiative. That had carried forward my offer of July last year to consider carefully any restructuring package on which the employers and the teachers might agree. On 21 May I made plain the Government's readiness to make additional resources available for teachers' pay next year if agreement in principle could be reached by October on a reform of the current pay system designed to meet the Government's educational objectives and to provide improved promotion opportunities for good teachers. The Government are also seeking a clarification of teachers' duties and are prepared to consider alternative arrangements and funding for the midday supervision of pupils. This initiative requires a quick and constructive response if the prospect of a realistic and lasting settlement is not to be lost for yet another year.

Sir John Farr: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his efforts to raise standards in the teaching profession, parts of which seem determined to be dragged screaming and reluctantly into the next century. Does he believe that there are any prospects of the new talks in Burnham scheduled for 3 July taking place with any value at all? Does he feel that there is a risk of the NUT once again withdrawing from the discussions?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I acknowledge that most teachers are effective and hard working in dealing with an intensely difficult task. I cannot predict what will happen when Burnham meets again, but I hope that the interests of the children and teachers will prevail so that attention can be given to the bargain that I have invited the teachers and their employers to negotiate with a view, if the outcome is affordable and good for the children's education, to extra funding next year through the Government.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Following my right hon. Friend's helpful comment about the work of the vast majority of teachers—and observing that that, in my case, with all-party colleagues, is refreshed by recent evidence in primary schools throughout the country—does he agree that for the cause that they represent to be successfully prosecuted, it must have public support? Does he further agree that the recent industrial action has, sadly, much eroded that support among the people whom they must convince and who, in the end, will have to foot the bill?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree that the action chosen by the teachers to damage the education of children must be damaging to their own claim to professionalism in the eyes of the majority of the public.

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that a long-term settlement is the only sensible basis for a solution to the teachers' problem, and that the war of attrition being carried out by the teachers against the children in our schools is deplorable and no more than blackboard blackmail?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that I am entitled to recognise that most, if not all, of the initiatives taken by the Government outside pay have been such as to be welcomed by most teachers in the interests of good and better schooling in this country. Therefore, I agree that a long-term approach — coupled with appraisal, better promotion prospects and better career development, all of which are undertakings by the Government—is in the interests of the teachers and of the whole country.

Mr. Barnett: Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been drawn to a letter in The Times last Friday from a Peterborough headmaster illustrating the appalling damage that the right hon. Gentleman's policy is causing to education and to the teaching profession generally? Did the right hon. Gentleman note particularly the last paragraph of that letter, in which the headmaster made it clear:

"Our leaders are rich enough to be detached about money and too foolish to see where their daily slander leads"?

Sir Keith Joseph: Without impugning the sincerity of the writer of that letter, I think we can all agree that the bargain, which sooner or later will be struck, must be concerned with the interests of the children and of schooling in this country. I am sure that virtually every teacher would accept that.

Mr. Proctor: Did my right hon. Friend read the report in the News of the World magazine at the weekend describing the practice adopted by our hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, when he was a distinguished headmaster, of providing space in school reports for parents to comment on teachers? Does my right hon. Friend think that that practice should be spread throughout education? Will he also say something about the mechanism to be adopted for appraisal so that good teachers can be paid more?

Sir Keith Joseph: I normally take very seriously the views of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, but I have in mind that the method of appraisal should be broadly worked out by the teachers themselves and their employers. Informal appraisal is already carried out on a wide scale. I merely seek to make it formal, and I have put aside some taxpayers' money for pilot schemes to try out different methods in the next few years as soon as the teachers' unions allow them to take place.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance to the House and to teachers throughout the country that he will not use his veto if members of the Burnham committee wish to recommend an improved offer, as I have no doubt they would like to do, and that they should and will do so if standards of education in this country are to be improved?

Sir Keith Joseph: No Minister should inhibit himself from using the power of veto if it seems to him and to the Government to be in the interests of the public. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that it stems from the time of a Labour Government.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How is it possible for a police constable in Workington to be earning £9,234 a year, which is more than a head of department in many comprehensive schools in Cumbria? How is it possible for a 26-year-old constable on the beat in London to be earning more money than a deputy head in many comprehensive schools in Cumbria? How is it possible for the lowest grade of policeman to be earning more money annually than highly educated and professional people in the teaching profession? Is there not something wrong with the Government's system of priorities?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government are offering the teaching profession the prospect of a changed salary structure in return for improvements in effectiveness, the use of an expanded in-service training network and increased promotion prospects — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because at the time when the police pay structure was sharply altered, and as a result of the behaviour of the Labour Government, there was a great shortage of policemen. Pay arrangements must respond to recruiting, retention, motivation and quality factors, as policemen's pay then did. Secondly, the conditions and performance of policemen — for example, their lack of the right to strike — must be taken into account. I doubt whether most teachers would welcome the conditions of work of policemen.

Mr. Freud: Will the right hon. Gentleman define what he means by "affordable," and will his definition take into consideration the cost to the nation of not creating a decently-paid and highly motivated teacher force?

Sir Keith Joseph: I also take into account the cost to the children and to the nation of present standards, which, as I have explained time and again, are not entirely the responsibility of teachers. The salary scale for teachers must take account of their willingness to improve their average effectiveness, their acceptance of improved promotion prospects and their use of an expanded network of in-service training — all of which is either on offer or has already been announced by the Government.

Mr. Flannery: Will the right hon. Gentleman admit that children's education has been disrupted because of the Government's intransigence in paying such miserable wages to the teachers? Does he accept that the Burnham committee, due to the recent elections, has changed in character and that at its next meeting the authorities panel will be supporting the teachers? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that he must put some new money on the table, because tying it to all the other things in the package is holding things up? Is he further aware that at packed meetings throughout the country — I attended one last night — the teachers are planning to carry this dispute right up to the end of the year?

Sir Keith Joseph: But it was the teachers, led by the NUT, who decided to disrupt the children's education.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the present strikes are so rotting the behaviour and atmosphere in schools that they will make the lives of teachers much more difficult when normality is resumed?

Sir Keith Joseph: I fear that the teachers are setting a very bad example to pupils.

Mr. Radice: Why has the Secretary of State neither replied to nor acknowledged my letter to him of 19 June, in which I asked him for a meeting to discuss the teachers' dispute? Why has he not more enthusiastically welcomed the recall of the Burnham negotiating committee? I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he is still Secretary of State for Education and Science and not yet the Minister without Portfolio, which he is tipped to become. Why will he not for once take some positive, constructive action to end this highly damaging dispute?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am sorry if I have not answered the hon. Gentleman's letter. I shall do so immediately. I am glad to welcome the recall of the Burnham committee. The hon. Gentleman would have been more his honest self if he had phrased the latter part of his question by asking me why I was not producing more taxpayers' money. That is what he has in mind. The Government are willing to produce more taxpayers' money in return for an affordable bargain from the teachers.

Mowden Hall

4. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will transfer more of his Department's work to Mowden Hall.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department is committed to transferring areas of its work to Darlington where this is justified in terms of operational efficiency and cost, taking account also of the interests of London staff.

Mr. Fallon: Will my right hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the Darlington staff, whose work may not be glamorous but is important to the fulfilment of his Department's functions? Can he reassure me that he will continue to transfer work to Mowden Hall as and when necessary?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, gladly, and with genuine warmth, I pay tribute to the staff at Darlington, which I and my two colleagues have visited with pleasure.

Teacher Training

5. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current number of students entering training for teaching.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): The number of entrants to initial teacher training in the academic year 1984-85 was 16,707. Target intakes for the academic year 1985-86 are 17,652.

Mr. Freeman: Does my hon. Friend agree that one consequence of this damaging and prolonged dispute is the reduction in the number and quality of mathematics and science teachers coming into and remaining in the profession, since many have taken early retirement to take up jobs in industry?

Mr. Dunn: We are actively considering whether other intitiatives might be pursued by the Department, in concert with others, to improve the recruitment of teachers in shortage areas. We have recently received advice on this subject from the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers, and the Secretary of State's comments will be made known in due course.

Mr. Freud: Does the Minister accept that there is considerable unease and anxiety among those involved in initial teacher training about the roles of the institutions and the funding available? Is it not time that he made a clear policy statement on this matter?

Mr. Dunn: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the national and Wales advisory bodies have been invited to advise on the allocation of teacher training intakes to institutions in the public sector. The University Grants Committee is considering the distribution of intakes among universities. Its comments, and the response to them, will be made known in due course.

Teachers (Pay and Performance)

7. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with teachers' unions other than the National Union of Teachers on a package of proposals for restructuring pay and performance.

Sir Keith Joseph: Since last October I have had discussions touching upon these matters with the National Association of Head Teachers, the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, the Professional Association of Teachers and the Secondary Heads Association.

Mr. Maclean: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his reply will be greatly welcomed by the hundreds of dedicated teachers in my constituency who are not members of the NUT and who abhor that union's wrecking tactics? Does he agree—he would have the support of the House if he did—that we should push forward with negotiations with unions other than the NUT on appraisals and restructuring, and not allow the unrepresentative majority of the NUT on the Burnham committee to block all sensible negotiations?

Sir Keith Joseph: The statutory framework limits negotiations to Burnham. I am under pressure from many to seek legislative authority to change Burnham, and I remain ready to be convinced that that would be a useful step. However, that is the subject of a later question.

Mr. Ashley: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that any Minister who has to rely upon his veto or the veto of his officials to overcome the Burnham committee's recommendations will fight a losing battle? It is like trying to stop the tide. The role of King Canute does not become the right hon. Gentleman. He should accept the majority wish of the Burnham committee, if and when that recommendation is made.

Sir Keith Joseph: It was King Canute's courtiers, not the wise King Canute, with whom I think the hon. Gentleman is comparing me. How can the taxpayer be protected when the Burnham committee makes decisions about the spending of taxpayers' and ratepayers' money, unless someone has some power to set a limit, if necessary by veto, on what is agreed by those who do not pay for the consequences?

Mr. Key: Is my right hon. Friend absolutely determined to stick to the October deadline for agreement if there are to be additional resources next year? Many people think that, even with the best will in the world, that is not an attainable target. Furthermore, they believe that it plays into the hands of the NUT, which, by its unrepresentative and militant stand, is undermining the good work done by other teaching unions, such as the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government's choice of October is not an arbitrary one. It is the date before which decisions must be made if extra money is to be injected into rate support grant.

Mr. Skinner: Why does the Secretary of State not do something a little ingenious for a change? Why does he not go to the Treasury, when the Chancellor has gone missing, call at the Bank of England, when the Governor is on the golf course or on a foreign trip, get £100 million of the money that is needed to resolve the teachers' dispute, and say, "I am just doing a Johnson Matthey"?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is showing the degree of his ignorance if he thinks that there is £100 million lying about in either of those places.

Dame Jill Knight: What does my right hon. Friend think is the objective of calling out on strike teachers in constituencies which dare to return Conservative Members? Is the idea that we should go to my right hon.

Friend to make a special pleading? If so, how do we avoid giving the lesson to children that bad behaviour, threatening and bullying win through?

Sir Keith Joseph: I agree with my hon. Friend that the example that is being set is deplorable. To that must be added the ignoble and thoroughly deplorable practice of taking it out on children and their future, merely because, by chance, a particular person has been elected to represent the constituency.

Mr. Radice: How much money is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to put behind the package? I hope that it is more than the 2 per cent. which is rumoured in the press.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am glad to say to the House and to those outside who are concerned about this matter that it would be wise not to take too much account of what they read in the press.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Secretary of State aware that, if he had been able to pursue a more consistent package in the earlier stage of the negotiations, the response that he received from the organisations to which he referred when replying to this question might have provided him with an opportunity to resolve this damaging industrial dispute? Will he pursue a package, along the lines of that discussed with those associations, which will not only include a no strike deal but will put more money on the table and provide a long-term programme?

Sir Keith Joseph: The essence of the proposal, which was confirmed in my letter of 21 May, has been on offer since July last year—11 months.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the majority of teachers in my constituency and throughout Britain generally do not support the disgraceful industrial action that is doing so much damage and marring the education of our children? Will he therefore urgently examine ways of getting the talks on performance and pay under way, even if that means upsetting the politically motivated leaders of the NUT?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am sure that my hon. Friend is correct in saying that many teachers and some leaders of teachers' unions welcome the main features of the bargain proposed by the Government.

University Lecturers

8. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about salary scales for university lecturers.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department has received about 1,800 letters in the past two months on the pay of university academic and related staff.

Mr. Wareing: How does the Secretary of State justify the 20 per cent. cut in real terms in the pay of university lecturers since the Government came into office in 1979? Is that a sign of the Government's feelings about the true worth of those who are responsible for helping our young people to be properly trained? Is he aware of the burden that that places upon university lecturers at a time when the Government are cutting university finance by 2 per cent. per year? When will the Government see sense?

Sir Keith Joseph: The figures and judgment produced by the hon. Gentleman are the result of a selective choice of dates. I understand that university teachers' pay has kept pace with the cost of living.

Mr. Colvin: Has my right hon. Friend seen last week's Audit Commission report, which calculated that at least 75,000 extra students could be taught, in view of the present small classes? As well as agreeing new salary scales for college lecturers, should he not also find better ways to employ them more fully?

Sir Keith Joseph: My hon. Friend focuses upon something slightly different—the non-advanced level of further education upon which the Audit Commission has produced a significant report. With regard to universities, polytechnics and colleges, I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend and the House that the student-staff ratio in polytechnics has improved a great deal. It is nearer to what the Government judge to be the proper level for a student-staff ratio.

Mr. Pavitt: What representations has the Secretary of State received about the glaring injustice in the remuneration of university lecturers in medical schools when compared with similar employees in the NHS? Is it not about time that some comparability was achieved?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am aware of the problem and am, of course, waiting to see what the relevant authorities will recommend. Universities must live within their budget, which comes mainly from the public sector, and decide on their own priorities.

Mr. Rhodes James: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Audit Commission gave praise as well as blame? Would it not be nice if occasionally some praise were given to those who work in higher education?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I do that most gladly. I seem to be constantly praising — the latest occasion was in front of the Select Committee this morning — the outstanding reputation that our higher education system has across the world.

Mr. Beith: Is the Secretary of State convinced that the present salary levels, other than those in the clinical sector, are sufficient to attract people of the highest ability into university teaching in those subjects about which he is most worried?

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope that I am worried about all subjects. The Green Paper on higher education recognises that the essentially national system of pay is not necessarily the ideal way to attract the highest talents, and has invited comments upon possible alternatives.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept the gist of what I have put in early-day motion 805, relating to academics in higher education in the medical sector? Does he accept that the statement by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) is correct, and that a proper comparison should be made between those in the Health Service who administer health care and those who teach in the universities, and that their salaries should be comparable? It is no good awaiting reports. My right hon. Friend should act now to ensure that that is the case.

Sir Keith Joseph: I understand the essence of what my hon. Friend says, but there is a body called the clinical academic staff salaries committee which is considering how to reflect the salary arrangements made for doctors and dentists in the NHS in those made for clinical academic staff. I must await its advice and the reaction of the universities.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Instead of giving praise, will the Secretary of State find a little extra money for those who work in universities? Does he accept that there is not just a problem with the clinical staff and those who work in the NHS, but that there is also an increasing problem in science and technology, where there appears to be a growing brain drain from this country to the United States and Canada?

Sir Keith Joseph: On the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I accept that if evidence accumulates of a net brain drain, as opposed to an exchange of brains, the position is worrying. That is why I spoke only a week ago of the importance that I attach to the ABRC's recommendations for science. However, I warn the hon. Gentleman that, because he is always getting up and undertaking to spend more public money, the cumulative total will completely discredit his party.

Universities (Freedom of Speech)

9. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the Committee of Vice Chancellors and Principals about his proposals concerning freedom of speech in universities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Peter Brooke): My right hon. Friend has discussed this issue with the committee and will be doing so again next month. Recent events continue to give concern.

Mr. Stern: Will my hon. Friend press ahead with those discussions as soon as possible? Does he agree that recent events in some of our universities, involving militant action against free speech by tiny groups of students—tiny both in number and in mental stature—give rise to doubts, particularly in the case of the recent incident at Bristol university, about the fitness of such people to be in universities in the first place?

Mr. Brooke: I readily concur that the correspondence columns of the Bristol university periodical are a rich quarry on the subject of freedom of speech in an academic environment — indeed, with a vigorous freedom of speech of their own that is worthy of Burke.

Mr. Fatchett: Does the Under-Secretary of State recognise that tenured appointment for university staff has been an important element in safeguarding freedom of speech and thought in universities? Does he not realise that the Government's intention to threaten that tenure is causing great concern about the future of freedom of speech in universities?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has made it absolutely clear in what he has said about tenure that freedom of speech and of thought—academic freedom in total—will not be threatened.

Local Authority Expenditure

10. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Inspectorate's report on "Local Authority Expenditure Policies on Education Provision in England —1984".

Sir Keith Joseph: I authorised the report's publication and commend its measured analysis as essential reading to all concerned with the provision of education. I look forward to discussing its findings with the local authority associations.

Mr. Eastham: This report is highly critical of the Government. It points out that the Government's demands for new technology to be introduced into the curriculum leads to many problems for local authorities. Their school buildings need to be refurbished. Many of them were built in the 1950s and 1960s and considerable sums of money need to be spent upon them. If I may give a constituency example, the city of Manchester needs £10 million to carry out this work. That does not take into account the normal maintenance that has to be carried out by local authorities.

Sir Keith Joseph: I accept that there are shortcomings over the maintenance of school buildings that reach back over several Governments and very many years. However, the same report to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention criticises the management of resources by many local education authorities. They are spending money where it needs not to be spent, with the result that money is stinted where it ought to be spent.

Mr. Boyes: This report is a gross indictment of the Government's disgraceful, disgusting and unacceptable treatment of the education system. Highly qualified and trained teachers are being denied the buildings and the resources that are needed to provide our children with the basic education that they require.

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is guilty of selective quotation. The maintenance of buildings is criticised in the report, but it criticises as more significant still the combined effects of bad management by many local education authorities of public resources and ineffective teaching by a considerable minority of teachers.

Mr. Jim Callaghan: As a result of Her Majesty's Inspectorate's report on expenditure on schools, does the Secretary of State agree that crisis point has been reached in terms of school repairs? One shire county alone has a backlog of repairs amounting to £35 million. Is the Secretary of State aware that in my constituency, during the last year four schools have had to close because of lack of repairs and that one of them, Elm street, requires repairs amounting to £600,000? Will the Secretary of State help local authorities like mine to foot the bill for these repairs?

Sir Keith Joseph: Without condoning the position on repairs, I ask the House to realise that the same report said that there was scope for redeployment of public money in many local education authorities. The report, which Opposition Members are using as a quarry to criticise the Government, was not published by them in their time.

Mr. Radice: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in paragraph 14 of the report Her Majesty's Inspectorate—his own advisers—makes it clear that there is a link between resources and quality? Is he further aware that paragraph 89 points out that if we are to increase the level of achievement in our schools there must be more resources? So why is he cutting back central Government money to local education authorities by 9 per cent. in real terms over the next three years?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman continually quotes that figure, without adding that that figure was specifically described as provisional. As the report says, adequate resourcing is not a sufficient condition for sound education, but, that said, I accept that there is an association between satisfactory levels of resourcing and the quality of the educational process. There is no conflict between that finding and other evidence that there is only a slight correlation between levels of attainment, as measured by public examinations, and levels of spending on education.

Children (Lunchtime Supervision)

11. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the lunchtime supervision of children at schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I deeply regret the fact that members of the three largest teacher unions have, in pursuit of their pay claim, chosen to withhold their support from the head teacher in exercising his overall responsibility for the conduct of the school during the midday break. This has placed a great strain on the head teachers and I should like to express my respect for them and for their sense of duty towards the pupils—and to those who have helped them — in maintaining supervision over the past months. [HON. MEMBERS: "Humbug."] I am surprised that Opposition Members do not share that sense of respect. I have made public the Government's readiness to consider alternative arrangements and some additional funding for midday supervision in 1986-87 in return for a clearer definition of teachers' duties.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that I once supervised 1,500 school dinners every day? Therefore, I can well understand the agony recently expressed by head teachers over their problems with supervising school dinners, supervising schools, meeting parents during the lunch hour, supervising the neighbourhood of the school and so on. Is it not a terrible irony that after years of fighting for payment for lunchtime duty there has so far been no discussion by teaching unions of my right hon. Friend's offer of 21 May for payment for lunchtime duties?

Sir Keith Joseph: I very much hope that discussions on that matter will start fairly soon.

Mr. Madden: How many children will there be to supervise if the proposal in the Fowler review to scrap free school meals is implemented?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Fowler review is in Green Paper form. There will still be a need for midday meal supervision, whatever happens on that account.

Pupil Profile Pilot Schemes

13. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the pupil profile pilot schemes.

Mr. Dunn: Eight pilot schemes have been established in England and one in Wales. The schemes began in April this year and are expected to run for three years.

Mr. Evennett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer and I am sure that on the Conservative side of the House we applaud the introduction of those schemes. Does he agree that such schemes will prove invaluable to employers, in that when an individual comes before an employer for a job he will have something concrete, not just an academic paper qualification, which will tell the employer something about the individual? This is a great step forward in getting more jobs for our young people.

Mr. Dunn: There are many children who do not achieve academically but have other qualities that are of interest to a prospective employer and to the community at large. We believe that in time records of achievement will be of great use to all children, irrespective of their academic commitment and purpose.

Degrees and Qualifications (Sale)

15. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action his Department is to seek to take to stop the sale of degrees and academic qualifications.

Mr. Brooke: The Government believe that no solution is possible without legislation, but further proposals are being put to us, to which we are committed to giving serious consideration.

Mr. Cox: That reply is most warmly welcomed. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the widespread abuse in this country over the selling of bogus degrees and of the great harm that it does to the well-established colleges of education? Can he give an assurance that that legislation will come through in the next Session of Parliament?

Mr. Brooke: I join the hon. Member in deploring the practice of selling degrees or other academic qualifications. At their request, I recently met representatives of the Association of Business Executives, who have undertaken to set out a proposal which they think might avoid some of the difficulties described. This will be examined and considered on its merits.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend undoubtedly shares the horror and frustration felt throughout the country at the recent spate of bombings at airports and on aircraft. When she goes to Milan this week, will she add another British initiative in this matter by raising with other Heads of Governments and perhaps with Governments and flag carriers the possibility of a co-ordinated effort to counter such acts of terrorism and horror, particularly at airports?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. We all share the same horror at those desperate acts. I certainly will raise this at the European Council and I hope to discuss it with Vice-President Bush when he comes next week.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that I and my right hon. and hon. Friends wish warmly to congratulate the police on the remarkable detective work and the success that they have achieved against the Provisional IRA? We believe that the whole nation has cause to be grateful. Can the Prime Minister give us an assurance that all necessary resources will be provided in order to ensure that the police can fully and quickly undertake the painstaking search that they now have to undertake of hotels and boarding houses in all the resorts mentiond by Commander Crawshaw?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. As he knows, my right hon. and learned Friend will be making a statement on this matter shortly. We all warmly congratulate the police on preventing a disaster which was calculated to maim and kill many innocent people. All possible resources will be devoted to the task of the necessary search.

Q2. Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend not agree that in a bad week, when terrorists have terrified the world, it is high time that everyone united in congratulating the police on their brilliant anti-terrorist operations? Is it not time that the GLC anti-police Bill was withdrawn and that the sour and obstructive attitude towards the police by many Members in the Labour party was brought to an end?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, and indeed I have already indicated that we warmly congratulate the police on their success. I agree with him about the GLC anti-police Bill.

Mr. Winnick: Can the Prime Minister give any explanation at all why the Tory candidate in the current by-election goes about as if he has never heard of her? What possible explanation can there be for that?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that we have a candidate who is concentrating on putting across positive, constructive policies—[Interruption.] Those policies are the policies of our party. The Labour party attempts to personalise politics because it has no constructive policies to put across.

Q2. Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dobson: Does the Prime Minister recall her speech to the Welsh Conservative party conference in Swansea in 1980, when she said that Welsh people who wanted work would have to move to find it? Is that still her advice to the people who live in Brecon and Radnor? If it is, where does she suggest they go? Surely she cannot be suggesting her constituency of Finchley, where 3,000 people are on the dole.

The Prime Minister: In that speech I said that movement was a part of finding a job—[Interruption.] That is also mentioned in the employment White Paper published many years ago.

Dr. Blackburn: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the greatest blessing that a Government can give to the sick, the unemployed, the disabled and those on fixed incomes is—[HON. MEMBERS: "To resign".]—lower inflation? Will my right hon. Friend confirm to the House and to the nation from the Dispatch Box that that remains the paramount policy of Her Majesty's Government?

The Prime Minister: It is our policy to reduce inflation. Although at the moment it is higher than we would wish, it is lower than any level achieved by the Labour Government.

Mr. Beith: Why is the Government's representative in the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg arguing so adamantly in favour of the power of a Labour Government to nationalise industries without adequate compensation? Does the Prime Minister really believe that the shares that she has sold to large numbers of the British public should be open to renationalisation at a knock-down price?

The Prime Minister: The European Commission on Human Rights has pronounced on the case and the matter has now gone before the Court. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, we accept the Court's decisions, whatever they may be.

Q2. Mr. Douglas asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Douglas: May I make an appeal to the Prime Minister's scientific mind? The expectation of an event occurring which is one divided by 10 to the power of 53 is small. Is that not exactly the position of the Scottish miners, because 413 men have been re-employed, but not one of the 203 men from Scotland has been re-employed? Are we therefore correct in assuming that human intervention is involved? Will the Prime Minister now instruct the National Coal Board to pay the same attention and give the same justice to Scottish miners as to miners in other areas, so that some at least of the 203 men who have been dismissed will be re-employed?

The Prime Minister: I told the House what the Coal Board said when I replied last time. The hon. Gentleman is the first to know that the correct procedure for miners who were dismissed during the dispute is to appeal to an industrial tribunal. If that tribunal finds that any miner was unfairly dismissed it can order compensation and recommend reinstatement. That is the correct procedure.

Mr. David Atkinson: Will my right hon. Friend use the opportunity of the forthcoming European summit to strike a blow on behalf of millions of small businesses throughout the Community by trying to amend the sixth directive on value added tax to increase the threshold to above £50,000 a year so that small businesses can get on with the job of making a profit and creating new jobs rather than being weighed down by the enormous bureaucracy in the EEC?

The Prime Minister: I raised the subject of that directive at the previous meeting of the European Council. My right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio has also raised the matter. We shall continue to raise it. We believe that the level for VAT set in that directive is far too low and should be raised substantially.

Mr. Freeson: Referring back to earlier barbarism and terrorism, will the Prime Minister tell us why British intelligence services, for which she is responsible, have blocked the release of information on Klaus Barbie held by American State Departments and being sought by special investigators trying to combat Nazi cells in America, and failed to provide information in connection with the Klaus Barbie trial, which is still to take place in France?

The Prime Minister: I have answered a question on that matter before. The answer has not changed. We try to release as many documents as we possibly can and to be as helpful as we possibly can, but there are sometimes reasons why documents cannot be released.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Prime Minister aware that one of the issues that is emerging in Brecon and Radnor is the utter inability of the rate support grant formula to maintain an adequate level of services in areas of great sparsity of population? In view of the £50 million of help that she has given Scottish ratepayers and her promises to reform the rating system—[Interruption.]—when can the people of Brecon and Radnor expect some relief from their problems?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friends are saying, it is unlikely to come from the hon. Gentleman. The Government have done as much as they can to persuade local authorities to constrain expenditure and, if need be, to cap the rates. In many cases, that has been highly successful. I look forward to receiving the hon. Gentleman's support when we bring forward proposals fundamentally to change the rating system.

Billericay

Q5. Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Billericay.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Proctor: My constituents will naturally be disappointed by that response. Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents wish to see control of the level of inflation, control of the level of public expenditure and a reduction in taxation? Can my right hon. Friend give pledges on those matters as well?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, it is the Government's policy to keep strict control of public expenditure. I agree with the Leader of the previous Labour Government, who said:

"If you talk to people in the factories and in the clubs, they all want to pay less tax. They are more interested in that than the Government giving away money in other directions."

Engagements

Q6. Mrs. Peacock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Peacock: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the recently published report of the Select Committee on Employment is the report of the Opposition Chairman, supported by Labour Members, and not supported by Conservative Members, as at no time during the giving of evidence did Mr. Scargill condemn the nature——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a bad habit, because that matter is not the Prime Minister's responsibility.

Q7. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: As the Transport Bill is now in another place, would the Prime Minister care to inform this House of the name of just one country in the developed world where the deregulation of transport and the sort of regime that the Bill envisages exists?

The Prime Minister: I do not know of any country that has had the system that we are trying to get rid of, under which subsidies have increased and passengers decreased.

Mr. Colvin: Further to the earlier question from the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), will my right hon. Friend take time today to remind the House that if it had not been for the Lib-Lab pact in 1977 the aircraft and shipbuilding industries would never have been nationalised in the first place?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for putting his point so cogently.

Q8. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 25 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Smith: Will the Prime Minister tell the House whether her Government have now made up their mind whether the best recipe for the British economy lies in greater public spending or more cuts and tax cuts? Which side of the Cabinet is winning?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the Government believe in the control of public expenditure, as do almost every Government in power, because they have to. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will never have the experience of being in power, so e will never know that fundamental fact. Only if we control public expenditure and have the type of growth that we have had during the past few years can we cut tax. Had we kept the present amount of tax and the structure of income tax that existed under the Labour Government, the average family would be paying £260 more in tax than it is now.

Questions to Ministers

3.31 pm

Mr. Speaker: I wish to make a statement.

I have reflected on the point of order put to me after Prime Minister's questions last Thursday. The difficult task imposed on Mr. Speaker is to balance the diverse and urgent claims of hon. Members, both Back Bench and Front Bench, and of nearly a dozen parties in the House. In its wisdom, not for years but for centuries, the House has advised its Speaker not to give reasons for the exercise of his discretion. When Speakers have departed from that apparently cold discipline in answer to points of order, as I did on Thursday, they often find themselves on the spur of the moment stating what are not, and cannot be, rules, but must necessarily be instantaneous judgments. It has been and is the fervent hope of successive Speakers that the sum total of their decisions will be accepted as fair and reasonable by the House which elected them to the Office of Speaker.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I thank you for offering us a characteristically wise reflection on the nature of your task, which we fully understand is not always easy?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the House will be grateful to you for your statement and will wish you well in the exercise of your very difficult task.

Terrorism

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

As the House will know from the statement issued by the police yesterday, on 22 June five people were arrested in Glasgow by Strathclyde police and detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has approved the extension of their detention for five days for further questioning. Since then the police have arrested and detained under the Act a further 16 people. Those detained are being questioned in connection with a number of offences, including the bombing of the Grand hotel at Brighton.

As a result of information obtained following the arrests made on 22 June, the police were able to discover and disarm a bomb set for detonation on long-term timer in a room at the Rubens hotel, Buckingham Palace road. The investigation, the discovery of the bomb and its disarming are outstandingly successful demonstrations of the professionalism, courage and determination of the police in the battle against terrorism, which they are fighting on behalf of us all. I congratulate warmly all the forces concerned.

The House will also be aware, however, that the bomb discovered at the Rubens hotel was intended to form part of a wider operation involving the planting of bombs in a number of towns: Blackpool, Bournemouth, Brighton, Dover, Eastbourne, Folkestone, Great Yarmouth, Margate, Ramsgate, Southampton, Southend and Torquay. The bombs were to be timed to explode at intervals from mid-July, at the height of the holiday season, and the attacks would have been quite indiscriminate in their victims. But, as last night's statement showed, the police have reason to believe that the only device so far placed was the one discovered in the Rubens hotel, and that the preparations of the IRA have been interrupted at an early stage.

None the less, the police must take account of what they regard as the slight possibility that it was not only in the Rubens hotel that a bomb had been placed. Accordingly, they are urgently pursuing co-ordinated inquiries and searches on a basis agreed between all the chief officers of police concerned. That will involve conducting searches in the places identified as intended targets just as vigorously as if there were positive reasons for believing that bombs had been put in place there.

The police service therefore now faces one of the largest preventive operations that it has ever mounted. I have asked the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Sir Kenneth Newman, to undertake personally the co-ordination of the operation. The Commissioner's task is not to take over the local operational responsibilities of chief officers, but to provide a co-ordination centre and clearing house, in which individual forces may be represented, for the conduct of the operation. For that purpose, the forces principally involved will be invited to second appropriate officers temporarily to assist the commissioner in that task. He will in that way be able to ensure that information derived from related inquiries in any police force area is made available to others who may need to act upon it or refer to it. Those arrangements will also enable the public and the press to be kept properly informed, particularly in relation to any ways in which they can help.

But the local Members of Parliament may also have an important role to play. For that reason, the commissioner, in consultation with the chief constables for the relevant areas, will be arranging briefing tomorrow for Members of Parliament for the constituencies identified as possible targets. The purpose will be to explain the background and the police assessment as fully as practicable and to discuss ways in which the Members and the public can best help the police.

The House will appreciate the limitations on what can be said at this stage in the inquiries about the considerable amount of information that has so far been discovered. That has already resulted in a major terrorist outrage being thwarted. Every possible effort is now being made to prevent any further risk to the public and to bring to justice those who have been planning the cold-blooded and indiscriminate murder and maiming of totally innocent human beings.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition, I congratulate the police on this skilful and successful operation. By their tenacity and ingenuity, they have almost certainly saved the lives of innocent people — possibly very many thousands of innocent people. If that plot had succeeded, it is appalling to imagine the havoc and carnage that would afflicted countless carefree holidaymakers.

I hope that the Home Secretary will report to the House on any further significant developments as the public, including those in the holiday and tourist industries, will naturally continue to be concerned at any possible hazards. I am confident that all involved, whether those planning their holidays or those who work hard to earn their living at seaside resorts, will join the House—representing, as we do, the whole country — in sending a message to those evil people who, for their bleak and inhuman purposes, are ready to destroy and maim men, women and children. That message is clear and unmistakable: "Your methods will not win. Bombs never have and never will change the principles and purpose of the people and Parliament of the United Kingdom."

Mr. Brittan: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said. I shall certainly report to the House on any significant developments. I hope the House will feel that the course that has been followed in this case, of being as open as possible with the public about what has happened, is the right one.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the whole House will endorse his congratulations to the police? Other hon. Members may agree that, in view of the briefing that he is arranging for hon. Members who represent the towns affected, it would be inappropriate to press him today on detailed points. However, will he confirm that, where people have made, or might be considering making, plans to spend their holidays in the towns he mentioned, as of now he sees no reason why they should change those plans?

Mr. Brittan: I certainly confirm what my right hon. Friend invites me to confirm. People should not change their plans. One reason for the briefing is that, apart from enlisting the support of hon. Members in the weeks that lie ahead for the tasks that fall to the police, the circumstances in each place will differ, so it is more convenient to deal with them by way of a briefing.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): My hon. Friends and I wish to be associated with the expressions of admiration for the police and the intelligence services and join in the congratulations to them on the remarkable success of this operation. It has been reported that the nature of the hotel in Buckingham Palace road is such that, if the bomb had gone off, numbers of American tourists might have been killed. If that is so, does the Home Secretary agree that this is a timely moment for Her Majesty's Government to underline yet again to the American public the folly of donating money to organisations that support campaigns of this kind? Does he agree that there is some ray of optimism, in view of the information about IRA plans that has been forthcoming, and that that underlines yet again the growing revulsion of British and Irish citizens at this campaign of persistent murder and terror? Does he agree, therefore, that this would be a good time for the Government to underline yet again their intention to continue the constructive dialogue with the Government of Ireland?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for those remarks, and I agree with everything he said. The common purpose that we share with America in fighting and defeating terrorism is well reflected in the supplemental treaty on extradition which is being signed today and which, when completed and ratified, will prevent those who commit terrorist acts from seeking a haven in the United States, while hypocritically claiming a political justification for their murderous acts.

Sir Frederic Bennett (Torbay): I endorse what my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) said about this not being the time to press the Home Secretary on matters of detail, particularly as those concerned will be briefed tomorrow. However, as my right hon. and learned Friend said that there was a slight chance that bombs may have been placed, will he give an assurance, irrespective of tomorrow's briefing, that as soon as it becomes clear that has not happened, a further statement will be made to that effect? Otherwise, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, there will be an adverse effect on tourism, a trade which is of vital importance to parts of the country?

Mr. Brittan: I assure my right hon. Friend that if it is felt possible to eliminate, more conclusively than I have been able to do today, any further possibilities, I shall be delighted and happy to do so.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I applaud the success of the police against the Provisional IRA. They have done well: may their efforts continue that way. However, is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that I have been surprised at the detailed information that has appeared in the newspapers today, not only because that may help any remnants of a cell that is in this country but also because I hope that it will not weaken any case that may come before the courts?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman, with his experience of these matters, is giving a salutary warning to all concerned in the handling of these issues.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Is the Home Secretary aware that, while in Southend this morning, I detected among the public a sense of outrage that the IRA planned to kill and maim innocent holidaymakers? Is he further aware that the public are immensely grateful to the police for showing professional skills and bravery in thwarting the IRAs appalling plan? Does the co-ordination arrangement mean that the extremely professional skills of the Met will be available, if required, to county forces?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The answer is that it does.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Have the Government taken note that once again the operations of the Provisional IRA have been pointedly used to bring pressure to bear on Her Majesty's Government in the context of the conclusion of certain arrangements with the Irish Government?

Mr. Brittan: I am not sure that I accept what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the people of Brighton will greatly welcome his statement showing yet again the competence and effectiveness of the Sussex police force and the other forces involved? Will he emphasise the importance of the public giving full support to the police in their activities and ignoring the anti-police activities of small groups of extreme Left-wing activists in my town and in other parts of the country?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's observations and I welcome the opportunity that they give me to say that members of the public should be on the alert for suspicious objects, individuals and incidents, but that neither they nor hoteliers should institute searches of establishments without advice from the police.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the Home Secretary convey the congratulations of my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself to all those police forces throughout the country which have played such a notable part in forestalling appalling outrages and in particular to the force in the Strathclyde region? In that context, does he agree that it is to the regional and local police forces that the country must turn for protection and that we must guard against responding by any step towards the creation of a national police force? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that in that regard I view with some disquiet the appointment of Sir Kenneth Newman in a co-ordinating role?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right to draw attention to the contributions of a number of police forces and to single out Strathclyde in this instance, but I am afraid that I do not agree with his comments about the appointment of Sir Kenneth Newman. If the hon. Gentleman had followed carefully the terms of my statement he would have realised that it was designed to avoid precisely that which he fears. There is no question of a step towards the creation of a national police force. I happen to believe that such a force would not be more efficient, quite apart from any political disadvantages. In an event of this kind, however, the necessity for co-ordination is real and imperative and I believe that the machinery that we have set up is appropriate.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that all concerned with the tourist industry, especially hoteliers, are most perturbed by these developments? Will he confirm that additional surveillance will be given in areas which, although not mentioned, are equally vulnerable?

Mr. Brittan: Certainly, wherever in the judgment of the police there is an enhanced risk, enhanced protection will be provided.

Mr. J. D. Concannon (Mansfield): Having witnessed too many times for comfort the professionalism of the police and the Army in situations of this kind I can only congratulate them yet again on their success, as I have done many times before. Bearing in mind what my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) has said, is the Home Secretary in a position to say in a few words whether the Prevention of Terrorism Act has helped him in circumstances of this kind?

Mr. Brittan: The answer to that is—undoubtedly.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the superb work of the intelligence services, which deserves the gratitude of the whole country, bears out the truth of what my right hon. and learned friend told the Select Committee on Home Affairs some months ago—that but for the work of the security forces hundreds of people now alive would be dead?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. and learned Friend is quite right. I did not and could not anticipate that what I said to the Select Committee would be borne out so vividly and in such a horrifying way so soon afterwards.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): Further to the point raised by the leader of the Liberal party, in view of the record number of American visitors staying at British hotels this year, would it not be sensible to draw attention to the fact that the IRA is no respecter of whom it maims and murders, and should not such visitors be given an information pack on the IRA to take home?

Mr. Brittan: That process of education was sadly and tragically enhanced by the Harrods bombing in which there were American victims. The fact that IRA terrorism respects no persons can and should be abundantly clear to citizens of the United States, whether visiting here or at home. I also wish to say to them that they are most welcome here, and we will do everything we can to make them safe.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for the arrangements he has made to brief tomorrow the representatives of the resorts identified. Further to the point raised by the right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon), does not my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the investigations which he has reported to the House yet again underline the importance of the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act? Will he join me in expressing the hope that those who have opposed this legislation in the past will reconsider their attitude in the light of these developments?

Mr. Brittan: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I do not wish to enter a partisan note, but I was always baffled at the thought that those who introduced the legislation should have felt that it was no longer necessary. Present circumstances and events, alas, underline its enduring necessity.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Home Secretary accept that, with others in the community, we share in the joy at the success of the security forces and agree with the necessity to co-ordinate those forces to deal with such an attack upon the nation? Does he also accept that a recently elected Derry councillor, who five years ago carried a bomb into Londonderry guildhall, has gone on record as saying that that was a political statement? Perhaps the time has now come for the Government to reconsider the position of Sinn Fein, the political representative of the IRA, and to proscribe it as a political party.

Mr. Brittan: I shall not comment on that suggestion, but there can be no question of any political justification for acts of violence. We do not recognise violence as a means of furthering political ends.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): On behalf of my many constituents who work and shop in Southampton throughout the year, I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the magnificent success of the security services. As he has pointed out, the danger has not gone away. Will he therefore seriously consider using the Central Office of Information to mount a vigorous advertising campaign to warn holidaymakers and others of the ever-present danger?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that suggestion, which I should like to consider.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Does not my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the Members of Parliament of all the cities named will look forward to the meeting but that we must go through an educative process? We must become more vigilant to the obvious things that should be observed. I think in particular of hotel managements, hotel employees, hotel guests and everyone who frequents a restaurant. Wherever people reside, they must look for the unattended parcel and the easy hiding place.

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend is entirely right.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend convey to the Kent police force my thanks and those of my constituents for the part they played in producing this result? Does he agree that at least part of the IRA campaign was aimed at economic rather than personal targets? Does he further agree that it would be a tremendous and sad irony if, in the light of the success of the police campaign, the British public were to do the IRA's job for it by boycotting English seaside resorts?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend is entirely right in his assessment of one objective of the IRA, and I share his determination that that objective should not be achieved.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is my hon. right hon. and learned Friend aware that many hoteliers in my seaside constituency will be relieved by today's news? Does he agree that this is an appropriate moment to spare no effort in tightening the control and handling of baggage and cargo at airports?

Mr. Brittan: Certainly, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has taken the matter well on board.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Since these perverted people have been thwarted in this campaign, is there not a danger that remaining members of that cell or other cells may still be active? Should there not be a campaign by the Government to warn the public about the risks in any public place, such as restaurants, stations or big stores?

Mr. Brittan: Naturally, I have no knowledge or information beyond what I have told the House about this campaign. The risks that the hon. Gentleman identified are real, but I do not believe that they should be exaggerated.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the five hon. Members who are standing, but I ask them to address their questions in a somewhat different fashion. I know they are speaking for their constituents, but this is a narrow statement.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Noting the gratifying unity in the House today, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend whether it is true that those who will an end must will the means? Is not an indispensable means to the end that we all seek the Prevention of Terrorism Act?

Mr. Brittan: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Since terrorism is the most barbaric form of protest, does my right hon. and learned Friend believe that, aided and abetted by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry plus a very sympathetic Chief Whip, the time has come for the Cabinet, as a matter of policy, to put the Whips in and reintroduce capital punishment for terrorism?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend will have observed how I voted when this matter came before the House, but I have not changed my view that this matter should not be determined on the basis of a party vote.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right hon. and learned Friend be more specific about the new arrangement with the United States, which is a remarkable change in American practice on extradition? Is he sure that it will obtain the approval of Congress and the co-operation of all American judges?

Mr. Brittan: As my hon. Friend says, it will require the approval of the United States Senate, and that approval has still to be achieved. Events such as the ones that we are discussing will underline, in the United States as elsewhere, the importance of ensuring that there are no safe havens for those about whom there is suspicion of committing such acts. I hope that the ratification of this important agreement will proceed smoothly.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In congratulating my right hon. and learned Friend on the superb work done by police forces throughout the country, may I add a word of caution? I would imagine that it is important that other members of the IRA, no matter where they are in the country, should have no more details of what we have done to date. Therefore, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider supporting what the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said, and introduce a security clampdown? I know that the House is fully behind the police force, under Sir Kenneth Newman, and we must cut out the cancer of IRA terrorists as a matter of great urgency.

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend has made an important point. The information that we have been given is only a small part of the information that is already in the hands of the police. We must all be sensitive to the primary needs of security, although the wide availability of information can assist in tracking down people on occasions such as this.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the American treaty. Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, if the treaty is ratified, it will be retrospective? On the appointment of Sir Kenneth Newman, will my right hon. and learned Friend brush aside all the nonsense of the suggestions that this is a move towards a national police force? It is no such thing. Will he recognise also that the best thing that the House could do for Sir Kenneth Newman and for the police as a whole is to ensure that the Special Branch and the anti-terrorist squad have the necessary men and resources to provide bi-partisan support for the Prevention of Terrorism Act and put an end to rate-financed denigration of the police?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with what my hon. Friend said about the denigration of the police and the need for them to be adequately supported. I agree also with my hon. Friend's point about the role of co-ordination that is necessary in this case. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he said about the extradition arrangements. My hon. Friend asked whether the supplemental treaty would be restrospective. It will apply to any offence that is committed before or after it comes into effect.

Board and Lodging Payments

4 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the arrangements for supplementary benefit payments towards board and lodging charges.

The House will recall that consultative proposals on board and lodging payments were referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee in November 1984 and that in March this year the Government laid regulations which came into operation on 29 April.

The regulations were designed to achieve two main purposes. One was to contain the rapid growth in expenditure and to stop the abuses that had been taking place. The number of ordinary board and lodging cases had risen from 49,000 in 1979 to an estimated 139,000 in 1984, while annual expenditure in this area had risen from £52 million to an estimated £380 million over the same period. There was widespread public criticism that young people were too easily able to settle in such accommodation at the public expense, often at levels of charges well above what could be afforded by people in work.

Our second purpose—at least as important as the first—was to ensure continued help at an appropriate level for young people who really do need board and lodging for more than a short time. We therefore took steps to exempt from time limits people such as those who were recently in care, those who have children, those who are disabled or mentally handicapped, those who are or have been mentally ill, and those who are in board and lodging as part of a programme of rehabilitation arranged by, for example, the probation service. We also exempted people living in homes qualified as hostels.

We made it clear that we would be monitoring the new regulations with great care and would be ready to make changes quickly if the need were shown. That monitoring is of course continuing, but the initial indications suggest that, generally, young people with a real need to be in board and lodging for more than a short time should be covered by the various categories of exemption from the time limits for which the regulations already provide. It is therefore important—I want to emphasise this to every hon. Member—that claimants, or anyone else who is concerned about a particular case, should ensure that any special circumstances are fully explained to the local DHSS office, which will give them careful consideration before any final decision on benefit entitlement is reached.

We have, however, decided that an additional exemption category is needed to cover young people under the age of 26 who are living with their parents or step-parents in board and lodging accommodation. Regulations to achieve this will be laid before the House shortly, and until they come into effect we shall make special arrangements to help those people to whom they would apply.

The regulations will also enable us to extend the exemption categories to cover other types of case if a need can be shown. As I have said, we believe that the present exemptions generally cover those to whom the time limits ought not to apply, but we think it right to ensure that we can act quickly and flexibly if it should become clear that there are other groups who should also be covered.

[Mr. Tony Newton]

The Government's objective is to strike a proper balance between curbing undoubted abuse and ensuring that genuine social security needs are effectively met. The additional proposals that I have made today will help us to maintain that balance.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): Is the Minister aware that we welcome this extension of the exempt categories, while insisting that this is an insufficient answer to the method of operating the rules, which has been shown to be exceedingly harsh and unjust? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the restrictions which he introduced two months ago have caused hardship to innocent claimants out of all proportion to the limited abuse which they were designed to remedy? Is he aware that because, as the Government's own Social Security Advisory Committee has advised, adequate alternative powers exist for the DHSS to deal with this abuse, these rules should be suspended pending a wider and more thorough review?

Is the hon. Gentleman further aware that even after today's limited relaxation of the rules they still remain unfair, because a period of two, four or even eight weeks is inadequate in which to obtain accommodation from a local authority waiting list or housing association, to register with a GP or a dentist for medical treatment, to obtain legal rights—since bail is not granted if there is no fixed address—or even to register as a voter? Is the hon. Gentleman aware also that extending the exempt categories will not prevent reported suicides, like that of Brian Brown last year in Glasgow, or attempted suicides, like that of David Leitch in Telford, since they were already in exempt categories but did not know it?

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that where a young couple have separated and one partner has custody of the children the other partner will still not be allowed to stay for any length of time in the area where his partner lives, so that in many cases children will be deprived of access to their father? Is he further aware that the right of appeal against a decision that is tantamount to an eviction notice is still effectively abolished, since it takes longer than the two, four or eight weeks available to get an appeal heard?

Is the Minister aware that the Government continue to deal with the symptoms rather than the causes of the problems of homelessness? Is he aware that expenditure on board and lodging payments has increased so much in recent years only because of the growth in the numbers of homeless people who have been forced to live in this type of accommodation because they have nowhere else to go, due to the huge cut in public spending on house building which Government policies have brought about?

If the Government believe that the problem is caused by young people taking holidays by the seaside, why do the regulations cover the whole country and not just the seaside? Why do the Government not simply rely upon powers which they already possess under requirements regulation 9(14)(b), which has always provided that a person who is on holiday and staying in board and lodging accommodation cannot have his board and lodging charges met? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in many cases the real abuse is committed, not by claimants, but by some landlords unscrupulously exploiting guaranteed payments by the DHSS and installing cookers and switching to self-contained tenancies to avoid these regulations?

Is the Minister aware that minor tinkering, like today's package, will not deal with the problems caused by these regulations and that they should be repealed and replaced by a comprehensive programme to deal with the real causes of homelessness, including greater investment in public housing and measures to bring board and lodging within the Rent Acts so that residents are protected from arbitrary eviction? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that if he does not do that — the Social Security Advisory Committee warned him about this — the Government will be creating an army of young people forced to move around the country like nomads, unable to put down roots, to find a job or to get on a housing list, and that his concession today will do nothing to stop that?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman cannot seriously contend that there was only limited abuse, in view of some of the evidence that has been adduced and the huge increase in numbers. It was not confined, as he implies, to seaside resorts. We have evidence, for example, in one leading inland town of a 37 per cent. increase in the number of claimants in board and lodging accommodation during a period of only five months over the turn of the year, and the opening of about 100 new board and lodging establishments in a period of not much more than a year.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Where was that?

Mr. Newton: Reading.

Of course, I accept that there was abuse and exploitation by landlords. We introduced the regulations because we were determined to curb that abuse and exploitation.

The hon. Gentleman suggests that the regulations will cause large numbers of young people to move about the country. He has only to study the number of young people who have claimed board and lodging in recent years, the huge 50 per cent. or more increase in their numbers, and the reports that have come from many parts of the country about the influx of young people to know that the previous regulations were creating that rootlessness.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It might be fair to hon. Members to say that, as we have an important debate in which no fewer than 30 right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part, as well as a ten-minute Bill, I cannot allow questions on the statement to run after 4.30 pm. I hope that all hon. Members will ask brief questions; then they will all get in.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): My hon. Friend made an interesting comment about hostel accommodation. In my constituency there is the New Bible college with 60 residents. The owners of that college have applied for registration as a hostel. If the cut-off date —8 July—comes before authorisation for registration is granted, will my hon. Friend ensure that the cut-off does not take place, thus throwing those 60 young people on to the streets?

Mr. Newton: May I look into the case that my hon. Friend has mentioned? We have two or three hostel applications currently under consideration. The best thing would be for me to have a decision made quickly.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): As the whole House agrees that many landlords are ripping off the welfare state through the regulations, when will the Minister make a statement to the House that deals directly with that matter, rather than aiming at those landlords through claimants?

Mr. Newton: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be fair-minded enough to accept that the restraints that we have imposed in the regulations through the time limits, and, in respect of landlords, through the financial limits, have been directed at curbing abuse and exploitation by landlords. I should not want to leave the impression that the abuse is caused solely by young people. It is important that we prevent young people from being exploited by others.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I welcome the relaxation announced by my hon. Friend. Is he satisfied that sufficient steps have been taken to ensure that claimants understand the wide categories of exemptions? There is evidence that that is one of the causes of some of the hardship. Secondly, will he take on board the fact that probation officers have been expressing anxiety because of the lack of accommodation likely to be available to young people coming out of institutions?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware that probation hostels would normally be exempt under the hostel provisions, and that anyone in board and lodging under a programme arranged by a probation officer would likely to be exempt.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): The Minister is to be congratulated on easing these unworkable regulations, which were always a triumph of bureaucracy over humane and political judgments. If he will not withdraw all the regulations, will he consider two immediate exemptions: first, an exemption for those who are offered council accommodation which will be available after the end of their allowed stay; and, secondly, an exemption for those who are offered jobs which will begin after the period of allowed stay? Will he also give instructions that people be allowed to stay where they are pending an appeal? Thirdly, will he commend those authorities which have set up a system of prevention similar to that in Leeds, where the DHSS notifies people when they must move on and also notifies the social services and gives individuals a list of telephone numbers of the citizens advice bureaux and social services, which is a help when people would be allowed to stay but are unaware of their rights?

Mr. Newton: I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's first two suggestions within the terms of the power to make the extensions which I propose in the amending regulations. We are anxious that people should be pointed towards proper advice. The letter which currently goes to them tells them of the exemption categories and asks them to talk to the local office if they have problems. I am arranging for that advice to be strengthened, in the hope that we shall be able to move in the direction that the hon. Gentleman would like.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I thank my hon. Friend for his statement. Can he confirm that the BBC, in trying to exploit the case of Mr. Leach, who is a constituent of mine, was misleading the public by saying that he was still in hospital when the programme was put out and that he had tried to commit suicide because of a threatened cut in the lodging allowance that he was to receive? Will my hon. Friend confirm that in that case my efficient DHSS manager, Mr. Eade, had, before the programme went out, advised Mr. Leach that he was covered by one of the exemptions in the original proposal and arrangements and that he was exempt from the cut that was threatened?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I shall take the opportunity to say that I am grateful also to the "That's Life" programme for the trouble that it took to put me fully in the picture with the details of the cases that had come to its attention. I am happy to confirm that Mr. Leach, who was interviewed by the local office last Friday, will be in an exempt category when he is once again available for employment, and he has had a letter confirming that fact.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Is not the Minister, who is normally so compassionate, thoroughly ashamed of his nasty little regulations? Was he not warned by the organisations working in this sphere—Shelter and the Campaign for the Homeless and Rootless—of what would inevitably happen? He went ahead notwithstanding, and the results flowed from that. Will he and his officials listen in future and disabuse themselves of the illusion that under-26-year-olds, born and brought up in their own towns and cities, have families to which they can return?

Mr. Newton: I do not see, and have never seen, anything compassionate in permitting the continuation of a system which was allowing the kind of exploitation which rightly worried the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). It has led to many tens of thousands of young people being trapped in inappropriate accommodation in circumstances where they probably could not even afford to take work if it were offered.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): It is impossible to suggest ways in which my hon. Friend could have been more compassionate or sensitive in his consideration of this matter. There was immediate anxiety in my constituency because of speculation that he was intending to relax the scheme. There are examples of connivance by youngsters with landlords, and that must not be forgotten. The one thing that is clear, which I hope my hon. Friend will bear in mind in all his considerations, is that there is no genuine incentive to link the search for board and lodging with finding work. In fact, at the moment there is every incentive to seek accommodation where no work exists, in order to perpetuate unemployment and the receipt of benefit.

Mr. Newton: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes. I am grateful for his earlier remarks. The time limit and the structure, with the longest limits in the large travel-to-work areas, such as the metropolitan areas, are designed to take some account of that point.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Would the Minister care to put aside for one second the cynical disregard and callous unconcern that the Government have so far displayed when considering these issues and examine for a minute the decline in the availability of public housing stock for rent? Does he accept that if he measures one against the other he will see that the decline in public housing stock for rent reflects the dramatic increase in claimants which he has identified today? His hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said that

[Mr. Frank Cook]

"The Department have established a very carefully worked out catalogue of exemptions for those who would be affected by the new regulations"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will ask a brief question, because he made an application on this subject yesterday under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Cook: He said—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] I am reading because it is a quotation. He said:

"Nobody in need can slip through that net of exemptions."

Who is to be believed? Were the exemptions that were announced last Thursday afternoon adequate? If they were adequate then, why do they need to be extended now? Furthermore, how does moral and physical danger stop at the age of 19?

Mr. Newton: I confirm that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said that there was an extensive list of exemptions in the existing regulations, covering many of the difficult cases which have caused controversy in recent days. However, it was necessary to extend the exemptions in the way that I have announced this afternoon, and it is wise for the Government to have the power to act quickly should other needs be made known to us.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): One welcomes the changes, but there is a large number of cases of real hardship. Would it not be right to have some form of appeals procedure whereby one case could be judged adequately against another?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will know that there is an appeals procedure in respect of the category into which a claimant is placed. If he is denied exemption, he can appeal against the decision on that basis. That is a wide-ranging and important right, and it is the appropriate course to adopt, as with other parts of the benefit system when benefit is refused.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): What advice would the Minister give to the two 16-year-old girls in my constituency who live in a hostel at Watson road, Worksop, who deliberately got themselves pregnant last month so that they could stay in the hostel and not be evicted? Was it the subsequent publicity on breakfast television, on Radio 4, in the Worksop Guardian and in other organs of the media that persuaded him to change his mind?

Mr. Newton: Since, on the facts suggested by the hon. Gentleman, the two young ladies in question would be exempt, that does not affect anything that I have said this afternoon about additional exemptions. The suggestion that young women deliberately become pregnant has often been made in respect of local authority housing allocation policies. To the extent that that can be seen to be a problem, it is not unique to these regulations. Unless we are not to take account of such circumstances, it is always possible that people will contrive such circumstances to achieve a particular advantage.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that much of the blame for the current anguish lies with certain voluntary and political organisations which, for a variety of motives, have not read the exemptions and have not therefore attempted to apply them? Does he further agree that if we accepted the suggestion of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that the board and lodging system should be brought under the Rent Acts it would solve the problem because it would wipe out board and lodging altogether?

Mr. Newton: I think that there is some truth in my hon. Friend's suggestion. Nevertheless, that does not absolve the Government, nor would I wish it to absolve them, from making sure that these exemption categories are as effective as they can possibly be made. That is what I am seeking to do.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): Is it not apparent, from the host of cases of intolerable hardship that have been created in the last two months, that thousands of vulnerable young people who ought to have been exempt have been hit by the regulations, including my constituent, Brian Brown, who killed himself two days after being made homeless under these regulations? Is it not unrealistic and unjust to pass the buck to these vulnerable young people and say that mentally ill people, who may be barely semi-literate, should first work their way through a four-page leaflet to find out whether they are exempt; that, secondly, they should claim exemption; and that, thirdly, they should successfully pursue an appeal through the DHSS bureaucracy? Cannot the Minister grasp the fact that it is up to him to protect such people and that they should not be forced to have to protect themselves against him?

Mr. Newton: The letter that would have gone to Mr. Brown would have contained, not a four-page list, but a simple list of exemptions. No question of an appeal would have been involved. It would simply have been a matter of bringing the facts to the attention of the local office. It is important that not only claimants but those who have information which may be helpful to the local DHSS office should make sure that it has it. I emphasised that point in my statement. I would not wish to finish my response to the hon. Gentleman without saying that, whatever the circumstances, the whole House would wish to express its regret for what happened to Mr. Brown's family.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): While one welcomes the flexibility that has been built into the regulations which will enable my hon. Friend and his Department to deal with the very few real cases of hardship that have been caused by the regulations, now that he has taken positive steps to control abuses of the social services system, will he discuss with the Home Office ways of preventing foreign nationals from coming to this country and creating further abuse of the system at the invitation of some of the landlords to whom members of the Opposition have referred?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will be aware that we already have powers to prevent a measure of abuse. My colleagues in the Department of Employment, together with the Home Office, took additional steps early this year or late last year.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the Minister accept that his statement that exemption categories will be extended to cover other types of case if need can be shown is no more than an admission that the regulations have been an abysmal failure and that it is terrible to inflict them upon tens of thousands of young people? Are her Majesty's Government, who cherish Victorian values, saying that young people should be like Joe in Charles Dickens' "Bleak House", who every time he was asked by the authorities to move on said, "Where?" to which they replied, "Just move on, Joe, move on"?

Mr. Newton: If I thought that the regulations had failed in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests, I should have proposed an extensive further list of exemptions this afternoon. I have proposed that the Government should ensure that they have the necessary flexibility to respond. I believe that the whole House will consider that that is sensible.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): In view of the quite reasonable concern of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) about homelessness, will the Government put forward, with my hon. Friend's agreement, a package to strengthen private sector rented accommodation, thereby overcoming the problem at its roots?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction is present, and I am sure that he will have noted my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is the Minister aware that it is no use coming to the House and suggesting that there should be flexibility, when so much hardship has been caused to so many young people, particularly in areas of high unemployment like my own? Will he explain exactly what hope this statement contains for young people? He has suggested that young people should explain their circumstances to the local DHSS manager. If he is unable to help young people because of the rules and regulations of his Department, what help will that be to young people who are suffering so much hardship?

Mr. Newton: There are two points on the hon. Gentleman's question. First, if young people make sure that their circumstances are made known to us, we can more effectively ensure that all those who are in the exemption categories are covered. Secondly, I am very anxious to ensure that if any special circumstances emerge which should make us consider using the flexibility to which I have referred, we are fully informed about them. We shall then be able to act quickly to meet those circumstances.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my hon. Friend decisively reject the typically exaggerated call from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for the complete suspension of these rules, for the very good reason that their original purpose — the curbing of undoubtedly widespread abuse — is still completely valid?

At the same time, will my hon. Friend accept that the flexibility and extra discretion that is to be given to DHSS managers is widely welcomed? Should not discretion be applied to genuinely local young people who have been alienated from their homes and families, so that they may have a longer period than two weeks within which to find a job and make other arrangements?

Mr. Newton: I should make it clear that the greater flexibility that I am proposing is not a discretion for local office managers in the sense that my hon. Friend implied, but greater flexibility for the Government to define exemption categories to cover further types of cases if such a need should be shown. I shall reflect further on the last point made by my hon. Friend. On his first point, I think that everything that I said implicitly rejects the call made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher).

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does my hon. Friend agree that the scale of benefits makes it advantageous in some cases for people to leave the stability of their homes? Is he aware that parents in my constituency have expressed great concern about that? Despite all the stories that we have heard — which we accept — the maxim that hard cases make bad law is valid and the regulations can, in some cases, be socially disruptive and divisive.

Mr. Newton: I would, indeed, accept the general proposition, which is one reason why we felt that we should take action in this area. Nevertheless, I am anxious — and I hope that the House is clear about this — to ensure that we cover genuine hard cases.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Why is the Minister so intent on imposing hardship and homelessness on several hundred of my constituents who this week face the end of the eight-week period? If he is concerned about abuse and irregularity, why does he not extend the fair rent system to board-and-lodging accommodation, instead of clobbering the claimants?

Mr. Newton: If I understand correctly the call for the extension of rent control, the House should perhaps realise that that would mean bringing virtually every hotel in the country within the ambit of rent control, which might create more problems than could be picked up from the hon. Gentleman's question.

I hope that it is clear from what I have said that I am not in the least intent on imposing hardship on anybody. On the contrary, I am concerned to ensure that the balance of the regulations is right.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Why is the Minister so reluctant to deal with rogue landlords, and so determined to hound young people? Does he not realise that, uncharacteristically, he is giving a good performance this afternoon of having these minor concessions dragged from him? Does he expect to come forward with any further exemptions? If so, does that not prove our case that the regulations should be withdrawn?

Mr. Newton: At the moment, it is a case not of expecting to come forward with further exemptions, but of recognising that we need to respond quickly and flexibly —which is part of what I have proposed.

On the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I hope that I have already made it very clear that one of our purposes is to curb abuse by landlords.

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): Will my hon. Friend investigate the extent to which those claimants not covered by the exemptions—and this should be widely publicised — have, under the incentive of these new regulations, taken on work since their introduction?

Mr. Newton: If I understand my hon. Friend correctly, I confirm that that would be a significant factor to which I would wish to draw attention.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware that to apply a time limit of two weeks to Workington is to treat Workington as some sort of holiday resort—a seaside town? Is he aware that that town has an unemployment rate of 20 per cent. and that it is an industrial town which does not have a tourist industry? Will he review that decision?

Mr. Newton: If the hon. Gentleman cares to make specific representations to me—and I shall take this as the start—I shall certainly consider that point.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Will the Minister stop crying crocodile tears, come clean and accept that this is a folly of gigantic proportions, which has already led to tragedy in one case? Is not this policy, which is designed to catch a few who might abuse the system, in fact discriminating against the majority? It is ill-thought out, unwarranted and should be scrapped.

Mr. Newton: If there was a problem, to use the hon. Gentleman's phrase, of gigantic proportions, it was the escalation in board and lodging, which was creating social problems and, quite frankly, diverting resources within the social security system from the real cases of genuine need on which they should be spent.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Is the Minister aware that in my constituency it is not uncommon to pay between £50 and £70 a week for bed and breakfast and often to be expected to share with two, three or four other people for that money? Why has he turned these people into the scapegoats of a couple of editors of the Daily Express and the Daily Mail, who feel that it is more important to pursue them than to pursue people for such things as avoiding tax or fiddling expense accounts? Does he not listen to the voluntary groups, which tell him that these wicked regulations will force more people into crime, drug abuse, alcoholism and vagrancy?

Mr. Newton: I do not, of course, accept the hon. Gentleman's charges. The limits that have been imposed in the hon. Gentleman's area, as in others, are designed to strike a fair balance and, as I have now said on a number of occasions, to prevent the sort of exploitation about which he is rightly concerned.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Are not these regulations the new poor law, with harsh penalties for being young, single, homeless and unemployed? As well as causing considerable hardship and endangering lives and livelihoods, do not the regulations deny voting rights to several hundred thousand youngsters who will lose their votes because they are forced to move around the country? Why have the Government not come forward with special arrangements to deal with that?

Mr. Newton: The arrangements are designed to allow people a reasonable opportunity to look for work if they wish to go to another part of the country to do so. That is part of the underlying rationale, and something to which we shall stick.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Does the Minister accept that the minimal changes made to these iniquitous regulations to save his face do nothing to make them acceptable or fair? The net result will be to create a dispossessed tribe of young people hounded from place to place, or to drive them into the arms of even more racketeering landlords in flats which will be overcrowded and overpriced?

If the Minister wants to cure abuses in seaside resorts, why has he classified the industrial town of Grimsby as a seaside resort, with only two weeks' grace—similar to Workington—before people are hounded on? Will he reconsider that case?

Mr. Newton: As I said to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), taking that as a specific representation about a specific local limit, I shall, of course, reconsider the matter.

As to the remainder of the hon. Gentleman's question, if there is an army or a tribe—whichever phrase he used—it was those 20,000 or 30,000 young people who represented a virtual doubling of the numbers in that age group in board and lodging in only two years. That is the problem which we were creating, and that is the problem which we are now seeking to check in a fair and balanced way.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for the withdrawal of the Government's board and lodging regulations affecting homeless under-26-year-olds—the Supplementary Benefits (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985."

I ask for the Adjournment of the House to discuss a specific matter—the regulations to which I have just referred. The matter is urgent because the Minister's statement today was unsatisfactory and inadequate, as were his answers to the varied questions raised by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The Minister has made a minor change to a piece of legislation that I shall describe in three words—unnecessary, vindictive and wicked. It is unnecessary because it has not dealt with the problem that the Government were trying to tackle. The editorial of the Newcastle newspaper The Journal today emphasised that point when it said:

"It may be that the Government reacted too quickly and without proper research to deal with a situation which happened to fit their own particular set of prejudices."

The Government have not dealt with the problems of landlords who exploit youngsters, nor have they dealt with the unsatisfactory nature of the property into which many youngsters will be driven.

The legislation is vindictive because it attacks the most vulnerable group of youngsters—those under 26 who are both homeless and jobless. It is especially vindictive, as the Minister should know, because of the many and varied reasons why youngsters are forced to leave home in the current difficult social climate, such as high unemployment and the consequent strain on families.

The legislation is wicked because it will lead to anti-social problems. My hon. Friends have already mentioned suicide and pregnancies, and there will be many more during the next few months.

I request the Adjournment of the House because the regulations must be withdrawn. Nothing else will satisfy Opposition Members. The alternative will be piecemeal changes to the regulations and, as television and newspaper commentators continually tell us, social problems and hardship for youngsters.

I must get this into the Official Report. I wrote to the Minister on 15 April and enumerated 10 to 12 points——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must not make a speech. He must make a case to me showing why this is urgent and important.

Mr. Boyes: This is part of my case for urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker, because I wrote to the Minister on 15 April and have not yet received a reply. In that letter I enumerated a number of points. If they had been taken into consideration, there would not have been the death of one youngster, attempted suicide by other youngsters and the other social problems that have arisen. I am sure that I speak for every Opposition Member when I say that we wish you to grant the application so that we may express as strongly as possible the need for these regulations to be withdrawn immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for the withdrawal of the Government's board and lodging regulations affecting homeless under—26-year-olds—the Supplementary Benefits (Requirements and Resources) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1985."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the eight motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Protection) (Ships Built Before 25th May 1980) Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Appliances) (Amendment) Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Fire Protection) (Amendment) Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Merchant Shipping (Grain) Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1985 (S.I. 1985, No. 802), be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Biffen.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 12451/80 and 9826/84 concerning observation of markets for freight transport by road, rail and inland waterway be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents. — [Mr. Biffen.]

Co-ownership of Flats

4.43 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to permit the residents of flats in mansion blocks and substantial conversions in private ownership to form companies with powers to acquire and manage the properties under stated rules of common ownership; to empower such a company in certain circumstances to apply to the courts for the appointment of a managing trustee; to require local authorities to keep lists of persons qualified to act as managing trustees or as secretaries of such companies; and for related purposes.

The problem at which my Bill is aimed to provide some solution is well known to hon. Members on both sides of the House and was very well aired by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) in the debate on the Adjournment of the House on 24 May, to which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment gave some very helpful, but at this stage still non-comittal, replies.

It is important for the House to look forward to the publication of the Nugee report. I hope that hon. Members who, like myself, have this problem in their constituencies will have the forgiveness of the House if they come forward, even at this late stage, with some specific recommendations which they hope will be helpful.

It has often been pointed out that we have a certain unbalance where the acquisition of residential freehold is concerned. The House long ago agreed that in the private sector those living in houses on long leases should have the right of enfranchisement and be able to enjoy the benefit of freehold ownership. In the public sector the Government have made tremendous strides, which we all appreciate and are grateful for, by allowing people in council houses, and also in council flats, to acquire their own property. But people living in flats in private ownership are, as it were, second-rate citizens, because they do not have the right at present to acquire their freehold. I believe that a formula can be found, which is fair to both sides, that will encourage this type of home ownership for people living in flats.

On previous occasions the House has permitted me to introduce a Bill on this subject. I hope that on this occasion the Bill will make progress, in the sense that the Minister will pay serious attention to the problems, of which he is well aware, which are really widespread in inner London and in other parts of the country. I am honoured that he has chosen to be present during the debate this afternoon. Such things are very much appreciated on the Back Benches.

I shall deal with the Bill as briefly as possible. The purpose is to provide a convenient statutory means by which the tenants and the lessees of purpose-built blocks of flats—or buildings converted so as to consist only of self-contained flats—may act jointly to purchase their landlord's interest in the property at a fair valuation. The Bill would not apply to any property in owner-occupation or to any property consisting of fewer than four self-contained flats, and it would not, of course, extend to local authority properties.

The Bill would specify that in order to exercise the right of purchase a company — which I suggest might be known as a condominium company, making use of an expression which is very well understood in the United States—could be formed, in accordance with a model constitution, which would include provisions to ensure that a block of flats acquired by the tenants under the Bill's provisions would be properly managed. There is a danger that enthusiastic tenants' associations might overreach themselves by acquiring properties which were in need of serious repair and then find that they could not raise enough money among themselves to look after the block properly. That, of course, would lead to dissension and bad feeling, such as there was in the days when there were two sides and the owners were reluctant to find the necessary capital and the people living in the flats felt that the block was being neglected.

The Bill would grant to a properly constituted condominium company the right of pre-emption, to be exercised within a maximum of six months. That, I think, is not very controversial. When a block has been put on the market, most people feel that a tenants' or residents' association, if it acts quickly and responsibly, should have a right of pre-emption. I hope that that will be one of the recommendations of the Nugee report. However, the Bill would only extend the right to require the owner to enter into negotiations to dispose of his interest in other circumstances where all the flats in the property are held on long lease.

The difficulty is one of valuation. Where there are mixed regimes in a block, it is extremely difficult for even the most experienced and fair-minded person to know what is a fair price for the block, because estimates have to be made of the dates on which flats under controlled rents may become available, and vacant possession will enable the owner to make a substantial gain on those particular flats.

The payments to be made by the company to acquire the building would be based on a valuation prepared in accordance with principles laid down in the Bill and provide a reasonable assessment of the current value of the vendor's interest. There should be no question whatever of the right being extended to the residents of purchasing the property on confiscatory terms. The valuation should take into account the different forms of tenure in the property and the market value of any ancillary properties, such as shops, offices or other non-residential premises integral to the block. The valuation should be subject to arbitration.

To encourage continuity of ownership, the Bill provides that if any tenant of a flat belonging to a co-ownership scheme of the type envisaged by the Bill should sell his flat within a short period after the acquisition of the building by the tenants' company, any profit he makes would be shared with the company on a sliding scale designed to give the company the main benefit of any windfall capital gains, particularly in the early years.

Where difficulties arise in the relationships between the residents and the owners or their managing agents, the right will be conferred on the residents to apply to the court in certain circumstances for the appointment of a managing trustee. This new suggestion which I am making in this Bill is, I believe, an extremely practical solution to the type of deadlock situations which occur all too often, unfortunately, in mansion blocks where tenants have a deep suspicion of the intentions of the managing agents and nothing can be done about maintenance or even routine upkeep of the block because the tenants' association is not prepared to agree to the normal operation of the service charges.

It would be permissible for a condominium company to issue debentures and also participating preference shares; and it could qualify for grant on the same terms as a housing association. I am very anxious that a residents' association, properly constituted, should have assistance in the early years from building societies and other financial institutions. All too often they are reluctant to lend money on fixed-interest terms, but willing to enter into some sort of participatory arrangement so that they can take their money out after a relatively short time with an element of profit involved. That would encourage outside finance to come to the aid of residents' associations and give them a practical opportunity of meeting the price which they have to meet if they are going to take the chance to buy the block when it is offered to them.

I am hoping to repeat in my Bill the schedule, which is a model memorandum and articles for a condominium company.

Even if my Bill were to make no progress, the fact that it was available in print would, we think, be of use to many people thinking of setting up residents' associations. I hope, therefore, that the House will give me leave to reintroduce my Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, Mr. Hugh Dykes, Sir Geoffrey Finsberg, Mr. John Hunt, Mr. Anthony Nelson, Mr. Michael Shersby, Mr. Martin Stevens and Mr. John Wheeler.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I emphasise that not all of my supporters will necessarily commit themselves to all the measures that I am recommending in the Bill.

CO-OWNERSHIP OF FLATS

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams accordingly presented a Bill to permit the residents of flats in mansion blocks and substantial conversions in private ownership to form companies with powers to acquire and manage the properties under stated rules of common ownership; to empower such a company in certain circumstances to apply to the courts for the appointment of a managing trustee; to require local authorities to keep lists of persons qualified to act as managing trustees or as secretaries of such companies; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 171.]

Orders of the Day

European Communities (Finance) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.50 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have passed a business motion to allow the Representation of the People Bill to go on until a late hour. The 10 o'clock rule has been dispensed with. This is an important constitutional Bill——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member has misread the Order Paper. That motion will be considered at 10 o'clock.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): On another point of order, Mr. Speaker. Back Benchers have three hours in which to make their speeches on the European Communities (Finance) Bill. Would it be in order to suggest that we have another two hours to debate this vital Bill? Can anyone but a Minister propose such a step?

Mr. Speaker: That cannot be done. The Money Resolution will provide a little additional time for debate.

Many right hon. and hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, so I hope that speeches will be brief. I shall apply the ten-minutes limit on speeches between 7 o'clock and 9 o'clock and I hope that those hon. Members who speak before then will bear that in mind.

I have not selected the amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken).

Mr. Marlow: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it or is it not possible for the Leader of the House or anyone else to move that the time for the debate be extended beyond 10 o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: No such notice has been given and notice must be given for such a motion to be moved.

4.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House will realise that this is the most significant piece of primary legislation affecting our position in the Community since the European Communities Bill 1972. I therefore propose to begin by putting the present Bill into a wider perspective, by making plain to the House the important part which Community membership plays across the whole range of our foreign and economic policies.

Our role as a leading member of the Community is increasingly central to our position in the North Atlantic Alliance, to the quality and weight of our contribution to the dialogue between East and West and, indeed, to our ability to maintain a worldwide foreign policy. It is the effectiveness of our presence in the Community which is the key to our influence on the future of Europe, and so to our capacity to promote Britain's interests in the wider world.

With or without our membership, the European Community would be a major factor in Britain's economic life. If we were outside, we would have free access neither to a single large market for our goods and services, nor to a group of countries which can serve as partners in the battle to compete in the new technologies. If we were outside, the problems created by agricultural subsidies in the Community itself, the United States and elsewhere would be much more serious for us than they are. If we were outside, we would experience the impact of Community policies without being able to shape or influence them.

Those are only some of the reasons why our future so plainly lies within the European Community. That is why the great majority of the House is now rightly concerned that we should succeed in that setting. I want in this debate to show how we have already brought our influence to bear in the Community, and to describe the opportunities that have opened following the agreement reached at Fontainebleau last year.

The wider debate is, of course, already well under way about the development of the Community's policies and institutions over the next decade. There is a new and growing determination to achieve a genuine common market in goods and services; to ensure that Europe can make the most effective use of its economic strength, compete successfully in world markets, and so offer long-term job opportunities for its peoples.

The Community of ten will soon become the Community of twelve. Spanish and Portuguese membership of the Community will reinforce democracy in those two countries. The wider Europe will be able increasingly to work together in external affairs.

All this has been made possible by the agreement reached at Fontainebleau. At the core of that agreement was the solution of what became known as "the British budget problem". That is the question which this Government placed firmly at the top of the Community agenda when we came to power in 1979. The problem was not just that Britain was paying too much. It was a problem that itself lay at the heart of the whole structure of the Community. It was a problem that our predecessors had completely failed to solve, a problem which was tackled in earnest for the first time only by the present Government.

The urgency of the problem was sharpened by the mounting cost of the common agricultural policy and by the imminence of Spanish and Portuguese accession, but it was brought to a head and brought to a conclusion only by the tenacity of this Government: by our determination to secure a fairer system and to fight hard for our interests within a strong and vigorous Community.

As the House is well aware, long and hard negotiations were necessary, in the first place, to persuade our partners to accept the basic validity of our argument; and then to persuade them — no less difficult — to accept the consequences for themselves of putting our financial contribution to the Community on to a fair basis.

The agreement reached at Fontainebleau, the effect and consequences of which are embodied in the Bill that is before the House today, was then the culmination of a long process. It has been a process in which my two predecessors as Foreign Secretary, and my successor as Chancellor of the Exchequer, have all battled tenaciously, under the leadership throughout of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. The house should pay tribute to them all.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Tell us what you have done.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am much too modest to say but, as the Prime Minister told the House last year, the outcome of those negotiations was good for Britain and good for the Community. It is better than anything else previously on offer. It is far better, of course, than the reforms proclaimed by the Opposition when they were in office. We have achieved the fundamental change in the operation of the Community which eluded them completely.

It is difficult to overstate the significance of what was won at Fontainebleau. We secured the repayment of our 1983 refund of £434 million. We secured agreement to our abatement for 1984 of £600 million. Most important of all, we secured agreement to the establishment of a durable system for the abatement of our contribution. That system is embodied in a legally binding form in the own resources decision which the House is, in the first subsection of this short Bill today, being asked to approve for inclusion in the list of Community treaties in the European Communities Act 1972.

The agreed arrangement features an automatic system for the abatement of our VAT contribution. In 1986 alone, this will be worth around £830 million to this country. Over the next three years, it will be worth £2·5 billion. Henceforth we shall be contributing only half what we would have had to pay under the present 1 per cent. ceiling. That is the effect of the agreement which I am today commending to the House.

Mr. Marlow: Is my right hon. and learned Friend about to say that, although we are about to agree to Community own resources of 1·4 per cent., we shall be paying less than 1 per cent.—that is, of course, after rebate? My right hon. and learned Friend will know that the average cost after rebate over the last four years of United Kingdom Community membership in VAT terms has been 0·5 per cent. What are the additional benefits for us from doubling our percentage VAT payment over future years?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If my hon. Friend will be kind enough to listen to me, I shall deal with precisely that question.

It is important to recognise that the rebates that we were receiving in the years before Fontainebleau were themselves on a declining trend. It is important to recognise that figures such as those offered by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), averaged over a four-year period, and those averaged over the period to 1972, are wholly fictitious and misleading. They take account of the low figures payable during the long transitional period. I want to focus on the figures that were payable during the last year before Fontainebleau and the figures that would have been after Fontainebleau, if it had not been achieved.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend will have his opportunity to speak.

As a result of the agreement made at Fontainebleau, France will contribute to new Community policies through the allocated budget at a rate of 26 per cent., Germany will contribute at 31 per cent. and the United Kingdom will contribute at only 7 per cent. France is now becoming a significant net contributor to the Community budget for the first time. Within two or three years, France is likely to be a larger net contributor than the United Kingdom.

The system is worth more to us than the previous refund arrangements, and it has many other advantages. We shall no longer have to negotiate about the amount, argue about the timing or justify how the money is used. Instead of ad hoc and arbitrary refunds, our VAT contribution will be reduced automatically and without procedural argument each year. The system is built into Community law. It will last as long as the 1·4 per cent. ceiling remains in place —[Laughter.] The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) should listen to the facts and face them. That can be changed only by the unanimous decision of the member states and with the agreement of all their Parliaments, including our own. There can be no change in the system and no further increase in own resources without the consent of this House.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way. Does this mean that we shall have another bargaining session in a couple of years' time in which we shall be blackmailed into giving way on the 1·6 per cent. to maintain our rebate? What sort of deal is that for this country?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In the absence of unanimous agreement by every member state and endorsement by every member state's Parliament, the status quo continues.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I realise, of course, that hon. Members wish to be satisfied that it was right to secure our abatement mechanism in the context of the increase in own resources.

I am convinced that the approach which we adopted was right. Unless we had been willing to consider the increase, there is no doubt that our partners would not have been ready to agree to any further refunds for the United Kingdom——

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: —let alone to accept the lasting system of abatements that we have now secured. I remind hon. Members that, whatever the justice of our case, we had no automatic right to a rebate. The automatic right to rebates is something that we have secured, and could only have secured, by success in these negotiations.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Let me seek to quell the interested crowd of inquiries by taking the interventions of two or three of the prime candidates.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Has my right hon. and learned Friend seen the public expenditure White Paper which states that, in 1987, our contribution after Fontainebleau will be £973 million net, after all repayments? Is not this argument about rebates rather like my wife saying that she can get a bigger discount at Harrod's if she buys a mink coat rather than a fox fur?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I appreciate that my hon. Friend has developed that joke on previous occasions, but it has nothing to do with the case. As a result of Fontainebleau, we shall pay half what we would have paid. We shall pay a VAT rate of less than 1 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): But it is not less money.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall allow my hon. Friends to make their own points in their own speeches.

If the 1 per cent. ceiling had remained in place, we should have had to make a net contribution of £1·5 billion to the Community in this financial year. As a result of the Fontainebleau agreement, and despite the accompanying increase in own resources, our annual net contribution will be half that size.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. We cannot have several hon. Members on their feet at the same time. It seems quite clear that the Foreign Secretary is not giving way.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In the year immediately before Fontainebleau, we were contributing at £2·5 million a day. Those arrangements ran out last year. Without the Fontainebleau agreement, and relying on the 1 per cent. ceiling, we should have had to contribute at £4 million a day. After Fontainebleau, even with increased own resources, we shall be contributing at £2 million a day.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is the reality — a formidable reduction of that which would otherwise have been available. The only effect of failing to pass this Bill would be a continuing and substantial increase in the amount payable.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: What is more, as part of the Fontainebleau agreement, we have secured a system of budget discipline——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: —which has been one of the key objectives on both sides of the House.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The essence of that discipline is the establishment——

Mr. Leighton rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, I shall not give way for the moment. The hon. Gentleman must be patient.

The essence of that discipline is the establishment of a financial guideline designed to ensure that agricultural spending grows at a lower rate than that of the own resources base as a whole.

Mr. Marlow: You do not believe that!

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The system was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) in the debate in the House on 11 December last year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North said "You do not believe that." I invite him to address himself to the reality. The system of budget discipline which my hon. Friend the Member for Pentlands described is now plainly coming into effect. The Community showed its determination to start the process of reform in last year's price fixing.

Mr. Leighton rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: This year, the discipline has been seen in full operation. The effectiveness of the discipline has to start with the Commission, which is responsible for the price proposals. That is exactly what happened. The Commission's proposals this year were, and still are, within the 1986 guidelines. The Commission has undertaken to ensure that the final costs of the price fixing are within the agricultural figures already agreed by budget Ministers.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend will have his opportunity to speak later.

Perhaps I might give an insight into the figures. The percentage increase in guaranteed spending in 1983 was 28·3 per cent. It was 15·6 per cent. in 1984, it is 8·4 per cent. for 1985, and the increase in the provisional draft budget for 1986 is 2·5 per cent. We could not have achieved a more dramatic deceleration than that. As a result of that decrease, the real price cuts imposed on the CAP last year were 4 per cent., as a result of which the real price cuts imposed on the CAP this year are 3·5 per cent. If that does not amount to the effective imposition of budget discipline, I do not know what does.

Mr. Budgen: Bearing in mind my right hon. and learned Friend's assurances that all will be well in the future, will the Government give a clear undertaking that they will not ask again for an increase in own resources to 1·6 per cent. before 1 January 1988?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position remains as I have stated it. Budget discipline is now in force and effective. There can be no question of this Government or any other, or of the Council, considering the prospect of an increase in own resources without taking into account the need for unanimity in the Council and endorsement by the House. Then, as now, we shall have to take account of the fluent and persuasive advocacy of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and others.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue for a moment.

For next year, the pattern is the same. The Commission's preliminary draft budget for 1986 proposes a figure for agricultural spending which, at 64 per cent. of the Community total, is also well within the guideline.

That is also so in the Council this year. Price cuts have been agreed for tobacco and most fruit and vegetables. Prices for wine, beef and sheepmeat have been frozen. Milk quotas have been reinforced and a further 1 per cent. cut in quota implemented. Even on cereals, the argument has not been, as so often in the past, about a price increase but about the size of the price cut. Once again, in the Agriculture Council we saw a 9:1 situation. But this time it was not Britain alone arguing with the rest of the Community against price increases, but Britain and eight other member states all arguing for a price cut, and achieving it.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Foreign Secretary recall that at Stuttgart he said that his conditions for increasing VAT to 1·4 per cent. would be effective budgetary discipline and a rebate mechanism? He has achieved the second. Does he agree that budgetary discipline is not enshrined in the Bill? Regulation 4972/1/82 is but a conclusion, which, according to the European Scrutiny Committee, does not have legislative force. As a former Chancellor of the Exchequer, how can he ask the House for legislation to pay more without legislation constantly to control what is being paid?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point, to which he has previously directed attention. The agency and institutions of the Community have committed themselves in the decision to which the hon. Gentleman refers to be bound by budget guidelines and discipline along those lines. If one looks at the way in which those matters are being applied, one sees that the institutions of the Community are applying precisely that budget discipline.

The hon. Gentleman refers to my past as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I know only too well that the battle to sustain budgetary discipline, whether nationally or internationally, must be fought year after year. In maintaining the pressure for reform of agricultural policy, as the House would wish and as we shall, none of us should delude ourselves that there are easy options open to us, either within the Community or outside it. It is a matter of sustained application of political will. No automatic device can achieve that.

The Community has not been alone in devising a system which has paid for the real benefits of security of supply, and decent living standards for those who work on the land by subsidies, which have imposed a heavy burden on taxpayers, and strains on relations with trading partners and on Third world producers. The United States, for example, is in a similar position. The problem cannot be solved by denunciation, but only by determined reform from within. That is precisely the programme to which the Government and the Community are now committed. We shall sustain that programme.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Foreign Secretary has just said that the budgetary battle must be engaged in each year, both nationally and in the EC, yet the Economic Secretary to the Treasury in his article in The Times today said that the reason for voting for the Bill should be because it will prevent a return to the guerrilla warfare that has characterised EC budget discussions for many years. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman would care to get together with the Treasury so that they can put forward one reason for the Bill, and not more than one.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am delighted that the hon. Lady has read my hon. Friend's article, but sorry that she has not seen as much wisdom in it as she should have done. The sentence she mentioned precisely reinforces the point that I made earlier, but which she may not have noticed. I have said that from now on there will be no guerrilla warfare from year to year between Community states about the British budget contribution. All that is resolved, and a durable system has been put in place. The hon. Lady must understand that, not surprisingly, my hon. Friends and I are making precisely the same case — and an extremely good case.

We have achieved the conditions that we set before we should be ready to agree to any increase in own resources. The increase proposed for the Community as a whole is to 1·4 per cent. That represents an increase of up to 20 per cent. in the own resources available to the Community. For Britain it is justified by the plain fact that we shall be better off after the increase than we were beforehand. But there are much broader arguments than that for the change.

The change is required to finance the costs of enlargement, which will grow to between 0·1 per cent. and 0·2 per cent. of Community VAT by the end of the transitional period. It has always been accepted that Spain and Portugal, which will be among the poorest members of the Community, should not find themselves net contributors. The Community as a whole has decided that it is worth making some financial contribution in return for the wider benefits of enlargement: an enlarged area of stability and democracy and a larger common market.

The increase is justified to finance the development of new policies, especially in the new technologies where we can operate more effectively as a Community than we can alone.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall give way in one second to my hon. Friend, who has not yet had a bite of the cherry.

The increase is justified to meet existing commitments, which, in the past two years, have required supplementary finance. From now on, those commitments will be met within the framework of budget discipline that I have described.

Mr. Forth: As the House has never yet had an opportunity to give its opinion on the policy of enlargement, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that for those of us for whom enlargement is not a wise policy his reason for the measure is invalid, and puts us in great difficulty? Does he agree, therefore, that it would have been easier for us if we had discussed and considered enlargement separately, instead of it being brought in under the carpet today?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend will have to address himself to that question. If he finds that that argument is not persuasive, I hope that he will be persuaded by the other arguments that I have put forward. He will have an opportunity specifically to discuss enlargement when the accession treaty comes before the House. I have been giving the House a range of arguments why the Bill and agreement should be endorsed, four or five of which are in the interests of the Community, and one of which is overwhelmingly in the interest of the United Kingdom.

The increase is required because the VAT ceiling applies to the highest rate for any single member state. The mathematical consequence of abating the United Kingdom VAT rate is that the VAT rate of every other country increases. While other member states will be contributing to the budget at more than 1 per cent. VAT, we shall be contributing at less than that figure. Compared to the 1 per cent. that we would have paid, if we had stuck with the present ceiling——

Mr. Marlow: In the past, the figure for rebate has been only 0·5 per cent.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It may have been 0·5 per cent. in the past but it will be a full 1 per cent. in future, which is a great deal more than we hoped to gain under the agreement.

Compared with that, our effective rate in 1986 will come down to about 0·8 per cent. That is the reduction which we have sought to achieve.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington) rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Forgive me, but I shall not give way. I must now proceed some distance.

I should like now to turn to the other part of the Bill before the House today: the second subsection, which provides for the intergovernmental agreement on the 1985 Budget.

The 1984 intergovernmental agreement was dealt with by a special Supplementary Estimate and a Consolidated Fund Bill. That was an exceptional procedure justified at the time by the urgency of making our intergovernmental agreement payment. This time round, we have chosen to use primary legislation, not because we consider inappropriate any other procedure, including use of section 1(3) of the European Communities Act 1972, but because there is a substantive link between the own resources decision and the intergovernmental agreement, and we wanted to give the House the fullest opportunity to debate both together. The House can hardly complain about that.

The intergovernmental agreement is essentially a transitional measure to cover the period until new own resources come in on 1 January 1986. It is a legacy from the period before the budget discipline agreement came into force.

About half our gross contribution under the present intergovernmental agreement of £250 million is likely to come back to the United Kingdom as receipts. Moreover, in contrast to the 1984 agreement, the expenditure covered by this intergovernmental agreement enjoys the full abatement agreed at Fontainebleau. Our net contribution will therefore be much smaller than the figure of £250 million that has caught attention. It will be only one sixth of that.

We accepted this year's intergovernmental agreement only when we were satisfied that three conditions had been fulfilled. They were that the position of this House on the authorisation of the funds had been fully protected; that the amount involved was the irreducible minimum required to meet obligations; and that the United Kingdom's 1984 abatement of £600 million was fully assured.

The reforms of the Community budget that we have achieved were necessary for their own sake, but they were more important than that. They provide the basis for the wider reforms we are now pursuing, to make the Community work better for the benefit of its citizens.

Let me close by telling the House something about our objectives. It is important that hon. Members should have these in mind as they consider the present proposals for financing the Community in the years ahead.

With the Fontainebleau agreement behind us, Britain has been able to make completion of the common market by 1992 the top priority of Commission and member states alike. The effective establishment of a single large market will not only give us an opportunity to exploit our strengths and skills; it is crucial to the creation of wealth and jobs and to the generation of profits that can stimulate research and the successful exploitation of our inventive skills. Completion of the common market is the biggest single contribution that we can make to enable European companies, British companies, to exploit and market their research on a European scale and so compete in world markets efficiently and successfully. That is the way to cut the dole queues throughout Europe.

In the run-up to this week's meeting of the European Council in Milan, we have put forward a number of ideas based on the guiding principle that we must decide as a Community what it is that we want to do, and can do better together, and then ensure that we have the means available to achieve those ends.

That is why we have put forward proposals for a timetable for completion of the common market, and for improvements in decision-taking through greater use of majority voting and through a safeguard procedure to ensure that member states do not abuse their capacity to block decisions. The ability to uphold a vital national interest by insisting on unanimity is maintained. We also propose formalisation of political co-operation, including the establishment for the first time of a very small secretariat to ensure continuity and co-ordination.

The opportunities are now open to us to make the most of our membership of the Community. It was for that purpose that the Government set out to achieve, and have achieved, a significant change in the basis of our membership. We have been strengthened in that task by the support of the House and by the detailed work of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service and the Scrutiny Committee, to the Chairmen and members of which I pay tribute.

Today, the House has to make a judgment, just as at Fontainebleau my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I had to make a judgment, on what was then and is now in the interests of the country as a whole. I am in no doubt that the agreement achieved at Fontainebleau represents a very good deal for Britain and a significant step forward for the whole Community.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Townend: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, I am afraid not. I am now drawing to a close, because hon. Members would like me to do so.

My judgment is that, if we had taken the negotiations at Fontainebleau up to and beyond the point of breakdown, we should have not only lost the chance of a financial deal very favourable to Britain but destroyed the chances of starting the whole process of reform that is now under way. If we had sought to hold out and rely on the 1 per cent. ceiling, we should now be facing a net contribution to the Community budget that would be costing us not £2 million but £4 million a day. Instead of being able to mobilise the majority that is now taking in hand the reform of the CAP, we should have been in a minority of one trying in vain to challenge a budget that was still devoted to increasing expenditure on t e CAP.

I do not believe that we would have been acting in the interests of the country to pass up that opportunity. Nor do I believe that the House would have wished us to embark on the only alternative means of securing a reduced British contribution—by unilateral action that would have been a breach of our treaty obligations and would have dealt a severe blow to our relations with our major allies.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark rose——

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sorry, but I shall not give way.

We have shown by the agreement at Fontainebleau that we can achieve our purpose by determined negotiation. [Interruption.] We achieved our purpose in that agreement by negotiation of precisely that kind. It is the outcome of that resolute campaign, pursued by the Government for the past six years, which is embodied in the Bill. On that basis, I commend it to the House.

5.24 pm

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I dare say that some people will be wondering why the Foreign Secretary is moving the Second Reading of the Bill, because, after all, it is presented in the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, for an explanation perhaps the House need look no further than the coverage of the European Community in Sunday's newspapers. All over both the quality and tabloid newspapers was spread the new hero of European politics — the British Foreign Secretary, now to be the saviour of the Milan summit. With amazing, not to say suspicious, unanimity, the papers suddenly see British initiatives, British leads and British solutions to the demise of the much-vaunted European union summit. Even yesterday's edition of The Times reached the stage of referring to in good humoured and well-orchestrated style.

"Britain's quiet takeover of the Community this year"

Presumably the Government's business managers, who have been under siege recently, believe that if the Foreign Office could pull off such a well-organised publicity stunt, transforming what will be a collective lack of any new ideas about revitalising Europe in Milan this weekend into a triumph for British statesmanship, the same architects of the same public relations agency might just be able to pull off the same trick today with the Bill. Certainly they did not imagine that the Chancellor could do the same trick. Instead, the great conjuror himself has managed the three-card trick this afternoon and come up with each faceless card in turn.

The Bill represents a confession of failure, not success —a failure by the Government's own explicit standards which they laid down at the Fontainebleau summit last year, and a failure — indeed, a national humbling — which will now be enshrined in British law. The Bill is designed to increase the resources of the European Community by between 20 and 40 per cent., and endorse yet another free gift, or donation, as it was so well described in a previous debate, of another £250 million, but in return for what?

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): While the hon. Gentleman is talking about free gifts and donations, will he remind the House of the precise total sum of money yielded by the budget rebate mechanism negotiated by the Labour Government in 1974?

Mr. Robertson: The Foreign Secretary has already explained, in answer to criticism from Conservative Members, the difficulty of comparing earlier years, when transitional arrangements applied, with the present fiasco. It cannot easily be done.

The Bill is in return for what? It is in return for worthless promises on budget discipline, in return for a rebate which we shall eventually help to pay for ourselves, and in return for cashing in the only effective bargaining lever that this nation had for European Community reform. The deal which we are being asked to rubber-stamp today is little less than a sell-out, which will cost the country money, because, despite the much-trumpeted rebate and abatement, we shall still end up paying more cash to the European Community within the next two years. The deal is not permanent, because the new increase in the Community's own resources is already almost totally committed for 1986, as figures from the European Commission itself show. We shall be back at the negotiating table late next year when the cash finally runs out.

The deal has done nothing to control farm spending —that monster which piles up mountains of immovable, undisposable rotting food — while Europe's jobless millions continue to be ignored. Yet again only lip-service was paid to them in the speech of the Foreign Secretary, in a way that was paralleled only by his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, when he opened the debate last Thursday. The veto two weeks ago by West Germany on the already feeble cereal price cut says it all. The Government have had five years of conflict and souring argument with our European partners, and have finally been sold an expensive pup. They have achieved nothing of substance, and have set the scene only for the next round of the fight.

Ministers may find it convenient to portray all opposition to that deal as arising from instinctive hostility to the European Community. That is of course convenient, but it is not true. For some people that has an element of truth, but the sordid way in which the sell-out is being oversold as a success will only feed the prejudices of those who, in any event, hate the Common Market and all that it stands for. The accusation will not stick.

Many others, both inside and outside the House, who criticise this foolish and injudicious package — those who, like myself, have always supported British membership of the Community — see in this deal the objectives of the European Community betrayed, the genuine motivations of the Community undermined and its raison d'etre and potential subverted by a shoddy compromise which continues the present shambolic financial arrangements and leaves Europe still unable, unwilling and almost incapable of meeting the major challenges of unemployment, of a continent-wide recession, and of the need for growth of investment to permit competition with the rest of the world.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury has, with a rare high profile for him, put his case—a case which has been transferred tonight lock, stock and barrel from the Treasury to the Foreign Office—in print in The Times today. In an article which reads rather like an election leaflet, he says:

"we achieved a system of budgetary discipline designed to bring the growth of Community expenditure under much tighter control . . . we see that the new budgetary disciplines are now beginning to bite . . . Fontainebleau has changed the rules for good."

How different from the cautious, defensive responses from the hon. Gentleman in the pounding which he now regularly takes from the Treasury Select Committee. How colourful the language of that article compared with the meandering, conditional, reserved statements that he used in the House in January of this year, when the last topping-up exercise was made to EEC coffers. Yet what a fiction it is that is being peddled by the Government, a fiction which recent experience has already shown up in graphic style.

Last year the Prime Minister made the position clear when she told the House that only after a satisfactory agreement on expenditure control had been settled would she wish to put proposals to the House to implement the whole package. The Foreign Secretary used virtually the same words on 10 July, when he said:

note that the word "only" was used once again—

"when Finance Ministers have adopted the necessary measures on budget discipline will the Government be prepared to recommend to the House that the own resources ceiling should be increased."—[Official Report, 10 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 897.]

The great trick employed by the Foreign Secretary today is to pretend that everything that he said would happen has happened. Against all the evidence to the contrary, the right hon. and learned Gentleman simply says, "We asked for budget discipline. They agreed to that, and what we have — whatever the outside world may say and whatever all the evidence suggests — is budget discipline."

The facts are totally different from that. Has such control been settled? Only enough to justify today's package. There is no sign that that control has been given. The key to budget discipline is in the common agricultural policy, and that is up as a proportion from 68 per cent. of the budget last year to 74 per cent. this year. It is consuming most of the assets of the Community, mainly in piling up food mountains.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the likelihood is that the entry of Spain and Portugal into the Community will increase the political pressure on the EEC for higher spending, as both those countries have a direct vested interest in the maximum expenditure by the Community, as they are likely to be beneficiaries? That is another factor which throws increasing doubt on the effectiveness of budget discipline in the political sense.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right. The pretence is that the additional resources being voted today will go to commendable and worthy projects, such as the new technology community, which, among his other fine initiatives, the Foreign Secretary has been proposing—none of which has been notified to the House.

The documents containing the Foreign Secretary's suggestions for the reform of the Community that will be before the Milan summit have not even been placed in the Library of the House of Commons. They appear to be available to the European press and, it seems, they are available in Brussels, but they are not available in this House. Yet they will be discussed as a British initiative at Milan next weekend. The way in which the House of Commons is being treated is an indication of how little value the initiatives will prove to be.

Three weeks ago, Mr. Frans Andriessen, the Commissioner for Agriculture, outlined the Commission's latest thinking on long-term developments in the common agricultural policy. As The Guardian put it, Mr. Andriessen

"insisted that the starting point for reform must be the control of prices. 'Let us have no illusions on this point. If the Community cannot succeed in controlling the markets through a restrictive price policy, sooner or later we shall find ourselves extending the empire of quotas.'"

That is to be the target of those operating the guidelines for the common agricultural policy's internal budgetary discipline. That is to be the financial constraint and the real budget mechanism.

However, certain statements have already been made about that by some Ministers. For example, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said in evidence before the Select Committee:

"I think the first demonstration of the effects of the budget discipline is that the agricultural price-fixing proposals for this year were put forward by the Commission within the guidelines."

Thus, the proposals put forward by the Commission within the guidelines were to be the criteria by which we would judge the effectiveness of the financial discipline. Indeed, the Economic Secretary went on to say that the Agricultural Council had demonstrated that the guidelines imposed a tight restraint on agricultural expenditure.

How peculiar, in the light of that, to consider the history of the price proposals. The Commission first asked for a 5 per cent. cut in key cereal prices. That was thought to be demanded by the guidelines on budget discipline. It then allowed itself to be negotiated down to an unnegotiable 3·6 per cent. cut in cereal prices, and it was on the basis of 3·6 per cent. that the intergovernmental agreement which we are being asked to endorse was calculated. However, within days of the 3·6 per cent. figure being debated the Commission moved down to an almost ludicrous 1·8 per cent. proposed cut in cereal prices.

There followed the veto by West Germany. How could budget discipline be guaranteed by the self-restraint of the Germans if, on the first occasion when budget discipline was tested, they used the veto and reduced the effectiveness of the Commission?

In January, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office even dared, when replying to the debate on the European Communities budget, to quote the German Finance Minister, Herr Stoltenberg. Our Minister, justifying German self-interest as a reason for maintaining budget discipline, said that Herr Stoltenberg had said:

"We now have for the first time an effective instrument to bring about a sensible control of expenditure."

The Minister went on:

"It is therefore easy to see why Herr Stoltenberg . . . and the French Finance Minister, will have an enormous vested interest in ensuring proper control of expenditure".—[Official Report, 22 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 948.]

Why should we bother to speculate about budget discipline when the one guarantee which the Minister offered the House in January of this year was vetoed six months later by the German Government? It is far easier to see why the pious words of January and the silly words in The Times today are to die along with budget discipline on the altar of the Bavarian farmers' vote.

Agricultural spending will still be demand-led. It will still rage on with loopholes and ineffectual paper guidelines pushing up expenditure. The only effective controls will be on the worthwhile side of Community spending — on the regional and social funds, energy, technology, pollution control and research. With the common agricultural policy, we shall simply continue to pay the Bills. It is truly bizarre to see the Government so obsessed with controlling and savagely cutting expenditure in this country but maintaining such a profligate attitude to expenditure in the European Community.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, particularly as he has just made the point that the Government are about to double our VAT take from 0·5 to 1 per cent. Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to another part of the Government's justification that the entrance of Spain and Portugal is like motherhood and apple pie, that it is a good thing and that we should all want it? The Foreign Secretary said that the cost of that will be equivalent to 0·2 per cent. of the VAT take, but that does not start until next year, and it will be up to 10 years before it is effective, so how is that a justification for increasing VAT today?

Mr. Robertson: Unlike the hon. Gentleman, the Opposition welcome the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Community. We believe that it will have major benefits for them and for the wider Community. However, it is absurd for the Government to pretend that the increase in own resources is necessary solely to finance the accession of Spain and Portugal which, as the hon. Gentleman has said, has now been specifically identified as a negligible part of the funding. There is a great suspicion that the bulk of the additional resources will go in exactly the same way as they have always gone in the past—to finance the uncontrolled farm spending of the Community.

Mr. Budgen: As the Opposition favour the accession of Spain, Portugal and also, I believe, Greece, will the hon. Gentleman tell the House what calculations the Labour party has made of the cost of accession of those countries? Do the Opposition believe that it will inevitably combine with increasing costs of supporting farm surpluses and lead to the Government's coming to the House again before 1 January 1988 to ask for an increase in own resources to 1·6 per cent., as seems to be half promised in the Fontainebleau agreement?

Mr. Robertson: One does not have to be a statistical genius—I assure the House that I am not—to see that if the common agricultural policy remains in its unreformed state there is no question but that the money will run out. That is a point which the Foreign Secretary has signally failed to grasp. However, that does not alter the fact that the accession of Spain, Portugal and Greece can still be desirable and be contained within the budget of the European Community if the common agricultural policy excesses are controlled.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury said in an article in The Times today:

"Fontainebleau has changed the rules for good."

That is a prophecy and a half, especially from a Minister who has crawled back to the House time and time again with demands for refundable advances and supplementary payments and who is here today asking for another £250 million. He has now even dropped the word "repayable" from his description. The Foreign Secretary—a former Chancellor of the Exchequer—should today have spoken about the repayable advances that we have already made and precisely when and how those repayments will come back to the United Kingdom Treasury. There was not a whisper about that, because they will not be refundable, and even the pretence has now been dropped from the specification.

The Minister has publicly conceded, as well he might, that this may not be the end. In his evidence to the Select Committee on the Treasury and the Civil Service last week he said:

"there was considerable pressure from a number of Member States to leave the amount open on the grounds that, if the price fixing was not completed, it might actually require more money."

In The Times today the Minister said that the present requirement was "a direct result of the lack of budgetary discipline in the past, and takes no account of the new arrangements."

Yet he has said that there is still pressure from member states to leave the door open because the price fixing is still not complete, whatever the Commission says about pushing through the 1·8 per cent.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): If the hon. Gentleman had bothered to read the rest of my evidence he would know—I also made this clear to the House—that I rejected any possibility that the amount of the intergovernmental agreement should be increased. The Council accepted that and the Commission has also agreed, so there is no question of that being reopened.

Mr. Robertson: The Economic Secretary might be well advised to keep to his hobby of archaeology and to dig more carefully over the old bones of his past statements. In January this year he said:

> "I should like to think that supplementary budgets for the European Community would not be a thing of the future, but that would be too optimistic". — [Official Report, 22 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 884.]

Either he has dropped that caveat or he is becoming unduly optimistic. Certainly his statements do not carry much conviction. He may have been able to persuade the Commission, but some member states believe that there will still be a demand for more money until a price settlement is reached. That is what many people in this country also believe and what the Minister's evidence to the Select Committee drives us to believe. Given the Minister's record, I do not think that the House will have much confidence in his statement that the Community begging bowl will not be coming round again in the coming year.

The Economic Secretary says that Fontainebleau has changed the rules for good, but the European Commission apparently thinks otherwise. In a statement two weeks ago it said:

"For its part the Commission does not feel itself to be bound by 'budgetary discipline' considerations (this is an internal matter for the Council) with the exception of the farm prices aspect, on which the Commission has given certain undertakings."

Mr. J. B. Unwin, deputy secretary in the overseas finance section of the Treasury, in evidence to the notorious Select Committee inquiry on 17 June, said frankly and openly:

"the budget discipline agreement is not absolutely watertight".

Clearly, there is a division in the Treasury ranks on this. Mr. J. B. Unwin was obviously not a co-author of the Economic Secretary's article in The Times, or perhaps he was told to write something else—"Yes Minister" lives again.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman seems to be saying that the 1·4 per cent. VAT limit will not work or even exist and that further supplementary advances will be required. Perhaps he will be kind enough to give way to the Treasury Bench, as I am sure that the Government are anxious to make it clear that the hon. Gentleman is wrong, and to do so as clearly and quickly as possible.

Mr. Robertson: If the House will allow me a couple of minutes longer, I shall drive the nail further into the coffin. I shall then be delighted to give way to the Foreign Secretary if he wishes to answer the point.

A press release issued by the European Commission last week refers to the VAT call-up rate for the preliminary draft budget for 1986, which the Foreign Secretary had the audacity to boast about as an example of budgetary discipline. It says on page 3 that the VAT call-up rate will be 1·35 per cent., even under the strict assumptions on which the draft budget is based. This leaves only a slight margin of about 900 million ecu up to the new ceiling of 1·4 per cent. VAT. Therefore, from the words of the Commission itself we see that the budget margin at present, even making assumptions such as zero price increases, will be only 900 million ecu. That is for the 1986 budget. Therefore, hon. Members who have said that there will be an increase in own resources up to 1·6 per cent. in 1988 had better revise backwards the date at which we can contemplate Ministers scurrying back to the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Deakins: Is that Commission press statement and announcement based on the assumption that the Commission's draft budget, with its proposal for a 1·8 per cent. cut in cereal prices for the 1985-86 marketing year, will go through? If it does not go through, would that not reduce the margin still further?

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Not only that, but the budget for this year was written on the basis of a 3·6 per cent. cut in cereal prices, not 1·8 per cent. We do not know whether the 1·8 per cent. will go through, but we do know that the 3·6 per cent. will not. Therefore, there is already an imbalance in the budget, and that circle must be squared.

We must never forget how the last negotiation was conducted, given this evening's events. The much vaunted rebate that has been negotiated was to have been unconditional. Indeed, in our debate in January the new writer for The Times said:

"whatever decisions were taken about the mechanism for dealing with the Community's financial decisions in 1985, they would commit themselves to implementing in 1985 the Fontainebleau . . . abatement for 1984 to the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, 22 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 886.]

Yet only six months later our rebate is strictly conditional and absolutely tied hand and foot to three conditions: first, the Bill must go through this House and every other Parliament in the European Community; secondly, this Parliament must now agree to the supplementary budget; thirdly, there must be ratification by the 10 member Parliaments of the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Community.

That is some bargain! We lost our unconditional rebate, and we will soon be back at the negotiating table. We lost our veto on overspending. We have achieved no reform of the CAP. We have a shown-to-be-worthless guarantee on budget discipline. We have no guarantee that additional own resources will not just feed the agricultural black hole. We are forking out an additional £250 million in yet another supplementary bale-out payment, and probably more will be demanded. We have gone along with a colossal aid package, through the integrated Mediterranean programmes to Greece and other countries, which is bound to squeeze aid to our own hard-hit areas.

In his article in The Times the Economic Secretary to the Treasury said:

"Fontainebleau was a major achievement for the United Kingdom."

If that was an achievement, we wait with dread to discover what failure is.

We are told by the Economic Secretary:

"there is no doubt that refusal to ratify the Fontainebleau agreement would cost us dear."

We in this House must live with the fact that the passing of the Bill will also cost the country very dear. We will continue to spend more on the EEC, whatever the juggling with statistics shows, to the point where in net terms we will be spending £973 million in 1987-88.

For that we get a bloated and growing agricultural spending spree which piles up obscene surpluses, a total failure of political will to tackle the jobs crisis, which affects every nation in the Community and condemns more than 14 million of our citizens to unemployment, and a chronic inability to face the challenge of technology, pollution, energy and competition from Japan and the United States.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton rose——

Mr. Robertson: The Bill is all about endorsing a deal that solves nothing that is wrong with the Community, yet it concedes our one lever to make changes. It is a capitulation to the financial indiscipline that is at the root of the Community's inability to deal with Europe's problems. Far from being a permanent arrangement, it simply promises a return to the tangle when the new money eventually runs out. It has achieved only a temporary breathing pause at an enormous open-ended price. I urge the entire House to vote against it this evening.

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): Because of earlier events, the time for this debate is undoubtedly all too short — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I thought that my hon. Friends would agree. It is the only thing on which I agree with them. I hope that I may be allowed to make a short intervention about the Bill.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said that he has always been a supporter of British membership of the European Community, but it was very difficult to discern anything in his speech to indicate anything of the kind. There was not a constructive proposal in the whole of that speech.

When the hon. Gentleman complained that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary had made a deal, the first reason he cited was that this Bill had to come to the House of Commons. What ground for complaint is that? He then complained that ratification of Spanish and Portuguese membership had to come before the House of Commons. Why must the hon. Gentleman complain about that? Thirdly, he said that the amount of own resources also had to come to the House of Commons. Why did he complain about that? This is the democratic procedure of the Community. The hon. Gentleman has absolutely no grounds for accusing my right hon. and learned Friend of having made a discreditable deal by insisting and agreeing that those three things happen.

Mr. George Robertson: If the right hon. Gentleman were accurate in what he says I said, there might be an element of truth in his accusation. The point I made was that the House was originally told that the United Kingdom rebate was unconditional. I was making the point—I am sure that many hon. Members on either side of the argument would agree—that the abatement is no longer unconditional, and that it is subject to three major conditions which must be satisfied before we get the money.

Mr. Heath: Those three conditions are laid down under the treaty in any case. They are not conceded by my right hon. and learned Friend. No country can join the Community unless every Parliament in the Community ratifies accession. That was not a concession made by this Government, and the hon. Gentleman does not know the treaty or what he is talking about if he accuses my right hon. and learned Friend of a discreditable deal.

The hon. Gentleman made no constructive suggestion of any kind. He talked about agricultural reform. What does he mean? The Foreign Secretary has already given the figures for the increasing limitation on agricultural expenditure. When the hon. Gentleman and some of my hon. Friends are contemptuous about that, they should look at the impact on this country's farmers of even one move to control milk.

The last agricultural price review was vetoed by the Germans because the Bavarian farmers are CDU supporters, and the German Conservative Government were supporting their farmers. That is the problem. At last the fact has come out into the open that the French are not always the problem behind agricultural policy. From the beginning the problem has been the German Government, and it would be useful if this House made some attempt to understand the political problems of other people when dealing with agricultural surpluses and the price review.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: I am not prepared to give way. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]

What does the hon. Gentleman propose to do about the agricultural system? Will he return to the system which his Government instituted in the late 1940s? Will he put that burden on the British exchequer? That amount is far beyond anything that has been mentioned tonight about our contribution to the European Community. The amounts needed to subsidise farmers or consumers are enormous. The Conservative party has always supported the farming interest and will continue to do so for as long as I have anything to do with it. We are supporting the farmers.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: We are not. My right hon. Friend should ask my dairy farmers.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend has given me the case. Try to make one change in the agricultural price system and there is a revolt, especially from my hon. Friend. It is said that turning Britain from 63 per cent. self-sufficiency to 78 per cent. self-sufficiency has done us no good, but it has done the country an enormous amount of good. What reform does the hon. Member for Hamilton wish to bring about? The hon. Member has no idea other than to go back to the old subsidy system which the Labour Government inaugurated in the late 1940s.

Mr. George Robertson: In a brief intervention it is impossible to go over the numerous ideas available. Does the right hon. Member defend the obscene surpluses that have piled up in the past few years in the European Community, which are going to waste and which cannot be transferred to the southern part of the world, whose interests the right hon. Member holds dear to his heart?

Mr. Heath: What about the obscene surpluses which the Labour Government created when they operated a subsidy policy? It would be much more constructive if the hon. Member told us how to deal with the pricing of agricultural products in the Community and how to deal with the surpluses which arise.

The hon. Gentleman criticised Mediterranean agriculture. The only answer is to reorganise Mediterranean agriculture. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] It is no use hon. Members saying, "Ah!" To reorganise Mediterranean agriculture, the Community must have funds. There has been criticism of the cost of Spain and Portugal. Spain controls its wine and olive production. It is not a problem for Spain to control wine and olive production, because it has done so for a long time. Portugal is a poor country which we should be prepared to help. We have heard the economic point of view, but from a political point of view it is vital that we hold Spain and Portugal as democracies within the European family.

Some of us lived through the Spanish civil war—I was in Spain during the civil war—and some of us lived through the time of the dictatorship after the civil war. We do not wish that to arise again. That is why I am surprised that some Opposition Members do not wholeheartedly support the accession to the Community of Spain and Portugal—[HON. MEMBERS: "We do".] I am very glad. If the Opposition support the accession of Spain and Portugal, they must be prepared to support the cost.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: And unemployment?

Mr. Heath: There will be unemployment if the Community does not move ahead in technology.

We will contribute 7 per cent. to the Community's budget, France will contribute 27 per cent. and Germany will contribute 32 per cent. I take no pride in the fact that two other major countries in Europe can contribute far more than we can because, over the past 10 years, our economy has become so weak. That has not happened because of membership of the Community. Had we not been in the Community, our economic position would have been far worse than it is today. It was because people realised that at the general election, when the Labour party lost so overwhelmingly, that the Labour leadership changed its tune and said, "We will stay in the Community." Why has the Labour party decided that? Because it knows that it is of benefit to be in the Community, and that we would lose jobs if we left it.

The second part of the Foreign Secretary's speech related to the future. I am glad that the Government have taken the initiative for the Milan summit. The problem with summits is that the Heads of Government do not have the time to reach decisions on the major issues of the Community. I would strongly urge that, instead of a day and a half or two days, the Heads of Government—even if it means meeting every six months instead of every three months—should give themselves more time to deal with those major issues. At present, they do not even have time to give effective instructions to officials to produce or carry out the policies that they agree.

Therefore, it will be necessary at the summit to concentrate on some matters, and the Foreign Secretary is right to say that we must concentrate on turning the Community not only into a Community with a common tariff, but into a completely free Community. Of course, that will mean bargaining, and the best way to get bargaining is to observe the treaty's provisions on majority voting. That is a basic principle. The so-called Luxembourg agreement was blown sky-high by the British Government when they tried to insist that the price review was conditional on the budget. They could not prove that the price review was of vital national interest, since they had agreed it; but they tried to prove that the budget was of vital national interest and they would not sign the price agreement. What happened? The rest of the Community went ahead without us. It is a great thing that that is now out of the way. Now we can deal on the basis of majority decisions—

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): What about the Germans?

Mr. Heath: I strongly disapprove of the German action, which the Commission has overruled. The Commission has said that it does not accept the German veto on the price of cereals.

We must bargain on making the Community completely free internally, and it would be very much to Britain's advantage if we did so. Let us not try to disguise that fact, because our service firms and manufacturers would have much greater opportunities in the Community. The second matter on which we must concentrate is technology. We all realise now that Britain cannot manage modern technology on its own. We are having to import technology and combine with it, for example in the car and electronics industries. Since we cannot do it on our own, Europe must do it together. That will involve budgetary expenditure to bring about the change and developments required—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, yes?"] Yes, and let us accept the consequences of that. It will mean some Community expenditure. Of course we must control it and ensure that the money is spent properly, but let us not try to avoid the fact that it will involve expenditure.

I know that the Foreign Secretary will disagree with me, but I believe that Britain should become a full member of the European monetary system. Unless we accept full membership, we shall not persuade the other members to accept developments inside the Community for removing the objections and barriers to trade, and we shall not get them to accept the technological developments that we want. They will say, "Why should we do this when Britain is not prepared to become a full member of the European monetary system? The arguments have varied during the past five years, and they are becoming fewer and fewer. The Governor of the Bank of England has said publicly that he sees no economic objection to our joining. We are driven back to the last remaining argument, which is that if Britain joins it will harm the Community. Not even the rest of the Community believes that. It is simply an obvious excuse being put forward. Let us abandon that and say, "Yes, we will become full members and accept all our obligations."

Those are the three matters on which the Milan summit should concentrate. We must recognise that the Community, despite what has been done, or because of the loss of momentum during the past 10 years, has fallen behind the United States and Japan.

The other day, I read in a rather disgusting article by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that we are suffering because we are on the rim of the Community. Other countries are on the rim. How has California suffered by being on the rim of the United States? How has Japan suffered by being on the rim of Asia? That is a completely fallacious argument. Where we have suffered, it is because of our lack of productiveness and lack of technological development.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: What do you know about industry?

Mr. Heath: I have had much more experience than my hon. Friend.

Mr. Winterton: Nonsense. Rubbish. You have worked for a bank.

Mr. Heath: There was a tradition in the House——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Budgen: Give way to the disgusting man.

Mr. Heath: I did not refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East as disgusting; I referred to his article as disgusting.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Thank you.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend intends writing another article, so he can go on from disgusting.

Europe has fallen far behind the United States and Japan in modern technology, and it is falling further behind. Britain has fallen behind a large part of Europe. The only way to remedy this is for European countries to determine and to have the will power to carry through their aim to move jointly into modern technology. Unless we do that, unemployment will increase.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: We have seen it.

Mr. Heath: But not because of membership of the Community.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: Unless we have the technological development——

Mr. Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heath: I shall not give way.

Mr. Taylor: Why not?

Mr. Heath: If my hon. Friend is prepared to say that this reform movement is hypocritical nonsense and that he wants to break up the Community, I shall give way to him. That is what he wants.

Mr. Taylor: I think that all hon. Members appreciate my right hon. Friend's grand visions for Europe, which he is perfectly entitled to have. How can he say that matters will be improved by giving more public money to an organisation that is spending 54 per cent. of its budget on dumping, destroying or storing food surpluses? How will that make things any better for his grand designs or those of anyone else?

Mr. Heath: If my hon. Friend were still a Member for Scotland, he would get all the weight of the Scottish farmers, especially the hill farmers, on him about dealing blows to agriculture., At Southend, it does not matter.

We all want to deal with surpluses. I particularly want the surpluses to go to developing countries which are suffering from famine. The Community has done a great deal, and we can urge it to do more. That is constructive. It is not constructive to don the guise of wanting to reform and then proceeding to condemn and damn and prevent the Community from developing or doing anything. That is what this debate is about.

Are we going to support the development of the Community and our own development, or are we just going to allow Europe and ourselves to slide further and further down the scale? I know what the answer should be, and I wish that this debate were on that theme, instead of tiny meticulous arguments such as those put up by the hon. Member for Hamilton.

The Labour Government had 17 Budgets in five years; yet the hon. Member for Hamilton is telling the Community that it should be able to foresee exactly its budgetary requirements 10 years ahead. What absolute nonsense. No Conservative Member can say what the Chancellor will put in his Budget in six months' time.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: We are already in debt.

Mr. Heath: Yet we are saying to the Community that it has to prove the miraculous. There is another myth. There are many myths about this great bureaucracy in Brussels. Let me tell my hon. Friend, formerly a Member for Scotland, that the size of the staff in Brussels is lower than the size of the Scottish Office in Edinburgh.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: No.

Mr. Heath: It is; I checked the figures yesterday. Brussels is responsible for 320 million people; Edinburgh is responsible for 5½ million people. Which has the bureaucracy? Let us stop that spurious argument as well. Let us raise the level of this debate, as I have been trying to do, when we consider the great issues of state and, above all, the future of our country and of the European Community.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) expressed the very proper vision of the future at which the Community should aim. I hope that his intention with respect to lifting the level of debate will materialise. However, I have my doubts, judging by the number of sedentary interruptions to which he was subjected, but one must always hope.

The Foreign Secretary, after his confident opening remarks, seemed to lapse into the manner of an irritated and rattled infant teacher when he wagged his finger for a considerable period at dissident members of his party and in suitably simple words — mostly of one syllable — seemed to go over the top in claiming that the new budgetary guidelines for the Community, which are to be applied to the 1986 budget and onwards, are wholly satisfactory instruments. I wish that were the case, but I do not believe it is. The budgetary guideline is "that net expenditure relating to agricultural markets will increase by less than the rate of growth of the own resources base."

That is unlikely to happen, but, even if it did, it would be nowhere near enough. It does not satisfy the hopes which some of us have about what will emerge from the negotiations.

Not for the first time in a House that is dominated by the two major parties, alliance Members are baffled because the Prime Minister, speaking on 5 December 1984, said that the text on budgetary discipline could not be put into a treaty because "one simply cannot get agreement from all 10 countries. All of them have, however, agreed that the Council, which is the deciding unit in the whole Community, shall be bound by the clause on financial budgetary discipline."—[Official Report, 5 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 354.]

Apparently, we have 10 member states that cannot get agreement; yet they have agreed. I make that point because the case for this budgetary discipline is based on the fact that they have agreed. The requirement of a synthetic triumph calls for the sacrifice even of the English language and of the possibility of matters being properly understood by the House.

Mr. Spearing: Did the hon. Gentleman not understand when I intervened on this very point during the speech by the Foreign Secretary that, while there has been a conclusion, it is not a decision with a capital "D" and therefore it is not enshrined in legislation? If we are talking about discipline, surely even that is necessary for the Liberal party.

Mr. Wainwright: I should have thought that, too, but it is difficult to be clear about what has gone on.

I am sure that all hon. Members sympathise with the Economic Secretary's burden, for which he is cast in the role of Atlas. When he came before the Select Committee earlier to explain the new system of budgetary discipline —he did so very lucidly—he emphasised that it was underpinned by this splendid agreement with West Germany. He invited us to consider that that was the big strength of the new deal and that it illustrated the new climate in the Community. However, when he came before the Select Committee more recently, he had to admit that West Germany was "hoist with its own petard" and that he felt very sorry for the West Germans.

All this gives no pleasure to the Liberal or Social Democratic parties, because we want the Community to get ready to move into this future about which the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup spoke so convincingly. It is not convincing to have a system of budgetary discipline which the Commission says, I am assured, will only reduce the total claimed by the CAP from 66 per cent. to 64 per cent. in the next EEC budget.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that alliance policy is that own resources should be increased to 2 per cent. as quickly as possible?

Mr. Wainwright: The hon. Gentleman, with whom I have some acquaintance, would expect me to cover that point, as, indeed, I shall. I am not in the habit of trying to conceal the alliance's intentions, as I spend my whole time trying to bring them to the notice of the public. I have just returned from Brecon and Radnor where I have had a satisfactory 24 hours doing just that.

Those doubts and worries about budgetary discipline must not cause us to descend into absurdly juvenile Community bashing. The motto that served the Conservative party only too effectively in the years when the mass electorate was less well informed about public and international affairs has been, "When the party is worried and nervous about unpopularity and its misconduct of public affairs at home, let it step up the bashing of frogs and wogs across the sea. That will divert the attention of the electorate." That is what the Conservative party is doing at the moment, but I do not believe that today's electorate will be deceived.

As the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup reminded us, the House is not Simon Pure and it cannot lecture the Commission about budgetary discipline. The Labour and Conservative parties have seen to it, richly over recent years, that we have had our Concordes, Humber bridge, public sector pay bribes and many other pork barrels. The one thing true about a pork barrel is that it is always a leaky vessel. There is no way to keep a pork barrel full. Once we resort to mass bribery, the cry is always, "Give us more; give us more." That has been the cry of the leech down the ages.

We do not have much to crow about in this country over the detailed application of budgetary discipline. There is still a deplorable lack of accountancy skill in the Treasury, public purchasing departments and in the Departments which monitor the EEC. We have a long record, which will probably be broken this year, of gigantic public expenditure overruns. The party which was so set on ruthless and inhumane cuts in public expenditure has not been able to deliver them because it does not have the mechanism of proper financial control.

The Government must be thoroughly and more wholeheartedly willing than hitherto to agree to majority voting on the CAP. We should like to see West Germany voted down on that matter. I never thought that I should ever observe a more crass Minister of Agriculture in West Germany than the former Minister, Mr. Ertl. But West Germany now seems to have a Minister of Agriculture who out-Ertls Ertl. I thought that that was impossible.

The Community should be enabled to vote down West Germany and make it accept the medicine of majority voting which means accepting it ourselves in the future.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how he squares what he has just been saying with the statement made recently by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), when he asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to assure the House that we would continue to use the veto in all circumstances?

Mr. Wainwright: The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is well able to and must speak for himself — [AN HON. MEMBER: "He was speaking for the alliance."] There is no evidence that the right hon. Member for Plymouth Devonport was speaking forr j 6-3 the alliance. I was not present, and I am not prepared to be diverted by a red herring.

While stressing the need for greater budgetary discipline and a great improvement in the scheme, which apparently has so far been agreed to by the Council, it is of the utmost importance that the Community presses ahead in other expenditure regimes.

Research and development in most industries, compared with our Japanese competitors and the marvellously recovered United States, is in a pathetic state throughout Western Europe. It is no good kidding ourselves, and it is no good Labour Members kidding themselves, that little Britain can mount the volume of research and development required if we are to compete with Japan and the United States.

There is an urgent need to move to greater financial and currency unity within the Community. I was disappointed that the Foreign Secretary made no observations about the relative success of the ecu. I believe that it is now fourth in the list of Eurocurrencies. That is a remarkable achievement when the Community has been struggling in other respects. Will the Economic Secretary be able to tell us tonight that the British Government are urging full convertibility between official ecus and those held by the private sector? Are there other developments towards making the ecu, to some extent, a common currency in Europe, which is, of course, the objective of Liberals and Social Democrats?

Our message on unemployment at the last election was, has been since and will be that, although we have plans that we believe would substantially reduce unemployment in this country, they would be many times more successful if we were part of a European scheme aimed at reducing unemployment. That means a much more wholehearted commitment to the Community than the Government have shown. What is today's touchstone for the Government's commitment to the proper development of the Community? The Government should wholeheartedly welcome Lord Cockfield's plan to turn the Community into a genuine common market.

I was distressed to hear — I hope that I have been wrongly informed — that the Government are shilly-shallying about that. Although Lord Cockfield was one of the jewels in the Government's crown, apparently his proposals for turning the Common Market into what it was always intended to be are looked upon with some doubt by the Government. I shall be delighted if the Economic Secretary can assure me that I am wrong about that.

The claims for the Bill have been overstated. There is more to be done than the Government allow, but, because the Bill's aim is sensible and could lead, with greater Government commitment, to a quicker development of the Community along the lines that we have always cherished, we shall support the Second Reading in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): No one can doubt that the Bill raises strong passions. It also raises issues some of which are simple and some of which are of greater complexity. It raises major conceptual problems and the arithmetic involved is not easy to understand. That being so, it is important that the House should be well informed on those matters. The Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee has fulfilled a useful function in that respect. Without its reports on the Fontainebleau agreement, we would know little about the agreement because the so-called communiqué was a scrappy piece of paper, published apparently by the President, drawing conclusions some of which turned out not to be agreed to by the British Government.

[Mr. Terence Higgins]

More recently, we have been grateful for the further evidence provided by the Economic Secretary. By chance we were able to take evidence from him only two days after the Bill had been published. I regret that we have been unable, in the short time available, to produce a report on that evidence for today's debate, so we have no collective view to offer. Nevertheless, the evidence quoted by a number of hon. Members, not least by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), is very useful.

I believe profoundly in the importance of British membership of the European Economic Community. We should appraise the Bill from the point of view not only of the United Kingdom but of the Community as a whole. The Bill cannot be regarded as a success in terms of our responsibility to keep the Community on the right tracks. Many of the steps that it ought to be taking, particularly in relation to making it a proper common market, do not require further expenditure. They require more sensible decisions by the Community rather than additional resources.

The complexity of the issues raised by the Bill stems from the fact that the Government failed to keep separate: two negotiations which ought to have been kept separate first, the need to ensure that the United Kingdom pays its fair share of costs and, secondly, the question whether the Community's own resources should be increased.

The Government and the Prime Minister asserted that we were not paying our fair share—that we were paying too much and that our contribution should be reduced. There was no question of a quid pro quo, because an imbalance of this kind needs to be rectified in its own right. As the negotiations proceeded, the Government fell into the trap of accepting that there ought to be some quid pro quo. That raises very difficult issues for this country.

Our bargaining position is extremely strong. For the first time since we joined the Community, we had the opportunity to reform the common agricultural policy. We have thrown away that opportunity. To those like myself who believe that the Community's future depends radically upon getting the common agricultural policy right, that is a matter of great regret.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Will my hon. Friend give way.

Mr. Higgins: No. Many hon. Members wish to speak, and there is a great deal that I wish to say in a comparatively short time. I hope my hon. Friend will forgive me for not giving way.

Instead of standing firm, Her Majesty's Government went along with a number of dubious devices for keeping the Community going. We were told that under the treaty the Community is required to balance the books. The Prime Minister made it clear that there was no question of loans being made to keep it going. At one stage she said that it was not right to raise loans for budgetary purposes within the European Community because it was contrary to the treaty of Rome. However, within a short period, under the intergovernmental agreement, there was the charade that resulted in the invention of the interesting concept of reimbursable advances. In the view of the Select Committee, this concept was difficult to distinguish from a loan. It is rather like a semantic joke in rather bad taste.

Secondly, there were continual requests for more money. Some of those requests were, procedurally, very odd. For example, the Government decide to proceed one way, a case is fought through the courts, the unfortunate Mr. Smedley is left with the costs and the Government then proceed by a different route so that more funds can be provided. Another device is to make advance payments by resorting to the contingency fund and reimbursing it later out of the Consolidated Fund, on the basis of an estimate. Further payments are also made under the intergovernmental agreement for 1985 which is to be incorporated in the Bill. They are not reimbursable loans but straightforward advances.

This increase in expenditure has to be considered against the background of the House being asked to make severe cuts in a number of other areas, ranging from student grants to council housing. The additional expenditure has not been properly appraised against other priorities which require money to be spent upon them.

I concede what the Foreign Secretary said about the abatement. The amount we shall pay will be roughly half the amount that we should have paid without the agreement. Although the limit on own resources is to be raised to 1·4 per cent., it is expected, in the words of the explanatory memorandum, that we shall not pay more than 1 per cent. One is bound to point out that the explanatory memorandum does not form part of the Bill, a point to which we ought to return in Committee. Nevertheless, the public expenditure White Paper shows that the absolute amount that we shall pay as a result of all the negotiations will not be significantly different, in terms of cash, in the next three years from what it was in the last three years. Therefore, we have not achieved a significant reduction in the amount of money that we shall be asked to spend. In its own right that might be regarded as a tolerable outcome, but it has been achieved only by making substantial concessions and introducing the concept of a package.

I believe profoundly that we ought not to have agreed to a package. That was not our original bargaining position. The package is said to be subject to three conditions: first, that our arrangements for abatement should be confirmed; secondly, that there should be effective budgetary discipline; and thirdly, that the agreement of the House should be obtained. According to the mechanism that has now been devised, we may reasonably hope to receive the abatement.

However, the position on budgetary discipline is far more dangerous. The Prime Minister relied very much on the idea that others were now contributing more when she said:

"More EC member countries are becoming net contributors. Frankly, that is the best discipline that we can possibly have."

After the use of the German veto to prevent even a modest reduction in cereal prices, that does not seem to be working very well in practice. The Select Committee reported that such broad political pressures are no substitute for effective budgetary control mechanisms.

Secondly, the two sides of the equation are clearly asymmetrical. If the Commission or the Council wants to reduce expenditure, an individual member state who objects has a veto. However, only a qualified majority is required for decisions about the budgetary mechanism and its framework. There is therefore a clear asymmetry, which biases the arrangement against the idea that this kind of control would be effective. We have not managed to achieve a balance. One notes that the financial document that is to be incorporated in the Bill takes the opposite view to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who constantly tells us that finance should determine expenditure. We ought to be concerned about that.

In addition, we were told in evidence that there is a different spirit in the Community and that everybody is now very much in favour of budgetary discipline. We ought therefore to note what happened at a meeting of the Council only a few days ago:

"The Council noted that the Commission had not submitted to it the necessary figures for the establishment of the reference framework for the 1986 budget. Following a brief discussion the Council agreed to include this item yet again on the agenda for its meeting on 8 July."

It does not look as though the Commission was rushing forward to provide the necessary information to ensure budgetary discipline. It is scarcely a happy picture. Budgetary discipline has not been achieved.

One ought also to draw attention to what the Prime Minister said on 27 June:

"We should like the principles to be embodied formally and legally in the budgetary procedure, but it must be done in such a way as to guarantee them." — [Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 1001.]

That has not happened. The Foreign Secretary, I think by a slip of the tongue, referred to what is actually a conclusion of the Council as a decision.

"The text on financial budgetary discipline", as was stated by the Prime Minister subsequently,

"is binding on the Council itself, but it is not being embodied into a treaty or technically—legally—into the budgetary process. [HON. MEMBERS: 'Why not?'] Because one simply cannot get agreement from all 10 countries." — [Official Report, 5 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 354.]

This is a very strange guarantee. If one went into a shop and asked to see the text of the guarantee on something that one was considering purchasing and was told that it had not been put in writing, one would be a little worried about it. If we had had genuine agreement on it, there would have been no problem with putting it in writing.

Are we actually aiming at the right target in budgetary discipline? The agreement is no more than to stop agricultural expenditure rising as fast as the own resources base. But agricultural expenditure, which is now two thirds of expenditure, will be almost two thirds after these arrangements have changed, so there is a vast increase in agricultural subsidy even under what the Government regard as effective budgetary discipline.

Against the background of vast agricultural surpluses, there is no case for spending more on agriculture. The fact that expenditure is not rising as fast as the total of own resources is neither here nor there. Effective budgetary restraint — a change in the system that we had the opportunity to achieve because of financial pressures—has not been achieved.

There are tremendous dangers for our trade with the remainder of the world, especially the United States. That country has massive agricultural support programmes, but under President Reagan it is taking action to get that under control. That is not happening in the EC. I fear that we shall run into major problems—not just on spaghetti, but on the whole range of agricultural products. For all those reasons, I do not think that we have effective budgetary discipline.

A great opportunity has been thrown away. If we did not take a stand on 1 per cent. of VAT, it is difficult to know whether we would take it at 1·4 per cent. Indeed, the explanatory memorandum makes no mention of one of the items in the documents that we are incorporating in the Bill—that the figure may be increased to 1·6 per cent. It is strange to use the expression "it may be" because it can scarcely have been included for no purpose. However, we shall at least have had the enlargement issue if not the cost enlargement out of the way by the time we get the next limit. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said, the position of the United Kingdom will have been written in. Perhaps at the next stage—and it seems to be the general view that that will not be very long coming—we will do better than at present and make more progress.

I am left with a real dilemma this afternoon. I have always taken the view that when voting in this House one should vote as one would wish the House to decide. That is a problem, because we have been presented with a package. I have to face the fact that if the Bill falls, despite its massive imperfections and failures, the effect is likely to be a significant increase in public expenditure rather than a reduction.

I do not really have the options that I should have liked to have, and would have had had the issues been presented separately. There are still ways in which we can make further progress, but we have missed a major opportunity. Many of the points made in support of the view that we should increase own resources — in particular, the question whether we have actually achieved budgetary discipline—do not bear out the Government's case. For that reason, I shall most certainly not support the Government this evening.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) on his speech. I hope that it does not embarrass him if I say that I concur with virtually every word that he uttered. I also congratulate the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on its report to the House. The House would be well advised to take account of all reports from Select Committees.

From what the right hon. Member for Worthing said, there appears to be no case for the Bill. The case against it is fairly simple, and it comes under two headings. First, if we pass the Bill we are throwing good money after bad, compounding past mistakes and making matters worse. The Foreign Secretary spoke about what we would have paid if this and that had not happened. However, we do know that this year we will pay more in real terms than we paid last year and that next year we will pay more than we are paying this year.

The second reason why we should oppose the Bill is that it encourages and finances further lunacies in the crazy farm policy of the Common Market. It is rather like treating an alcoholic by giving him a standing banker's charge on the nearest distillery. What is the money for? It is overwhelmingly for agriculture. We have not had a breakdown, but we all know that it is for the CAP. In 1986 we will pay 2·5 per cent. more for agriculture.

That is the opposite of what we should be doing. We should be turning off the tap and cutting off the money supply to the CAP. We should be doing all the things that the Government say we should do at home, where there are cash limits. The trouble with the CAP is that it is limitless. By its very nature it is a bottomless pit into which we are pouring our money. All the chatter about reform is idle. Surely the lesson of our experience is that there will be no substantial reform of the CAP, because it is not rational, not sound economics, not sound husbandry and not good farming. Instead, we are dealing with something that is political, with vested interests and with those who benefit from this policy—for example, the Bavarian smallholders with their Mercedes who want to be kept in the style to which they have become accustomed, and by whose votes the governing party in Germany rules. What other explanation was there for the German veto on cereals? There is no logic for its use of the veto. It was based not on reason or sound economics, but on crude domestic politics.

What happened to the British veto in 1982 cast by the now Secretary of State for Energy? I do not know whether hon. Members remember that, but he exercised the veto and nobody took any notice. It was ignored. But when the Germans exercise the veto, apparently that is different and the Community takes notice. The brutal truth is that the CAP cannot be reformed. That could happen only if the whole structure were altered, if the principles on which it is based were reversed, and if it was changed into its opposite. In other words, the CAP would have to be destroyed. The vested interests will not allow that, so it will continue, ever more expensively and irrationally.

For those areas with intervention, whatever is produced will be bought—whether or not it is needed—at the taxpayers' expense. It is open-ended and demand-led, with no cash limits. Nobody knows what the cost will be. Nobody knows how much will be produced. If we drench the countrys.e with chemicals, pesticides and herbicides, we might produce very much more. If we have a bumper harvest it will cost more money. If world prices fall because we have a year of international abundance, whereas hitherto mankind would have rejoiced at the low prices, it now means that the CAP will be even more expensive. There will be higher levels and higher subsidies to dump EEC produce abroad which, as was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Worthing, will damage the interests of third parties.

Yesterday I was asked by the COI to a lunch with politicians from Uruguay, and I was interested to meet them. They explained that their main export was beef, that they were efficient, economic producers, but that the EEC had a beef mountain and Uruguayan beef was being kept out by the variable levy, although they did get a very small quota. Their main complaint was not that their beef was being prevented from coming into the EEC; it was their treatment in Third-world markets. They want to service and repay their debts, but they cannot compete against the EEC because of the export subsidies that the EEC pays on the dumping of EEC beef in Third-world markets.

The lunch was hosted by Baroness Young, to whom I pay tribute for her hard work in gaining friends for Britain around the world. She must have thought that this was a familiar argument, because I met her some months ago in New Zealand, where she had a press conference. She thought that she was going to be discussing a whole variety of matters, but found that the only issue mentioned was butter. That was because the EEC had dumped large quantities of butter on the world market and the New Zealanders could not compete.

The CAP is meretricious. It damages us and our friends around the world and it distorts our agriculture. I have mentioned the way in which we are drenching our countryside in chemicals and draining the wetlands to add to the food surplus. That has led to crazy land speculation and high land prices in this country, with the farms being mortgaged to the banks—and all to no good purpose, because the only result is dearer food for our consumers.

Therefore, we should not support or underpin such a system. To use an argument which I hope will appeal to Conservative Members, we should not throw money at such a system. We should wring its neck. That is the only sensible thing to do. We should do the opposite of what the Bill is asking us to do.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that another side effect of the CAP is that it has not only forced up land values but made it almost impossible for young people to buy land and enter the farming profession?

Mr. Leighton: That is absolutely true. Ordinary young people cannot enter farming. It is now run by City firms and bankers. I fear that those young people who do enter farming and mortgage themselves to the hilt will find themselves in great economic difficulties when some sense and sanity are brought back to prices. We are making great problems for our farming industry. The farmers are not benefiting from these high prices, nor are the consumers. The whole policy is basically anti-British. It is anti the interests of British taxpayers, agriculture and consumers and of our friends in the world, whether from Uruguay or New Zealand.

I am quite clear about what we should do. We should come out of the CAP and have nothing further to do with it. We should extricate, liberate, free ourselves from the common agricultural policy and bring agriculture back under the control of the British Parliament. We should have a policy which is in the interests of this country. Why should we not do that? Does anyone suggest that somehow world peace or international friendship depends on having a common price for turnips from the Shetlands to Sardinia, where there are differences of climate and culture and different ways of life? Is it not absurd to try to force all these people into a rigid mould? It is unnatural and only causes problems instead of resolving them.

Nobody in this House suggests that we should have a common policy for coal—that throughout the whole Community we should produce as much coal as possible and have it bought in through intervention. Nobody is so absurd as to say that we should have a common policy for motor cars and that, however many motor cars are produced, they will be bought in through intervention at the taxpayers' expense. So why do we have such a policy for beef or cereals? There is absolutely no need for it. This country is being conned. This has got nothing to do with the good of Europe or anything of that sort. It is for the benefit of the vested interests of continental agriculture and of the parties who want the votes of the people engaged in agriculture by paying them bribes. If the other countries of Western Europe want to do that, I do not object; that is their business. But we should not let them use our money to bribe those in their peasant agriculture to vote for the ruling parties on the continent.

I hope that later this evening we shall hear from the Government Benches some arguments calling for a healthy dose of market forces. Why do we not have a healthy dose of market forces, the law of supply and demand, in agriculture? If there is a surplus, why do we not cut prices? I hope to learn later this evening why, if there is a large surplus of agricultural products, we do not hear a demand for a cut in prices and financial support. Why do we not cut off the money supply? We are cutting off the money supply everywhere else. Why is it only in this area that the sky is the limit?

Elsewhere we are told that if there is an allocation of extra money, that means there has to be a cut somewhere else. The right hon. Member for Worthing talked about science. I agree with him entirely. When student grants were restored, the Secretary of State for Education and Science said that that money had to come from somewhere else, and he took it from science. We cannot afford money for science to keep this country going, yet we can pour endless millions down the black hole of this lunatic farm policy.

Only masochists, only besotted Euro-fanatics, only those who have given up rational thought, could support this misguided, misconceived Bill, which is soaking British taxpayers more than ever. We should throw it out with contempt.

6.57 pm

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): I appreciate that this Bill and the whole subject arouse passions, but I find it somewhat depressing that so much of the argument that we have heard today has been totally devoid of idealism. I greatly welcomed the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who was the first Member speaking in this debate to look further ahead.

On Thursday, the Under-Secretary of State said:

"Our hands are at last off the brake and on to the steering wheel."—[Official Report, 20 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 529.]

He did not mention the accelerator. In my view, this Bill is the first stage—late, but none the less welcome—of using the accelerator.

Mr. Marlow: I agree with my hon. Friend that we are on the accelerator — we are accelerating public expenditure. It is already 50 per cent. more than it was in terms of our gross contribution four years ago and it is going to accelerate even further now.

Mr. Benyon: I thought that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary dealt with that aspect very well. All that I can say to my hon. Friend is that, even ignoring the concessions made to the United Kingdom, the new level of contributions represents a minute proportion of GDP. It is a very small price to pay for the benefits which will accrue in the future. It is a minute proportion of the £2 billion referred to last week in relation to welfare benefits. There is no more barren exercise than speculating about what might have happened if history were rewritten.

When the Common Market was formed, Britain did not join. If we had joined, many of the changes that we should like now would probably have already been made. Europe would now be stronger and more democratic. We had a painful struggle to join and we were successful at the second attempt. That is when things went wrong. Many of us who were inspired by the European ideal relaxed gratefully. We believed, mistakenly, that the battle was won. We forgot the barrier formed by the Channel, which is so useful in war and so detrimental in peace. We left the scene to the nationalists and the Communists—one of the more bizarre political alliances of our time.

What we need now is a new vision of Europe — a new inspiration for the future. That is urgently needed for the United Kingdom itself. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The two most malign influences on Government expenditure are the cost of keeping millions who have no gainful employment, and the burden of high interest rates. Those are the two major pressures on Government expenditure.

The first pressure can be eased by increased economic activity within the Community, by removing the remaining barriers to trade and competition, by encouraging European industry and by ensuring that European inventiveness is given full rein. That can be translated into an industrial success which should enable us to compete effectively with America and Japan.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend has in recent months demonstrated a considerable commitment to reducing unemployment and considerable care and compassion for the unemployed. Is he aware that large sectors of British industry such as the paper and board and the textile and clothing industries are substantial employers? The textile industry is the fourth largest employer in the country. Those industries have expressed grave concern about the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Economic Community and about the effect that that will have on industry and employment in Britain. Does my hon. Friend disregard that anxiety or does he think that it is justified?

Mr. Benyon rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Before the hon. Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) responds, I remind him of the ten-minute limit on speeches. I hope that hon. Members will bear that in mind when making and giving way to interventions.

Mr. Benyon: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall deal later with the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton).

Let us consider what we have achieved within the Community in terms of inventiveness. Two out of three of the Nobel prizes for information technology were won by Europeans, yet Europe supplies only 10 per cent. of world production. Eight out of ten personal computers sold in Europe are American and nine out of ten video recorders are Japanese. If that dominance continues, millions of jobs will be put at risk. That answers my hon. Friend's question.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said so eloquently on Thursday, the problem of high interest rates cries out for this country joining the European monetary system and for the strengthening of the European capital market so that we can look the dollar in the face.

Europe, with 270 million people, has a GNP 30 per cent. less than that of the United States, with 236 million people. We lag behind America and Japan in the development of the new technologies. That is the real challenge.

As we stagger under the burden of providing adequate defence forces, why has the integration of weapon procurement and research progressed so slowly? That activity could be developed further. Why do we allow Japanese penetration of the EEC to pick off our modern industries one by one?

[Mr. Benyon]

Much has been said about the common agricultural policy. Of course it needs reform; of course surpluses must be contained; but we want a strong agriculture. It is better to have surpluses than shortages. In the Third world, surpluses would be called buffer stocks. The basis of the CAP is worthy. It is to bring the standard of living of the agricultural community up to the level of its urban counterpart. Reform has started. I pay warm tribute to the Minister of Agriculture for what he has achieved. The process of reform must be gradual. Agriculture is not an industry capable of radical or drastic change. We cannot turn off the tap just like that.

I support the Bill, because I want Britain to lead Europe into a dynamic and prosperous future. That means making concessions to achieve a unity of purpose. That is where the future lies. That is in our interests as well as in Europe's. We need the Community, and the Community needs us.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I have a question to ask the Minister about the Bill and the status of the intergovernmental agreement. We were told that this is an undertaking by representatives of the Government meeting "within the Council." I stress those words. What do they mean and why are they considered necessary? Is the intergovernmental agreement in the form of a treaty? Is the undertaking or intergovernmental agreement automatically a Community treaty by virtue of the piece of paper on which it is written or by virtue of its embodiment in the 1972 Act?

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) dealt with the CAP. Increased expenditure under the CAP budget is taking place this year. Even with the 1·8 per cent. decrease in cereal prices, the proportion of the Community budget taken up by the CAP is to increase to 74 per cent. No progress whatsoever is being made. As the Minister himself admitted to the House only last week:

"the Council has thus failed to take decisions on sensible price arrangements for cereals and rapeseed for the next season. This represents a serious setback to the progress which has been made in putting the common agricultural policy on to a more realistic basis."—[Official Report, 13 June 1985; Vol. 80, c. 1033.]

That is the Minister of Agriculture's comment on what has happened in the CAP so far this year.

Perhaps we shall achieve some fixed price package for cereals, but we do not know tonight when a decision is to be taken on the impact of that package on the total cost of the Community budget for the 1985-86 agricultural marketing year. I urge the House to recognise that we do not yet have the full information from the Government, because it is not available to them. We do not know whether the financial discipline agreement is biting on that part of CAP expenditure which will occur in 1986.

I agree about the dangers of the CAP to consumers in Britain and to world trade, but I shall concentrate my brief remarks on the budgetary discipline agreement—or non-agreement, as the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) has described it.

The Government must admit that the Council decision or agreement is not legally binding. The right hon. Member for Worthing asked why the other member states did not agree that it should be legally binding when they could easily have agreed that it should be. The reason must be that they do not take it as seriously as we do. That agreement should be a Community treaty. It should be one of the documents which we incorporate into the 1972 Act. We have to vote tonight on a one-sided Bill.

Secondly, we know that the budgetary discipline agreement is full of escape phrases which will be taken advantage of. We know that the agreement does not apply to the 1985 budget, but that it will apply to spending on the CAP in 1986, decisions on which are being taken in the settlement for 1985. The United Kingdom, alone of the 10 member states, has taken the budgetary discipline agreement seriously. I shall quote again from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who, on 13 June, in reply to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), said:

"I have been alone in asking the Commissioner, at almost every point of the negotiations, whether he remains satisfied that the cost of the package is within the financial discipline that has been agreed for the agricultural budget."—[Official Report, 13 June 1985; Vol. 80, c. 1039.]

Why was our Minister the only Minister concerned to ensure that the financial discipline and budget discipline arrangements apply to this year's CAP settlement? Because—this bears out the point made by the right hon. Member for Worthing—we take this financial discipline agreement seriously and hence are in the minority. I urge the House to bear this in mind when voting tonight.

The Bill contains the 1·4 per cent. limit, but we have an undertaking that it can go to 1·6 per cent. The 1·6 per cent. is mentioned in the Council decision which we are embodying as a Community treaty in the 1972 Act. Why is the 1·6 per cent. mentioned in such a way that it becomes a Community treaty should this Bill become law? Surely that will compromise and undermine a future Government's case when these matters are debated in the Community with a view to an increase in own resources from 1·4 to 1·6 per cent. Shall we not be told that we have already conceded the principle in having the 1·6 per cent. written into this Bill? If we pass the Bill in its present form, it is more likely that the figure will go up to 1·6 per cent. in a couple of years.

There is another danger relating to the 1·4 and 1·6 per cent. The intergovernmental agreement, which we are also embodying tonight, for the extra money is a non-repayable advance to the Community. It is a gift from the taxpayers of this and other countries to help the Community out of its present financial difficulties. This IGA is setting a dangerous precedent because it gives the Community extra money which is not part of own resources, or part of a treaty, although we are now embodying it as a Community treaty.

There is nothing to stop any Government negotiating a further IGA, regardless of the 1·6 per cent., the 1·8 per cent., or anything else, to pay money over to the Community and to embody it as a Community treaty without going through the normal processes in the Community and this country.

We are introducing a mechanism which supplements the own resources increase we are giving to the Community—a new principle in the financing of the Community. If the own resources, even though they are increased and will continue to increase, run out, we will not have to put things right by considering the expenditure. We shall simply increase the finance, not by increasing own resources, but by a further simple IGA. This is a very dangerous precedent and on that ground alone I hope that the House will reject the Bill.

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): Unlike the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins), I support the Bill. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said, we have a straight deal—an increase in VAT own resources and an arrangement for Britain's contribution to be reduced.

In an ideal world it would be necessary to do political deals, but we do not live in an ideal world. Without the Bill there will be no correction to our contribution and we should end up paying about double what we shall pay when, as I trust, the Bill is enacted. It would be insane to turn down such an offer.

The 1985 price-fixing package and the 1·8 per cent. price cut for rapeseed and cereals come within the budget limit for 1985. The Germans imposed their veto, but it has been overridden by the Commission, using its executive powers. I am quite happy about that, but I suspect that many right hon. and hon. Members are not. I think that even the Government will have difficulty with that development. I am dubious about the veto. It is not used because of overriding national considerations as much as it is used by politicians looking for blocks of votes and at the latest by-election results. That is not what the Luxembourg compromise was supposed to be about. The veto has been abused, and it is time that it went.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Knowles: No, I have only 10 minutes.

Germany might now be looking more to her own interests. Perhaps she has stopped being willing to be the paymaster and the whipping boy of western Europe. German nationals will now use German and not English in the Community. If the Community fails because of a rise of nationalism — it has happened before — hon. Members will be hard put to criticise Germany or any other country in view of the stand that we have taken.

The Government will be in a strong position at Milan. I should like to thank the Foreign Office team for what they have done in the past few months. As has been said, we have our hands on the steering wheel for the first time. What use will we make of that position? We must make clrarthe Government's view about the future of Europe. Our partners suspect that we do not have a view. Indeed, they suspect that, at best, we want a super European Free Trade Association and that our imagination can go no further. They also think that we will be tied to the United States for ever. The suspicion that lurks in the back of their minds is that General de Gaulle was correct.

If Europe does not unite, it has no future. Squeezed between Soviet military power and the technological power of the United States and Japan, Europe will become a small collection of colonies for somebody or other. Three major problems must be resolved at Milan. The first is the completion of the market. Lord Cockfield's report spells that out. The Council of Ministers asked Lord Cockfield what was necessary, but national Governments have already started to say that they like one bit of the report but not others. They must take the report on board if we are to have a completed internal market.

The second major problem concerns political co-operation. Much fuss is made about it, but I regard it as a bit of a farce. A readiness to consider a political and economic dialogue has been declared, but what has been achieved? Nothing. That is not good enough. To achieve anything, we must go further towards union. I have no difficulty with that, but I suspect that the same is not true for many other right hon. and hon. Members. It is surprising that any decision is reached in the Community, considering the way in which we set it up—with the Council, the European Parliament and everyone who wants to get in on the action taking part in the proceedings. We must clarify the mechanism. One cannot will the end without willing the means.

National Parliaments, including the British Parliament, have no real say in the early formulation of policy decisions. I am a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation. We see that legislation at the end of the line, and recommend to the House or to another Select Committee that it should look into it. We do not get a say at the beginning of the process, as we should. The House should ensure that its Select Committees get that sort of say.

One of the problems with our partners is that continental politicians deal with politics differently from the way in which we deal with them. Last Thursday, in an excellent speech, one of my hon. Friends pointed out the different methods of approach. We in the United Kingdom are not good at looking far ahead and seeing what the future will be. We have lost opportunities before. Indeed, on the Floors of both Houses we lost our first empire—the North American colonies. We had neither the wit nor the ability to construct a solution to the problems of representative government. We acquired a second empire, but did not know what its purpose was.

Joe Chamberlain was the one man who came forward with the idea of imperial federation, but the idea faded away. In the 19th century it was known that only the empire made us a power. There were plenty of books about that, including Seeley's "Expansion of England". We were not particularly important without our empire, yet we let it slip. We also let slip our chance of leading Europe in the immediate post-war years. We joined the EC later on terms which we did not like. If we miss the opportunity again, history will pass a harsh verdict on us, and it will be right.

The responsibility on hon. Members who oppose European union is to show how else the United Kingdom will play a role on the world stage. The drawback to any form of union is that one is only one of many—in this case one of 12—and one does not have total national sovereignty. However, at least we have a say in our fate. Without union, would we be truly independent and sovereign? We might be in theory, but in practice we would certainly be tied to the United States and Japan. We would become a cheap assembly plant on the edge of that technological empire. We might be prosperous, but we would certainly not be a sovereign independent state. In the end, European unification is about economic, technological and military power. Power matters in the real world. Countries and civilisations which forget that do so at their peril.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Last week we debated the institutions of the European Community, and today we are debating its finances and financial control mechanisms. It is of interest that between the two debates the Government met at the weekend to consider means of controlling public expenditure £1 million in the United Kingdom—paring off £1 million here and there. Yet, strangely, a few days later in this EC debate we are willy-nilly talking about spending hundreds of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money on extra public expenditure.

That is proved by the preliminary draft budget for 1986. It shows increased expenditure of £2,500 million next year. On agriculture alone there will be an increase of more than £500 million next year over and above what was spent this year. The draft budget also shows that the United Kingdom will continue to contribute net to the EEC as much as it has been doing in recent years. According to the Commissioner for the budgets in Brussels, our VAT rate will be 0·82 per cent.

A year ago, when the Foreign Secretary introduced the Fontainebleau agreement to the House, he said that it was "on a lasting and fair settlement of the budget problem . . . This is a good deal for Britain and for the Community."

Today he repeated that final phrase. The word "lasting" was important. Therefore, when I got the opportunity, in a supplementary question, I asked him how long he expected "lasting" to last. He replied:

"As long as it takes to convince the Government of this country and the House of Commons that a case for change has been made out."—[Official Report, 27 June 1984; Vol. 62, c. 986-92.]

That was not a particularly enlightening reply. We now have more evidence about how long "lasting" will last, because the Commission has seized the opportunity of the advance knowledge that VAT on own resources will be increased to 1·4 per cent. to produce a draft preliminary budget, which will spend almost all that money because VAT is set at 1·35 per cent. That may not be the limit, unless the Council, as one of the budgetary authorities within the Community, reduces the draft budget.

The budget is based on various factors, such as what the dollar exchange rate will be in 1986. The Commission has made it clear that the preliminary draft budget is based on the assumption that the dollar will have greater value over the ecu next year, and that $1 will be equivalent to 1·2 ecu, whereas at present the exchange rate is $1 to 1·35 ecu. As a Conservative Member of the European Parliament, former Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, and rapporteur for the EC budget, Mr. David Curry, in a recent article, said,

"if the dollar slips one point against the Common Market ecu it costs the budget close to £60 million."

Yet the budget is based on the assumption that the dollar will be higher in value against the ecu, and not the same value as today.

A second factor could increase the Community budget is grain. Because Russia will produce more grain this year than last year, there will not be the same opportunities for export by the Americans as there have been. America will, therefore, compete with the EC in the world market, and the chance of grain prices falling will increase. Mr. David Curry further states that "if the world cereal price comes down by 1 per cent. the cost to the EEC budget is about £45 million."

Clearly, next year's budget will be close to 1·35 per cent., and the limit according to the Fontainebleau agreement is only 1·4 per cent. The Government are right that that cannot be changed without unanimity, but, as has been said, we can avoid unanimity and still get more money for the EEC by having yet another intergovernmental agreement. The agreement that we are discussing today is No. 2, and in a few years' time a third agreement could certainly be introduced.

The Government's case would have been strong if the Fontainebleau agreement were lasting, but it is not. Already there is evidence that we are reaching the limit. Last week, when Commissioner Christophersen introduced the budget in Brussels, he said that "the Commission considers that the new own resources will suffice for 1986 and 1987."

That is all. The agreement will last two years. He went on to add that "the question of increasing them"— to a 1·6 per cent. VAT rate——

"should start to be considered now."

Those are the words of the commissioner in charge of the EEC budget. It will be two years at most before an increase in own resources is required. That is why the Government Front Bench has not felt comfortable throughout today's debate.

The budget is not good for the European Community nor for the United Kingdom, and it is certainly not good for agriculture. Another £500 million is being used to continue to produce surpluses that are not wanted by the people of Europe and that United Kingdom taxpayers do not wish to continue to finance.

Her Majesty's Government lost a golden opportunity when they reached the 1 per cent. limit. That was the time to have a radical reform of the common agricultural policy. The weaknesses of that policy are fundamental to the entire problem. I believe that the Government kicked for touch. They have two years' grace. The next election will take place before we again face the problem of the British contribution to the EEC. That will be in about three years' time. When the problem does arise, it will be much greater than it would have been last year or this year, and it will be even more difficult to resolve. For that reason, it will be worse for the EEC, for the United Kingdom and for the farmers of this country.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Taylor: As I have one minute left, let me conclude by saying that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ulster Unionist party, the fourth largest party in the House, will be opposing the Government tonight.

Mr. Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I am afraid that my speech may be rather a faint echo of what the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) has just said. I agree wholeheartedly with every syllable uttered by the right hon. Gentleman. I also think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary was right when he refused to give an undertaking to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

There are two reasons why my right hon. and learned Friend was right not to give that undertaking. However, first I shall reply to the criticisms by my hon. Friends the Members for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) and for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), who alleged that those of us who are critical of the Government today lack any European idealism. I believe, and I always have believed, in the European Community, but I want a Community founded upon a partnership of nation states. It seems obvious that, in this comparatively small continent of ours, it is urgent that we should try to work together in what I would call an open Europe, where each country can join others in pursuit of international co-operation to formulate common policies, and to advance their own interest and the interests of their neighbours.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes and I could prepare a list of at least 17 subjects upon which we could work usefully with other countries to forge a common policy in our mutual interest. Trade and defence would obviously be on that list. Less obvious would be pollution and company law. Agriculture, however, is one certain subject upon which it will not be possible to formulate a satisfactory common policy.

It should also be obvious that, as more countries have come into the Community, so it has become more difficult to find the necessary degree of common interest to formulate common policies to serve with justice the people in each of those 12 countries. That will be made difficult so long as we are tied to a common agricultural policy. That is why I believe that the Bill is totally and essentially misconceived.

If we are to pursue the goal of international co-operation in Europe, much more progress will be made if individual nation states become free to take part in a new policy or quietly to stand to one side. That is the meaning of a partnership of nation states, each state having the right to take part in the talks that may lead up to that common policy, but equally having the right to pull out if it feels that its own interests may be put at risk.

Instead, the Bill is part of a scheme to transfer massive wealth from northern to southern Europe. It is born of a fear that in Greece, Italy, southern France, Spain and Portugal there are millions of Communists and others who may become Communists. Most are called, scoffingly, peasants or are in industries serving the peasantry. Therefore, people think that lots of money should be poured into their pockets through the CAP to subdue their undesirable political instincts. [Laughter.] My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) may laugh, but he knows perfectly well that that thought is at the back of people's minds. That view is misconceived.

This country, along with other countries in western Europe and north America, is in the midst of a massive programme of agricultural research costing hundreds of millions in our own country alone, and many more millions throughout the world. The results of that research will be coming through in the 1990s. Let me give one example. On land on which we were producing wheat at 1 tonne to the acre 25 years ago, we are now producing 4 tonnes to the acre. When the results of that research come through in the 1990s, we shall be producing 6 tonnes of wheat to the acre. That is a 50 per cent. expansion of output in the next few years, yet now, on the eve of this year's harvest, we have in our stores over 3 million tonnes of wheat that we cannot sell. We cannot even dump it on the world market.

Last March the House voted more than £300 million for the cost of those surpluses. I see in this week's edition of Private Eye, which usually gets it right on farming matters, that the House will be invited to vote another £128 million before we rise for the recess, because the cost of looking after those surpluses in the intervening months has been miscalculated. That is a measure of how we cannot calculate the rising costs of a common agricultural policy. We can, though, be certain that by the time we approach the 1990s, the cost to the CAP of the commodities produced in northern Europe will be rising by about 50 per cent. The problem in southern Europe will be worse.

The CAP does not enable the peasants, as they have been rather dismissively called, to survive. Before the CAP, 20 million people were able to earn a living from the land in the Common Market. Now that number has fallen to 8 million and declines every year. This is where the trouble will come. In Portugal, 28 per cent. of the people can earn a livelihood on the land, and 88 per cent. can earn a livelihood on 5 hectares or less. That system of farming is not unlike that of southern France before CAP.

Those people survive because they can receive £250 a tonne for wheat, and all the other farm gate prices are in proportion. Yet the price in the Community is only £100 a tonne. That 88 per cent. of the people in Portugal will not survive on the basis of the CAP as it is. They will be driven from the land, and nobody can be certain of there being jobs for them in that periphery of the Community once they have lost their jobs on the land. The strain on the social and regional policies of the Common Market would then be intolerable and the cost to the Community would be appalling.

The Foreign Office is woefully ignorant of the effect that the common agricultural policy will have on southern Europe. If it were a little wiser, we should not have this Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): This is more than a tawdry little Bill. We are debating a betrayal of British interests because this little Bill is the key which turns the lock on the Prime Minister's Eurocage. The right hon. Lady has rattled the bars of the cage a great deal, and from time to time she has been allowed out to shout and growl on the bigger issues. But she has always shouted and growled like the lion in "The Wizard of Oz", which chickened out at the first sign of difficulty. We have had difficulties with these matters and the Government have chickened out on them.

Now the wise men in the Foreign Office — the exponents of the quiet British takeover of Europe and of the Prime Minister—are, by this Bill, putting the right hon. Lady back in the cage and saying to her, "Enough is enough. You have done your bit on Europe. It is time now for you to turn your attention to football hooliganism, the drug problem, the rates and any other issues that will keep things quiet for a couple of years."

By this Bill, we are throwing away the one weapon we had to secure reform in the CAP. We had the ability, through refusing to increase the own resources contribution over 1 per cent., to block everything, to hold a pistol to the head of an EEC which would go bankrupt without the ability to increase its budget.

We had the ability flatly to refuse to increase the own resources contribution until the CAP was brought into order. We had to be cruel to be kind and we needed to be tough to secure reform in this sphere. We had an impregnable bargaining card in that flat refusal. We could have imposed the policy of Thatcherism cash limits on the CAP. While we should have had to force a crisis, out of it good would have come because controls could have been imposed on the CAP.

That weapon, the only one we had, is being thrown away with this measure for a mess of Euro-pottage, for promises that we know will not be fulfilled. If the same basis is retained, with the automatic escalation of subsidies as production increases, there will be no possibility of restraining output and bringing the CAP under control. We shall have the same cycle of subsidies producing surpluses, producing dumping, producing increased costs, producing increasing destruction.

When a mild attempt was made to restrain cereal prices, as soon as it came to a policy of imposing restraint, the Germans vetoed it. That is how effective so-called restraints and controls will be. We have seen, too, the way in which farming is politically impregnable in the EEC. Farming cannot be subjugated in the way we need, unless we are prepared to use the impregnable bargaining position that we are throwing away. We have agreed to give more money to an alcoholic who, grinning with the bottle in his hand and raising it to his lips, assures us that he will reform. That is about the validity of the promises of reform that we have been given.

The nub of our difficulties is that membership does not suit us. So long as it does not suit us, we shall always be negotiating from a position of weakness in attempting to secure change in the Community. It does not suit us in agriculture specifically because we are, and always will be, net agricultural importers. It is not in our interests, therefore, to pay high EEC prices for foodstuffs that we can buy more cheaply elsewhere and trade our manufactured goods in return.

It is certainly not in the interests of Britain to assume all the odium of a system of agricultural protection that is generating increasing hostility in the rest of the world, particularly in the American market, where it will be used as an excuse for their protectionism against our imports, generated by the rising dollar, simply because we are taking on the odium of a system of agricultural protection which we do not need or want and which does not suit us.

Why should we incur that odium? Why should we support the folly, which is an obscenity in today's world, of the CAP? We are spending £800,000 a day to store food mountains when every minute of every day 30 people in the world die of hunger.

What was the fate of commodities taken into intervention in the EEC in 1983-84? About 85 per cent. of lemons were destroyed. In other words, 5,246 lemons were destroyed every minute in that period; 1,579 peaches; 41 cauliflowers; 19 lb. of tomatoes; 2,019 lb. of apricots; 5,266 oranges; 587 lb. of mandarins; and 134 lb. of apples. The obscenity that we are supporting is that that amount of produce was destroyed every minute in a world in which 30 people are dying of hunger every minute. That obscenity does not, cannot and never will suit Britain.

It does not suit us either because we have been hit disastrously by the impact of free manufacturing trade. That has turned what was a surplus in manufactured trade in 1970 of £2 billion, at 1983 prices, into a deficit last year of £9 billion, a turnround of £11 billion in manufacturing trade. That has been responsible for the loss of about 1 million jobs in this country.

In that situation, we are always arguing from disadvantage, because we are trying to deal with what is an agricultural protection society—the NFU turned into a system of government—as though it were some great adventure in international idealism. We started at a disadvantage. We are always forced to make concessions from an inadequate position, and we shall remain in that situation as we try to get concessions.

We are told that we have in the Bill a marvellous deal and that we must accept it because, thanks to it, we shall get a rebate on our contributions. That rebate, we are told, is automatic and guaranteed. That, too, is wrong. The rebate lasts for as long as the 1·4 per cent. ceiling lasts, and how long will that last? With luck, it might last for two years. The Community is already running out of money and we have written into the White Paper a provision allowing for the ceiling to be raised to 1·6 per cent. on 1 January 1988, and the Commission is already talking of a 2 per cent. ceiling on VAT.

Not only have we thrown away our negotiating position; we have no guarantee of a rebate. When we reach the 1·6 per cent. ceiling, our rebate will be up for grabs —it will be negotiated again—and we shall be back in a minority of one, the position in which we have always been. We shall be back in the old inadequate negotiating position, on our own, trying to roll the stone back up the hill. Today the Government are trying to convince us that they have got the stone up there and have triumphed.

We have already seen that our allies in this process cannot be relied on. Therefore, we are seeing the shameful spectacle of our people being squeezed by cuts, some of which are bearing cruelly on many of them—cuts, for example, in child benefit and in lodging allowances, which we discussed earlier—with the proposed collapse of SERPS and with no effective restraint on the money that we are forced to shovel into Europe at Europe's behest.

The Prime Minister's condition for giving way on the own resources ceiling was not to give way unless there was effective budgetary discipline; but there is no effective budgetary discipline, so the Bill is not just a betrayal but in domestic legal terms a shameful shuffling process. Originally, we were told that we were making reimbursable loans and we accepted the intergovernmental agreement, which was specifically set——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman has reached the limit of his time.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I shall be brief and shall refer to the Bill. Debates on this topic tend to become general discussions about the virtues or otherwise of Community membership. Foreign observers from other member states hearing our debates would be bemused, puzzled and a little disappointed that we still repeat the old, fundamental debate about Community membership. That issue was decided a long time ago.

A lot of nonsense has been spoken today about the common agricultural policy. We know that if we had maintained our domestic support system for farmers and for farm gate products the costs would by now have been far in excess of our contributions to the common agricultural policy. One need only make a statistical continuation of the figures in the 1950s and 1960s when the old system obtained and make the calculations about the consumption of foodstuffs to realise that these debates are totally nonsensical and based on a lack of knowledge of what goes on in the CAP.

Mr. Budgen: It is nice of people like my hon. Friend to let us have these debates at all.

Mr. Dykes: Members talk as though farm gate prices have the most direct and final effect on prices in the shops, but that is not true. There is a big difference between the two, which is a more important determining factor than the price originally fixed and negotiated within the CAP.

I, too, was amazed to read articles in the newspapers suggesting that there was some kind of sinister Government conspiracy and that instead of producing a respectable order the Government had produced a sinister Bill and published it on a Friday, and how harmful this was. The Bill is the best and most logical way to deal with this matter. It has provided a much bigger debate for dissident Conservatives who do not like the Community or its works than would otherwise have been possible. However, very few people have referred directly to the changes outlined in the Bill.

I make no apology for saying that, despite this being a one-day debate, this is a small and technical Bill for good, constructive Europeans. I hope that there will be an increasing number of such people as we settle down to the realities of Community membership. This is a technical Bill implementing the intergovernmental agreement, which will need to be ratified by all or most of the national Parliaments according to the procedures applying in each member state.

The 1·4 per cent. ceiling has taken a long time to be agreed. It has not been slipped through quickly by a sinister conspiracy in the Council of Ministers. The last increase to 1 per cent. took many years to achieve. If inflation receipts on the VAT equivalent base rise again as they did until a few years ago, the figure of 1·4 per cent. will persist and be entirely adequate for some years to come, but if it has to be increased by general agreement——

Mr. Budgen: Will my hon. Friend comment on the Foreign Secretary's reluctance to give any undertaking not to come back to the House before 1 January 1988 to ask for another increase?

Mr. Dykes: It is impossible to answer such an unusually reasonable provocative question from my hon. Friend in those terms, because that is not the way in which negotiations are conducted in the Council of Ministers. Finally, these matters are ratified and approved by the Parliament of each member state.

As a constructive European, I should like the 1·4 per cent. to be increased as soon as possible. The thesis of earnest Europeans is that the Community budget is still far too small in aggregate and that a great deal of money should be spent centrally on the matters referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath).

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Dykes: I cannot give way again, in view of the time limit on my speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) also referred to the need for the Community to work together to create a high technology Europe and to catch up with Japan and the United States. We also have to do a great deal nationally in that context which may have a limited connection or no connection at all with the Community. Britain is a seriously under-investing country. We invest in modern plant and machinery at about half the rate of Japan. The Community budget is actually a very cheap mechanism. Those of my hon. Friends who are always rabbiting on about how expensive it is should consider the need to invest far more money, public and private, in this country and to make decisions along the same lines through the European Community machinery.

While listening to Members fussing about the Community budget being outrageously big, I was musing on the modesty of the Community mechanism. I regret that the proportion spent on agriculture is too great, but that is not the same as saying that if the overall budget were bigger the proportion spent on agriculture would be smaller and the anxiety about it would decrease. Even with the latest increases in the draft 1986 budget, the entire Community budget is about £20 billion — roughly the amount that this country spends on dole money for the unemployed. Why do Conservative anti-Marketeers not put the same pressure on the Government to reduce unemployment, which is surely more important as well as more expensive?

The European Community is here to stay, not just because all the populations of all the member states strongly support that continuation and development. With the addition of two more member countries at the end of this year, the Community must now be developed in a concerted way——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: A Socialist way.

Mr. Dykes: No, the judicious use of public money for investment purposes is quite different from excessive spending on current account.

There are many respects in which Governments should restrain their spending on current account but continue to spend a large amount of public money on combined projects with private investment to build up the economy. We must build up investable resources in Europe. Unfortunately, the United Kingdom is the most seriously under-investing advanced country in Europe and probably, pro rata, in the world. The more money devoted to that purpose in the European Community, the better. At a time when this House, like other national Parliaments, should be considering these matters constructively and considering the expansion of high technology spending on ESPRIT and related projects, we get only curmudgeonly, pessimistic mumblings — from both Conservative and Labour Members — about the Community being outrageously expensive.

At least the Community budget, unlike those of all the individual member nations, does not have a built-in deficit. That in itself is a discipline, as is the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. I welcome the fact that at long last the Community is earnestly engaged—with the Council of Agriculture Ministers, despite the German veto, which I deplore as a total disgrace and which should have been denounced by the Government and by the whole House — in the control of agricultural prices. That has taken some years to achieve, but price reductions have been proposed and people continue to leave the agriculture sector. It is not true that ossification has set in. One has only to consider the reduction in the agricultural population in France and elsewhere. The Bavarians, too, need to be shown the realities of life by their political leaders.

With all those things in mind, as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) said, we must at long last begin to take the Community forward in an idealistic way and stop these absurd nitpicking little debates about tiny amounts of money which make the Daily Express feel pleased and happy but which make us look foolish to other European countries.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): It has been interesting to listen to the preaching of supposed European idealism — even idolism — by Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon) said that increased spending in Europe was an increased investment in public expenditure which was good for the European economy and jobs. Pardon my cynicism, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but if I heard the hon. Gentleman loudly preach that theme to his own Government, who have done nothing but cut public expenditure and investment in jobs, I might give more credence to what he said.

One cannot have the argument both ways. One must either adopt the market approach and ask what the return on our investment will be, or the much more social approach to public expenditure and investment. I do not know which approach the Government wish to adopt. On this occasion they tell us that we must increase investment in Europe from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent., and that that apparently is a good thing. They then wonder why some of us criticise such investment and ask what we shall get in return. In all fairness, we have a right to ask that question.

I have never made any secret of the fact that I consider the whole European concept, as currently constructed, to be an utter waste of time. It is bureaucratic madness and a waste of money, which, at the end of the day, produces nothing for the European Community. If we were talking about a free trade area that stretched northwards from the Mediterranean, which was enlarged to 12, 14, 16 or 18 countries and which operated a fair system, I would be all for it. But the current system is nothing more than an absolute waste of money, and it has many side effects that are utterly detrimental to the United Kingdom.

We talk about the CAP. But what does that mean in real terms for British farming? As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said, land values have escalated beyond reasonable levels. A secondary effect is that, unless they are extremely rich, the young cannot afford to enter the farming community except as tenants, but the number of tenancies available has decreased, and the Government have not helped by encouraging county councils to get rid of smallholdings. As a result, the first rungs of the farming career structure have been removed.

What would happen if the CAP collapsed tomorrow or if subsidy levels were reduced by force of economic circumstances? Many young farmers who are now buying their land on very large mortgages would find themselves in the bankruptcy court. Carey street alone would benefit, and the lawyers and accountants with it. The real farming industry would suffer. One cannot justify a policy which has that as a potential end result, any more than one can justify an industrial policy that talks about fairness and competition when that does not exist throughout the Community.

The British fishing industry has two thirds of the potential, but it gets only one third of the catch. Our trawlers are laid up, our men are out of work and our industry is dying on its feet. Is that an investment?

The heart of the glass industry is in my constituency, and it has some of the finest technology in the world. It is said that there will be common agreement on production rates and everything else, yet the Belgians, French and Italians break every agreement, not officially—one asks the Government to intervene, but nobody takes any notice —but by way of energy support prices.

Mr. Forth: Why is the Labour party encouraging Spain and Portugal to come into the Community, given the fishing implications to which the hon. Gentleman has referred as well as the implications for horticulture, farming and industry generally?

Mr. Bermingham: That is a fair intervention. I make no secret of the fact that I do not speak for my party from the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The Americans do not speak to the hon. Gentleman; they speak to his Front Bench.

Mr. Bermingham: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman.

I have no objection to Spain and Portugal coming in, provided that the ground rules are changed and there is fair play. I shall come back to that point, particularly in the context of the clothing industry and textiles.

If the rules on energy support prices, and so on, are not adhered to, in Belgium glass sheeting for double glazing, for example, can be produced and shifted at a price that is cheaper than the price we pay for the materials. That is the sort of club to which we are now expected to pay this extra money. There are serious questions about why we should pay such extra money, because it seems to be grossly unfair.

The United Kingdom textile industry has suffered grossly over the past 10 or 15 years, and only now is it beginning to struggle back on to its feet. Textile firms in the north and in my constituency will be seriously at risk if pricing agreements throughout Europe are not arrived at on a basis that will allow the British textile industry a fair share of the market. No one is asking for preferential treatment, only for fair competition within the Community.

In international terms that must be coupled with a multi-fibre arrangement that is fair to European, English and world trading interests. But unless the rules are played fairly across the system, the system is not worth having. The truth is that different rules seem to apply to different parts of the Common Market. At the end of the day, the United Kingdom always seems to get the worst of the deal.

I have lived for many years in south Yorkshire, which used to have many steel industries. From 1954 onwards one has seen how the rules have been bent in the European Iron and Steel Community, as a result of which the English steel manufacturers, who produced some of the best special steel in the world, found themselves on the losing side time and again.

It is against that background that we are now asked to increase our membership fee from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent., but in no way have the Government sought to justify it. It is said that the money is needed, but the level of expenditure is already up to just over 1 per cent. I have estimated that there was roughly a 7 per cent. leeway. Even in our inflationary times, 7 per cent. is nothing, and I do not believe that the 1·4 per cent. ceiling on own resources VAT—unless policies are drastically altered—will prove to be adequate.

There comes a time when some of us have the right to ask—I hope that the House has such a right—where we are going with current European policies. Are we seeking to produce the European free trading entity that was first conceived in the original idea and that will expand and benefit the whole of Europe? Alternatively, are we seeking to create a cosy little club, some sections of which will be cosseted at the expense of others?

At the end of the day we must decide whether, in what we do, we are seeking to benefit our constituents. We must seek to produce a fair trading policy across Europe. In my view, and I hope in the view of many other hon. Members, that situation has not been reached. The Government's attempt to force this tawdry little Bill through will, in effect, mean that some sections of Europe might be cosseted but that many more will ultimately be damaged.

I can think of many ways in which £1 billion would be far better invested in the United Kingdom than in the current concept that has come from Brussels. The original dream of the European entity was good. The reality is that it has become an absolute nightmare for which the United Kingdom is paying a very dear price. I hope that the Bill will be rejected.

8.9 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Over the weekend the press has prepared us for the debate. One remembers Belloc:

"The stocks were sold; the Press was squared; The Middle Class was quite prepared."

Monday's exposition in The Times was followed by today's contribution, neither of which did the greatest credit to their authors. The unease which fed the articles was expressed well today by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. He stayed in the Chamber to hear the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). Had that speech come from the Secretary of State, there would have been a cheer from the House and from the country. Instead, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary prefaced his speech with an apologia for the future of Britain in Europe and identified factors which he claimed add to our strength in the world.

The fact that our membership of the Community has diminished our influence in the world causes anxiety to people who are neutral to the intent and purpose of the Community. The Foreign Office has turned the arguments upside down. Part of the strength of our influence lay in the fact that we were a major purchaser of agricultural commodities from nations which had a natural advantage in their production. The influence which we exercised as a significant purchaser of the goods of Australia, New Zealand, North America and even Argentina was far out of proportion to that which we exercise as a rather junior member of the European Community.

For many years we have heard that our trade with the Community is significant. It amounts to 40 per cent. Conversely, 60 per cent. of our trade is still with the rest of the world, although we have embraced the European Community's common agricultural policy.

I cannot support the measure, because what causes most distress to the country and what is central to the Community is the constant burden of the common agricultural policy. The net contribution to the Community is borne by the ordinary consumers of this country. It is difficult to make the Government identify the cost to the consumer. In the United States of America it is a requirement of law for the International Trade Commission to assess what a tariff means to the consumer. This applies to shoes, corn imports or any commodity which carries a tariff. We no longer deal in those economics. We eschew the quantitative evaluation of the merits of an argument. I suggest that the common agricultural policy amounts to £10 billion of taxes on consumers. The Government seek to cut public expenditure so as to effect taxation cuts. The most effective way to raise the standard of living for people in Britain and diminish the tax burden would be to reduce the price of food.

The purpose of Parliament is to scrutinise and inquire into the purpose of raising taxes and finance, and this we do inadequately and woefully. The Government were elected to defend the common man, to represent his interests and to control wasteful taxation. We are gradually abandoning that policy. We shall return to this fundamental constitutional issue in Committee. We should not suffer taxation over which we have no call, nor direction, nor ability to abate. We must identify the cost to the consumer.

The Treasury must insist and the Government must demand that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gathers itself up and informs us about what a 10 per cent. reduction in the cost of food would represent. It could be £3 off the average family's cost of living. That would reduce the retail prices index, improve our standard of living and direct our resources to where they are most needed. My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body) has written an excellent book entitled, "Agriculture: The Triumph and the Shame". It is not true that we do not wish to support our agricultural interests. However, many hon. Members and many British people believe that we can better support and defend the interests of our farmers and represent the interests of our consumers without that especially pernicious instrument, the CAP.

It is not true to say that we have resolved the European problem. Most hon. Members recognise the reneging on undertakings which were solemnly given by the most senior members of our Government by their coming here today and saying that things which they promised would not happen will happen. One appreciates their difficulties. If we reject this measure, our immediate contribution will increase considerably. One feels that the Government started to run the race, were running strongly and then gave up. There was a sudden realisation that the forces were too great and the other issues too big.

The measure for which we shall fight across the Floor of the House during the next three years is tax cuts, and the Government have the power to reduce them, in a properly targeted way that reaches to the poorest and most needy in the community, by cutting their food bills. That is why I want the Government to take up the sword again and to fight back. The points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing should be adopted by the Government, and they should return to Europe and say, "The House of Commons will no longer support such a measure."

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I apologise for the fact that I have had to spend some time away from the debate. This subject commands much of my concern and has for a long time commanded my interest. I congratulate the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Sheperd) on a speech that deserves our attention.

Yesterday, I attended the first meeting of the Political Affairs Committee of the Council of Europe, at which we had our first glimpse of the document produced by the Colombo commission. That document, which was written by a committee of the worthy and good, considers the future of Europe. It identifies areas of real need where European co-operation would be possible. It calls for much more intense co-operation to deal with terrorism, drug-taking and unemployment among the young, and talks of the need to co-operate in enhancing Europe's environment. Those are all good causes, but the Minister and many hon. Members will know that the Community cannot offer a positive response to those or to any other good causes, because the Community will not reduce the proportion of its expenditure that it devotes to agriculture.

If the proportion of expenditure falls below 72 per cent. during this decade, I shall be astonished. But until the Community accepts that the proportion must be dramatically reduced, and until agriculture expenditure is borne by national funds instead of by Community funds, the Community will lack all capacity to move even remotely towards the ideals which persuaded many Conservative Members and a few Labour Members that entry of the Common Market was a commendable development.

I said at the Political Affairs Committee meeting in Paris yesterday that almost every Member of both British Houses of Parliament would subscribe to the ideals which have driven the members of the Colombo commission to their recommendations. All of us realise that we need substantial co-operation in Europe, but, unfortunately, the experience in the United Kingdom since we entered the Common Market has brought bitterness and suspicion, which did not exist before the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) dragged Britain, unmandated, into the Community.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): And without the full-hearted support of the British people.

Mr. Hardy: As the right hon. Gentleman says, he did not have their full-hearted consent. If the Government sought to obtain the full-hearted consent of the British people today, they would not get it. They will not get it until the Community recognises the need for substantial reform. The Government have an obligation to say that they will give no more money to support what is little more than insanity. For a while, I acted as Chairman of the Agriculture Committee of the Council of Europe and was therefore in a position to study European food policy. Indeed, I acted as rapporteur. The more I looked at the insanity, the more curious I became.

I remember raising in the House the fact that the Soviet Union had doubled its wine purchases for five successive years and was paying the princely sum of 4·5p a litre. The House was amused when I suggested that this was a gesture to achieve disarmament and détente through alcoholic euphoria, but it was not a laughing matter. Nor is it a laughing matter when my colleagues in the Council of Europe who live in wine-producing areas can boast that wine production has increased by a factor of five in a decade and we know that there is an enormous and growing surplus of wine. We know that the problem of wine storage will loom ever larger than the problem of the butter mountain. In a frivolous moment I have suggested that eventually we shall have to put a cork south of Gibraltar to make the Mediterranean sea a repository for surplus wine and Italian sewage.

British Governments have an obligation to speak out with sanity. There was certainly a need for sanity two or three years ago when our steel industry was being contracted. My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther), who is a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, met Count Davignon and asked him why Britain was required to contract its steel industry to fulfil Community policy while the Italians were busily engaged in expanding their industry in defiance of that policy. His response was, "We cannot do anything about Italy." Britain's economic position is as parlous as Italy's. It may be that this is due to the improvement that the Italian Administration has secured through sheer defiance of Community regulations.

Those of us who live in constituencies and represent areas where there are 10 times as many people unemployed as there are vacancies in a year and where the unemployment prospects are dreadful and will soon be devastating, no matter how much Ministers trumpet about recovery—we have not seen much sign of recovery in many parts of England's industrial heartlands—find it impossible to endorse the Government's policy. The Government are prepared to spend vast sums in supporting wasteful excess and inadequate controls in the Community while the needs in our areas are bewildering.

I trust that the Minister will respond to the arguments that have been advanced by some of his colleagues, because it is right that Britain should speak out in Europe and ensure that its interests, in the areas with the highest unemployment in Europe, are properly recognised.

As the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills has pointed out, experience has shown that we have turned from the deep-water diplomacy which dominated our foreign policy until recently and that entry into the Common Market has brought to our policies a layer of introspection which has changed the character and approach of British political life. It may be that we cannot easily extricate ourselves from Europe, and I would not dissent from the argument that it would be difficult for us to secure this disentanglement. If we are not going to disentangle ourselves, we have no alternative but to ensure that we do all that we can to ensure that the European Community puts its house in order. It is a disorderly house if there is the extravagance of an agricultural policy that imposes no limit on the waste but demands that industries such as those that have served Britain well, providing the economic base for areas such as mine, should be driven into desolation.

Wine, corn and butter are still produced in profusion, but one of the most successful steel works in Europe, at Tinsley Park in Sheffield not far from my constituency, has to be closed to comply with the demands of economic planning imposed by people who have taken leave of their senses. If we have waste in Europe, we must insist that there is productivity and employment in the United Kingdom. Unless the Government are prepared to set that point firmly in their mind, they will fail. In that case, I hope that, they will attract the sincere and genuine opposition of Conservative as well as Labour Members.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): One point that is fundamental to consideration of the Bill was the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary that the Bill represents the most significant piece of primary legislation since the original legislation that took us into the Common Market 12 years ago. I wish to examine on that basis the arguments about what the House should do.

Some hon. Members oppose our membership of the European Community. They have spoken most eloquently and been heard with respect. It is not surprising, therefore, that, when they are asked to take the next step down the road to the development of the Community, they should stand out against it.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Powell: I shall not give way. My hon. Friend knows that we are all limited by time.

It is not surprising that those who oppose our membership refuse to take the next step, just as they refused 12 years ago to take the next step.

There are those who favour membership but believe that the position advanced by the Bill cannot be supported. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) eloquently advanced that point, which has found substantial echoes of support in the House. I believe that that is a profoundly mistaken view, because it is not for any of us as Members of the House of Commons to second-guess the negotiations that have been carried out by the Government. I do not doubt that we would all have liked to achieve something slightly different, but those Members on the Treasury Bench who participated in the negotiations are the only people who had to judge whether a bargain could be struck. Ultimately, the House must decide whether it is prepared to entrust confidence in the Government. That is our power and responsibility.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary came to the House, as did my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and said that this was the best deal that could be struck on behalf of the country. They commended the deal to the House on that basis. We have heard a number of contrary arguments. Some hon. Members say that they could have made a better deal, but the fact is that they are second-guessing the people who have the responsibility for conducting our foreign and international policy.

When the Foreign Secretary says that this is the best deal, it becomes a question of confidence. Are we prepared to entrust confidence in him? Although I do not support many aspects of the Community — indeed, I wish to change them, as, I am sure, does my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes)—the fact is that this is where we are.

Where would we be if we were to reject what the Bill offers and to refuse the next step towards the development of the Common Market? We should be in the worst possible position. We should remain in the Community — as, of course, a number of hon. Members wish, although they reject the conclusions reached by Her Majesty's Government—but what influence should we have? We should have virtually none, because the best that could have been obtained would have been rejected by the House. The European Community would be developed by our partners and we should have virtually no part in it. We should stand on the sidelines. We should be ignored and despised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body) said that we need a common market for company law, international trade, and so on. If we reject the Bill, and the further development of the Community that is implicit in it, that will never come about. We shall have no chance of securing the objectives that he so eloquently advanced and which I passionately share.

If we wish to develop Europe and come together as a Community, we have no alternative but to accept the advice that has been given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. The House of Commons must fulfil its historic function and have confidence in Her Majesty's Ministers.

The arguments put forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing and by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) are fundamentally flawed. Their objectives and analysis may command wide support, but they have no chance of achieving their objectives if they stand apart and say to the rest of the Community, "We will have no part of it."

The hon. Members for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said that we had thrown away our best bargaining card. That implies that they would have been prepared to continue the year-on-year struggle to obtain a British rebate. We shall not be able to obtain the British rebate if we reject the Bill, because we have not been able to obtain it in the past. Little progress would be made. Their argument is fundamentally flawed. We have used our best bargaining card to the point where it gave us the maximum return.

In those circumstances, my right hon. and learned Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury struck the best bargain at the right moment. We used our cards to the best effect and obtained the best deal that we could. We are now presented with a choice: do we or do we not proceed with the development of the Community? If we wish to develop the Community in all its aspects, the only choice is to support Second Reading of the Bill.

If we reject the Bill, the message will go loud and clear to our partners in the Community that we are not serious in wanting to be a member of the European Community and that they can go their way and leave us aside. We shall find that our influence in the world is but a small percentage of that imagined by those who have so eloquently argued that we can stand apart, defy the forces of the world and go it alone. That may have been possible at one time. That option is not open to us now.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The debate, which has been dominated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), contained an exceptionally important speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). I do not suppose that any hon. Member is held in higher esteem than he is, or is more justly held in that esteem. It is therefore important to meet head on the argument that he deployed. It is central to the debate. Although hon. Members will stream in at the end of today's proceedings and vote as the Whips direct, this is supposed to be a debating Chamber, and my right hon. Friend's arguments deserve to be taken seriously.

The centre of his argument was that we had an outstandingly good case and that therefore there was no need for us to give a quid pro quo to achieve a settlement satisfactory to the United Kingdom. It seemed a good case to every hon. Member. To the other members of the Community, the case did not seem so good. The United Kingdom, which has demanded a reduction in its contribution to the Community, is the only member of the Community that is self-sufficient in energy. The United Kingdom's case for special treatment, therefore, did not seem so blindingly clear to other members of the Community as it seemed to every one of us.

My hon. Friend was a distinguished Treasury Minister. As far as I can recall, his duties in the Treasury were involved mainly with the management of the money market. He was perhaps less involved with international negotiations than some of his other Treasury colleagues. My experience as a lowly member of the diplomatic service taught me that one receives nothing for nothing and that there is always a quid pro quo. One achieves nothing in international negotiations unless one is prepared to make some concession.

My right hon. Friend said that we had a bargaining weapon so powerful that we should not have been prepared to concede anything in return. It was the same bargaining weapon that Samson used so effectively. It is so powerful that it brings down the roof not just on everyone else but on ourselves. I cannot hope to persuade my right hon. Friend by what I have been saying, but I do not accept his case. I accept the case that the Government put forward —that they obtained for this country the best possible bargain at Fontainebleau and that the Bill enshrines that bargain.

The Government obtained a good bargain at Fontainebleau because, for the first time for many years, they stopped thumping the table and put forward to the meeting a paper which was by far the most constructive, forward-looking and interesting contribution to the European debate that the British Government had made for a long time.

The agreement reminds me of a subscription to a Christmas club. Anyone who objects to the Christmas club putting up the subscription when his own subscription will be halved and his divvy will be upped must be stark, staring mad. We must accept the whole of the Fontainbleau agreement or none of it. We cannot swallow the bits that we like and spit out those that we do not like.

The Bill and the agreement to which it gives effect mark the end of the interminable dispute over Britain's contribution to the European Community which has paralysed the Community for five years. The way is now open to make the Community into what it should be—a unique system which allows member countries, while keeping their national identities, to increase their influence and wealth more than they could possibly do by their own efforts. For the first time there is an opportunity that would have seemed unimaginable two years ago: the opportunity to make progress towards a European Community that works.

The new Commission is incomparably better than its predecessor. In M. Jacques Delors we have a President who gets things done, who believes in an open and competitive economy and who is fully backed by the French Socialist Government who appointed him. In Lord Cockfield we have, I admit somewhat to my surprise, a commissioner who has come forward with bold and radical ideas for advancing swiftly towards a unified market, which is the primary aim of British policy. Already things are beginning to move.

At the last meeting, the Foreign Secretary made very sensible suggestions for improving decision-making by making more use of qualified majority voting. I stress "qualified majority voting". People speak as though we had merely one vote among nine. With majority voting, provided that we have the support of one other country, we need never make use of the veto. The proposals stand a very good chance of being accepted, provided that we can get the Italians, who will be in the chair at Milan, to use their considerable expertise in the Presidency. All of us pay homage to the excellent way in which on more than one occasion the Italians have conducted their chairmanship. Provided that we obtain their support for the British Government's proposals, there is a very good chance that they will be accepted.

If to obtain that support we have to pay a very small price in terms of European symbols—it would be absurd to jib at such symbols as national anthems and flags that cost so little and give so much satisfaction on the Continent —or the very much larger price that I hope we are now ready to pay and that will benefit us as much as anybody else—to complete the European monetary system by this country joining its exchange rate mechanism—I believe that these proposals will be accepted.

I support the Bill and I challenge any hon. Member who opposes it to say how we can throw it out and still remain an effective member of the Community. I want the Community to get on with its job of enabling this country and other members of the Community to strengthen their influence in the world and provide better living conditions for their people.

That brings me to the one contentious part of my speech. Even the increased budget of the European Community is far too small. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, I want a great deal more money to be spent upon technological advance, common procurement and financing the European defence industries. I do not believe that even the most ardent supporter of a free market would say that people can be induced to buy their own tanks and guns.

Although the budget is far too small, most of it is wasted. We should be far better off without the common agricultural policy, but we have to live with it. Nor is the money spent upon the regional policy a proper activity for the European Community. This work could be done far better by national Governments. All the money should be spent on financing technological achievement. That is the way in which Europe could make a major contribution to raising living standards generally.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I begin by giving some credentials to the House. There is no reason why I should, but I do so only for this reason. It is often said that those who criticise the European Community or who are bold enough to criticise a Bill such as this are in some sense anti-European. There is nothing wrong with being anti-European. It is a perfectly respectable political position to adopt. However, it is not a position that I occupy. Throughout the late 1960s and early 1970s I campaigned for the entry of the United Kingdom into the European Community and I spent five years as a member of the European Parliament, so I am marginally qualified to comment on this Bill. I do not do so as one who argues that we should leave the Community, but we must keep in perspective those matters that the Community can do best.

It can be a very effective trading block and customs union. It can, and rightly should, perform the task of representing the interests of its members in a world trading sense, and from time to time we may be able to identify those matters that the Community can perform better than individual member states. But that does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that we should vote for the Community a budget which sets about identifying more and more things upon which money should be spent. The common agricultural policy is a classic example of a policy that began with very high hopes and splendid ambitions but which has come very badly unstuck.

The question that has to be asked tonight is: do we have a better chance of reforming the CAP and setting Europe back again on the right rails by retaining the 1 per cent. VAT limit, or should we trust to good luck and good fortune and the majority vote in the future and provide the Community with more money at this stage?

We have been told over and over again in this debate, including by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, that the Bill represents a good deal for the United Kingdom. Perhaps it does; perhaps it does not. I am more interested in what is a good deal for the European Community. I am not yet convinced that we shall do the Community any good by removing the one thing that until now has concentrated minds and disciplined the Community: the 1 per cent. VAT ceiling. We have been told that the new ceiling of 1·4 per cent. will be bumped up again as early as next year and that it is already provided for in the 1986 preliminary draft budget. What that means for discipline I do not know.

Two main reasons are given for the Bill. The first is enlargement of the Community. I do not support enlargement. I am a lone voice on that, although I appreciate any support from my hon. Friends. However, the House has not been given an opportunity to say what it thinks about enlargement, except in my Adjournment debate before Easter in which I discussed the matter at some length with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

The real reason why I am unable to support the Bill and will vote against it is because the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Economic Secretary have said that effective budgetary discipline will be introduced. The budgetary discipline document says:

"the level of expenditure will be fixed on the basis of available revenue, and that budgetary discipline will apply to all budgetary expenditure."

That is splendid.

Article 1 then refers to a reference framework being fixed each year, the maximum level of expenditure being fixed within that framework. That is also splendid. However, it then falls apart because article 2 says:

"Account shall be taken of exceptional circumstances, in particular in connection with enlargement."

Therefore, the budgetary discipline document admits of the possibility of unidentified exceptional circumstances that may alter the budget discipline. Article 5 says that, "barring aberrant developments" agricultural expenditure will be brought back within the limits imposed by the guidelines. We do not know what those "aberrant developments" are. However, in the view of the Economic Secretary, what would happen if there were two or three consecutive years of record harvests in the Community, to say nothing of developments in the world market for agricultural products?

Finally — this blows a hole in the entire claimed budgetary discipline mechanism—article 6 says:

"the Council, acting by the majority referred to in article 1(2), may amend the reference framework".

In other words, having started the year by identifying limits, we can at any time vary them or do away with them altogether.

If this is being offered to me by my Government as a serious attempt at budgetary discipline on a Community that until now has shown no will or ability to discipline its expenditure, I cannot accept it. Until I am convinced that that document and these words mean something—that bringing into the Community two countries that can only benefit from increased expenditure — until I am convinced that the Germans did not really mean what they have recently done and until I am told how it is that by bumping up the 1986 preliminary draft budget we shall not go beyond the 1·4 per cent. that is now proposed in the foreseeable future, I shall have to vote against the Bill.

8.50 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I make no apology for confining my remarks to the CAP. It is because of the colossal expenditure on the CAP that the Bill has been introduced. The Government are cutting public expenditure in areas that hit the poorest people in our society. They are cutting back on important areas for our community. Their whole philosophy is one of reducing public expenditure. Therefore, it is remarkable that they are prepared to continue to sanction the wasteful expenditure of thousands of millions of pounds. To some extent, that money is used to give an open-ended state commitment to farmers to produce as much as they want, regardless of need. Our intervention stores have more food in them now than ever before. Thousands of millions of pounds have been wasted destroying the markets of other countries, especially of the Third world. There is a real and understandable conflict between the United States Administration and the European Commission because of the enormity of the subsidies that the EEC has been prepared to use to win markets to dump surplus produce.

I was privileged to represent this country during the last Labour Government, sometimes in the company of my right hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin). At the time of the referendum it was remarkable that EEC prices were about the same as world prices. That, of course, was a freak position. Subsequently, world prices returned to a more realistic level, but EEC prices continued to be set well above them.

I acknowledge that the Labour Government were repeatedly bought off by such bribes as butter subsidies. They did not take a sufficiently determined stand to hold down prices. It was only at the last price-fixing—we lost power in the middle of it — that the Labour Government had a mandate to dig in their heels and hold down prices.

[Mr. Gavin Strang]

That has happened with this Conservative Government. Instead of embarking upon a policy to reform the CAP and hold down expenditure, they have concentrated on trying to obtain unilateral independent action in the Community to help reduce our net budgetary contribution. Indeed, during the past six years, the Government have made no real attempt to obtain real changes in the CAP. An example of that is the development of the sheepmeat regime. I remember debating that on a Friday afternoon two or three years ago. The then Minister presented it as a great achievement, but the majority of speakers from both sides of the House were highly critical of it.

Instead of creating a common market for sheepmeat —which would have been in the interests of Scottish producers—the regime was drawn up in a complicated manner precisely to keep Scottish lamb out of the French markets. It was a grotesque regime which cost a great deal of money. This country may be a net beneficiary, but there is guaranteed intervention on the Continent, headage payments for some countries and a deficiency payments scheme operating in this country.

That grotesque regime makes no sense to anyone looking at the development of sheep production in the Community. Instead of tackling the real problem, each country is prepared to accept a bribe. There is an unlimited amount of money and it is used to keep countries quiet. We seem to be continuing along that road.

The next major development was the implementation of milk quotas. That was an admission of failure. Every producer is given a rigid quota. It is an admission that we are not prepared to use the price mechanism to discipline the level of production. We will be stuck with a surplus in milk production. We must ensure that we are not destroying British jobs and making disproportionate cuts in our production while the Community as a whole increases production or maintains it at present levels.

I hope that the Government will decisively kill the nonsensical suggestion of quotas for cereals. I accept that, having imposed milk quotas, we should try to make them work and reduce milk production throughout the Community, but cereal quotas would be diabolical. Cereals are a fundamental cost in the agriculture industry. They determine the price of livestock production — especially of pigs and poultry—where 70 per cent. of costs are accounted for by the price of cereals. It would be disastrous if the Community adopted cereal quotas.

I shall not take the time of the House to put forward other practical arguments against cereal quotas. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that the Government will stand by their policy—I accept that they are doing so at the moment—so that, even if we cannot achieve the full 5 per cent. reduction in cereal prices that we should have had this year, at least the price will be held down. It is incredible that the German Government, who have traditionally supported the idea of the European Community, should have been prepared to stand apart on this issue. There is no case for keeping prices above the level of world prices.

When I was first elected to the House and began to study these matters, people in Brussels described the CAP as the vehicle of integration. It was the great common policy. They thought that it was sacrosanct because it would bring the Community together. In fact, it has done the opposite. Far from being a vehicle of integration, it is the main source of disunity, of waste and of lack of progress. It is one area in which we should not try to develop a common policy. If we consider the different types of agriculture and Government intervention, we must recognise that there is no case for going down that road.

We must think of the investment that we could make in science and technology—areas where there is a case for saying that Britain is not large enough to act unilaterally and that there should be collaboration within the framework of the Community. Small countries such as ourselves, Germany and France cannot act alone against such large countries as Japan and the United States.

I regret that Britain is in this position. Surely there must be common ground at least on the view that the Government must take a tough line, although I do not dispute that during the present round of price fixing they have taken a tough line. They must not be prepared to concede further increases in prices for products in surplus.

8.59 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I rise to support this Bill as one who supported entry into the Common Market originally and believes that we should stay in and play a very active role in its further development. I want to make four points very briefly.

The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), opening the debate for the Opposition, was perhaps attacking from the financial standpoint figures for 1984 and 1985 before us in this Bill which are already set. We are currently running at a rate of approximately 1·2 per cent. VAT own resources contributions within the Community. We were about 1·1 per cent. in 1984 and already the draft budget for 1986 is 1·3 per cent. or 1·35 per cent. The figure for 1985 of 1·2 per cent. equivalent reflects the price-fixing largely in 1984, and the draft budget decision for 1986 reflects not only the accession of Spain and Portugal but also to some extent the price fixing which has already largely occurred.

I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that, instead of attacking this Bill, which should be addressed on its merits, it would be more constructive to address the draft budget for 1986 and, more important, the draft budget for 1987. There I can agree with him that a ceiling of 1·4 per cent. must be maintained and economies must be achieved, particularly in the discretionary spending of the Community. To criticise the intergovernmental payment for 1985 is to miss the point, because that was already predetermined by decisions in 1984. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) indicates part of the reasons for the 1985 IGA and I will come to that in just a moment.

My second point—here I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell)—is that we have to look at the deal as a package. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) expresses some disagreement with what I am saying; it will be interesting to hear what she has to say in a minute. The plain fact is that the net contribution of this country from 1982-83 as a result of this Bill will remain broadly speaking the same. Speaking for the farmers in my constituency, as well as the industrialists and consumers, I say that that is a good deal. That is a contribution in absolute terms that it is well worth this country paying, not only for participating in the common agricultural policy but also to enable the business men in my constituency to participate in the tariff-free European Economic Community.

Mr. Marlow: The gross contribution is also important, and that has gone up by 50 per cent. That is public expenditure. It may be that some of that public expenditure is within the United Kingdom, but if we are concerned to control public expenditure, gross European expenditure is also very important.

Mr. Freeman: I disagree with my hon. Friend. I am concerned about the net expenditure that affects public spending. When we talk about the 1985 IGA payment, I think that my hon. Friend is right. I know that he argues that we must look at that net of only the abatement that will operate in 1986 for that IGA payment and not necessarily net of the receipts to the agricultural community. That is right, but I look at the net contribution that appears in our public accounts and affects the PSBR, and that net contribution has not increased since 1982-83 and will not increase.

My third point is that I have heard no evidence, even from my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth)—who has left the Chamber, unfortunately, but will no doubt be returning shortly—to suggest that budgetary discipline is not working. The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) may shrug his shoulders, but no evidence has been added to the debate tonight to suggest that budgetary discipline is not working. The cereal year begins on 1 August and the Commission has not yet finished wrapping up its proposals to ensure that CAP expenditure rises in line with the restraints agreed at Fontainebleau. We are somewhat begging the question if we suggest that somehow agricultural expenditure is going to run away in the next year. I am not persuaded of that argument on the evidence presented.

I refer hon. Members to the Select Committee evidence, when my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, in answer to a question on page 12 of the Minutes of Evidence, made it quite clear that there is no evidence yet to suggest that, simply because the regime for cereals and oilseed rape has not yet been firmly fixed, total agricultural spending will overstep the guidelines.

In conclusion, I should like to address a question to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary concerning the carry-over not only of the revenue shortfall but also of agricultural spending. As far as the revenue shortfall is concerned—my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East raised a question earlier which I shall now address —there was a revenue shortfall in 1984 of 400 million ecu, which has been carried into this year. The intergovernmental agreement for 1985 makes no provision for recovering that shortfall. It will be offset against a revenue surplus which might be 250 million ecu or 300 million ecu. It is right not to include in the intergovernmental agreement for 1985 any cover for that revenue shortfall, because it is a discipline against further expenditure within the Community this year.

Mr. Teddy Taylor indicated dissent.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East shakes his head. I shall be happy to give way to him if he wants to pursue that argument.

It is important to ensure that agricultural expenditure is not deferred. Cash limits to expenditure must come shortly so that sums agreed to be spent in one year are not squeezed into the next year to fulfil obligations incurred in a full calendar year. I should appreciate the Economic Secretary's comments on that, because if budgetary discipline is to mean anything, it must mean that obligations incurred are properly accounted for in the course of the year.

9.6 pm

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) is a doubtful ally of the Government Front Bench, because his case seems to be that we have already overspent the 1·4 per cent. and so we should be worrying about the future and the next tranche. The Front Bench has tried to establish that 1·4 per cent. will hold good for some years. If he thinks that the solution lies in cash limits, it is strange to propose taking away the only effective cash limit which imposes some form of discipline on the CAP.

Several hon. Members referred to the Commission analysis, which states that in 1986 the VAT figure will be 1·35 per cent., leaving a gap of only a few hundred million ecu before the 1·4 per cent. is reached. Is that figure accepted by the Treasury? If it is, how does the Economic Secretary justify the 1·6 per cent. VAT figure in the treaty documents? Is that not a give-away for the next stage of the operation?

What will the new arrangements do to the net contribution by Britain in relation to other countries? The Foreign Secretary said that it was likely that in a few years' time France would become a net contributor. Other suggestions are that France will be a significant net contributor almost immediately. One of the many promises made by the Government Front Bench in recent years has been that the injustice whereby we are the second largest contributor would be put right in the negotiations. Even allowing for certain elements of speculation, we are entitled to know what forecasts the Treasury and the Foreign Office can make about who will and who will not be the largest contributors in the league table of net contributors to the European Community.

Many promises have been made by leading Ministers. We were led to expect much more than is being delivered by the Government tonight. The Government have themselves to blame for any disappointment. Our expectations were raised. We were promised fundamental reform of the CAP.

Some hon. Members who have spoken today do not believe in the need for that fundamental reform. They might argue that there should be some marginal improvement, but they are in a minority. The Opposition, the majority on the Government Benches and certainly the Government have argued for a long time for fundamental changes in the CAP.

Let me make my position clear. Arguments about idealism, reform and anti-Marketeering have been thrown about. I am one of those who resisted entry into the Community, but, ever since the clear mandate in the referendum, I have argued for reform of the Community. That is what we are after. We are in the Community and will stay in it, but if we are staying in, we are entitled to fight for reform in the interests of Britain and of Europe. The Government, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary built up our expectations that the 1 per cent.

ceiling would be used as a technique to secure fundamental and durable change. They have failed to deliver what they promised us.

If we remove the discipline of the 1 per cent. and have a considerably higher figure in two or three years' time, where is the discipline? The Government have thrown away an opportunity for reform. That will be regretted by the people of Britain and Europe. It is a tragedy that many of the follies of the CAP will continue. My constituents and others will continue to witness hillsides and estuarial lands being ploughed in pursuit of a foolish cereal policy, or taxpayers being called upon to compensate farmers for not following that policy. We shall have a continuation of nonsensical cheap exports to Russia, and we shall continue to pour out money on the destruction of oranges or lemons rather than on the things that right hon. and hon. Members want the Community to be doing. This is a missed opportunity, and I shall vote against the Bill.

9.11 pm

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): My right hon. and hon. Friends will know that I have always been a supporter of the Common Market. Nevertheless, I have been critical of the inadequacy of the safeguards to control expenditure from the outset. Not enough was written into the original constitution on that subject. History has proved my criticism to be right.

I differ from several of my right hon. and hon. Friends who support the Common Market and who believe that they can show their sympathy with the cause of co-operation in Europe by throwing ever more money at the Brussels bureaucracy, as if it were some sort of virility symbol. Co-operation in Europe is not achieved merely by throwing still more money in that direction.

I accept that the United Kingdom has got a good deal in this transaction because we have an inbuilt refund mechanism. That does not satisfy me, however, because the increase in own resources from 1 to 1·4 per cent. is pretty substantial on any analysis. This was the moment when the Government should have ensured that there were sufficient safeguards to control expenditure. The opportunity will not recur.

The Common Market more than once has demonstrated its inability to control expenditure. It was literally running out of money in the autumn of 1983. The House should imagine what would happen if the Treasury ran our affairs on that basis. We should imagine what would happen if, one autumn, we could not pay pensions, unemployment benefit or the National Health Service. What a way to run a railway! What a way to run a Government or a European institution!

Something must be done. The problem is that the European Assembly—or Parliament as it likes to call itself—is a spending body. It is a pressure group that constantly requires more resources. Its virility symbol is its ever increasing expenditure. It constantly puts pressure on member Governments for more money, but it does not control expenditure.

The 1 per cent. income on VAT under the present constitution is index-linked twice. It is index-linked because, as expenditure rises in line with inflation in each country year by year, so the 1 per cent. yield rises. On top of that, there is the increased GNP of each member state, and as output and wealth rises in each country, so GNP expands. The 1 per cent. increase in VAT resources is also written into that. At present the EC is protected with an ever increasing income, without having to come back and ask for an increase from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent.

Substantial savings could be made in the Community by not duplicating expenditure. An argument in favour of the CAP is that that policy is administered from Brussels and not duplicated in each nation state, unlike expenditure on roads, by-passes and the many new constructions that one sees when one drives about the country, which are advertised as being assisted by, for example, a 10 per cent. grant from the Common Market funds. Assisted, be blowed. It is our money that is being expended on those projects. That money has been laundered not by one bureaucracy in Westminster, but by a second in Brussels. Overseas aid is another example of that. It is not necessary in developments of that nature, although the projects are worthy.

Why do we employ a Civil Service in this country to oversee a 90 per cent. expenditure and another Civil Service in Brussels to oversee Community expenditure? The same applies to overseas aid, which is duplicated by national Governments and in Brussels. It is time for the Government to devote more thought to that expenditure and, therefore, I oppose the measure. In my view, the Government should have ensured that greater powers and ability to control expenditure were written into the EC constitution before they conceded the principle of an increase from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. in own resources.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As I have only a few minutes, it will not be possible to comment on the remarkable speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). However, I should at least correct the record. My right hon. Friend said that the staff of the Commission was smaller than that of the Scottish Office and that he had checked the figures yesterday. There has not been a remarkable change over the past 24 hours, and the Commission staff today number 12,747, whereas the Scottish Office staff, including the staff at all Scottish prisons and the mental health hospital at Carstairs, number fewer than 10,000.

It would be tragic to pass the Bill. It provides for a massive increase in the public expenditure of the Common Market, which is spending more than half its income on the dumping, destruction and disposal of food surpluses. Conservative Members in particular, who are supporting spending cuts and the cutting out of waste, should realise that if they vote for the Bill they are voting for a massive increase in the expenditure of an organisation which spends more than half its cash on food dumping, with east Europe being the main beneficiary. How can we justify that if we believe in controlling public expenditure?

It might be worth doing that if we were receiving something in return. The tragedy is that we are committing ourselves to a consistently high contribution to the EC, which, according to the Treasury, in 1987 will be £973 million net. That is about £1 billion net a year compared with about £400 million on average during the past 12 years. We will not control agricultural spending. The Government have said that there are guidelines, but they know that the guideline agreement says that the figures can be exceeded if the majority of European states agree that the year has been exceptional or if there have been aberrant circumstances. Prices will certainly not control the spending of the CAP. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is aware that it is not prices, but dumping costs, that cause the expenditure, and nothing in the package will restrain the increase in agricultural spending.

This will not be a good Bill for the British taxpayer, because it seems that we are committed for all time to a net expenditure of about £1 billion. It is not a good Bill for the British farmer, because, when the crunch eventually comes the effects on British agriculture will be disastrous. It is an appalling Bill for the Third world, because the people who are suffering most from the EEC's scandalous dumping policies are those in the Third world, who, because of Common Market policies, are denied a reasonable return for their produce. When we see countries getting £80 or £90 a tonne for their sugar, which is a low price established because of Common Market dumping, we should be ashamed of ourselves.

The one group of people who will be happy with the measure are those in eastern Europe, who will continue to get a massive amount of dumped food at knock-down prices, such as top quality beef at 35p a pound and wine at 4·5p a litre. It seems crazy that we are voting more spending to increase surpluses and subsidise eastern Europe.

People such as myself who originally opposed our membership of the EEC, and those who supported it, all accept that we are in the EEC, and there is no lawful way of withdrawing. For the past 12 years we have been told that the only chance of reforming the EEC would come when the money ran out. Now the money has run out. The Government said that there were two specific things on which they would not accept an increase unless they had been achieved. One was budgetary limits, which were legally binding. We do not have them. The second was a reform of the CAP. We do not have that.

As an hon. Member who supports the Government's policy of restraining public spending and cutting out waste, I believe that it is utterly shameful that we are voting for a Bill to provide for huge additional spending by the EEC when it is wasting more than half the money on food dumping. We should say to the EEC, "You save some money and cut out waste." In those circumstances, it would be a better deal for Britain, and, more important, a better deal for the Common Market as a whole.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): From press, television and radio reports over the past few days, it is clear that the Government have been carrying out a strong propaganda exercise to try to convince the people of Britain that the deal obtained at Fontainebleau last year is a good deal for Britain. There are many examples, including the Economic Secretary to the Treasury's article in The Times this morning, in which he presented the Bill as a change in the rules for good. Yet it is clear from the debate that most hon. Members have not been deceived by that propaganda exercise. Some hon. Members have declared themselves to be on the Government's side, in support of the Bill, such as the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram), but it is clear from the content of their remarks that they are most critical of what the Government are doing tonight. If the hon. Member for Ludlow had not said that he supported the Government, one would not have guessed it from his speech.

It is clear that in the efforts to present the European Communities (Finance) Bill as a good thing for Britain, some of its implications have been played down. It increases own resources from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. It also provides for an immediate gift from the United Kingdom to the EC of about £250 million to cover the EC's 1985 budget deficit. The Bill also provides for the £595 million rebate, which was unconditional only a year ago. Now it is conditional on the United Kingdom Parliament and all other national Parliaments agreeing to the increase in our own resources. The Economic Secretary referred to the extra £240 million that is to be paid to the EC. Even that figure instead of £252 million implies a more favourable exchange rate for 1985-86 than the explanatory memorandum in the public expenditure White Paper.

The increase in own resources from 1 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. tends to conceal the amount that we are paying into the EC. As the Select Committee on European Legislation once pointed out, 1 per cent. means an 11 per cent. contribution from our VAT take. Increasing the ceiling for own resources to 1·4 per cent. means that our contribution to the EC from our VAT take is probably nearer 14 per cent. We are therefore paying more into the Community despite the Bill and the so-called abatement mechanism that forms part of it.

The figures in the public expenditure White Paper show that, while for 1985-86 the net payments, including overseas aid, are £898 million, by 1987-88 they will rise to £973 million. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) was right, therefore, to talk about the Bill leading in future to payments of almost £1 billion a year to the Community without any firm agreement on budget discipline.

It is noteworthy that the Bill allows for extra payments to the Community, although there is no reference in it to budgetary discipline, which was supposedly agreed at Fontainebleau as being binding on each member state. Hon. Members have referred to gaps in relation to so-called budgetary discipline, and I shall return to that later. The fact that there is no reference in the Bill to budgetary discipline is a glaring omission. A provision dealing with that issue should be in the measure if it is to ensure that future spending by the EC is controlled.

As hon. Members have said, the new ceiling of 1·4 per cent. may last for only a further two years. The preamble to the decision recalls the Fontainebleau conclusion that the maximum rate may be increased to 1·6 per cent. on 1 January 1988. The ceiling of 1·4 per cent. is likely almost to be reached in the 1986 budget. Indeed, that budget suggests that the ceiling will be 1·35 per cent., only 900 million ecu below the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. Thus, the 1986 budget is already reaching the limits laid down in the agreement which the Prime Minister described as a triumph following her return from Fontainebleau.

Agricultural spending will account for two thirds of the 1986 budget. We do not yet know what the outturn will be, but it is likely that agricultural spending will form a greater proportion of the 1986 budget than the two thirds suggested in the draft budget provided by the Commission.

The preliminary draft budgets for 1983 and 1984 forecast that agricultural spending would account for about two thirds of the total. The outturn in each case resulted in agricultural spending taking a higher proportion, and the same is likely to happen in 1986.

The actions already taken by the Commission show how those price rises are likely to occur. The Economic Secretary, in evidence to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, and other hon. Members who support the Bill have referred to "firm" action by the Commission in laying down a 1·8 per cent. cut in cereal prices, but the original proposal was for a 5 per cent. cut. It was then knocked back to 3·6 per cent. and Agro Europe describes the present 1·8 per cent. proposal as "meaningless" because the price of cereals is already more than 20 per cent. too high. Cereal prices form an important part of the agricultural budget, so that meaningless cut gives us no confidence that agricultural spending in 1986 will be any more under control than it was in 1985 or in any previous year.

[Dr. Oonagh McDonald]

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) and the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) have shown that the so-called budgetary discipline is utterly ineffective. It allows member countries to plead for price rises in exceptional circumstances, including changes in exchange rates affecting world food prices. Moreover, the budgetary discipline proposals put forward at Fontainebleau are not legally binding on the whole Community. The Prime Minster said on her return from Fontainebleau that she wanted those proposals to be legally binding, but she did not succeed in achieving that at Fontainebleau and she has not succeeded since. Neither Select Committee of this House believed that the proposals were legally binding and the House of Lords second report describes them as merely "a legal enigma". Budgetary discipline cannot be enforced. It is not included in the Bill and the Government have cheerfully ignored it in presenting legislation which allows increased spending in the Community. They have merely talked about the possibility of obtaining discipline over agricultural and other spending. They have abandoned any attempt to control the common agricultural policy which alone would ensure that spending on agriculture could be brought under control.

The Government have entirely abandoned all those objectives and have instead tried to present a con job, suggesting that the Bill is good for Britain and will ensure an abatement for us in the future and an end to the squabbling about farm prices and about spending in the Community as a whole. Not only have the Government failed to achieve that purpose. They do not even agree that it is a purpose. The Economic Secretary spoke in those terms in The Times. The Foreign Secretary, however, expects to be engaged in budgetary wrangles within the Government and in Brussels this year, next year and in years to come because he is perhaps more realistic about the Government's failure in Brussels, Fontainebleau and Stuttgart, even though he is not prepared to spell that out to the House of Commons. Both this year and in the future, agricultural spending will continue to rise as a proportion of the budget.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Bearing in mind the case that the hon. Lady is making, in the terrible eventuality that at some distant time there is another Labour Government, what would she do in negotiations that is different from what this Government are now doing? What would she do that this Government are not doing?

Dr. McDonald: The hon. Gentleman's criticism of the Government's policy towards Europe is well known. The more important question that he should face is what he will do in tonight's vote. The hon. Gentleman has frequently opened his mouth on the European Community and farm spending. Let us now see whether he has the courage to put his money where his mouth is. We want to know whether he will respond to the requests of many of his hon. Friends, who would very much like to see him voting in the Lobby against the Bill. We want to see whether the hon. Gentleman's position is entirely consistent. Let us see whether he can summon up the courage to vote against the Bill, given what he has said in the past.

On this and many previous occasions, the Opposition have simply said that the Government threw away a golden opportunity when the Community was running out of money and pressure could have been exerted to ensure that agricultural spending was brought under control through a reform of the CAP. That would have overcome the obscenities about which the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) spoke — [HON. MEMBERS: "Obscenities?"] Yes, the obscenities of food mountains, of food going to waste in storage that is desperately needed in the Third world, and of food which the Community cannot even deliver to Ethiopia in time. Those are the obscenities of the CAP, yet when given the opportunity presented to them, the Government let it slip by.

They have given the game away by agreeing to pay more into the European Community. In 1988 at the latest, but probably much earlier, they will have to agree to raising the ceiling to 1·6 per cent. To find the money for such contributions they will perhaps agree to the proposal to be considered in Milan to widen the VAT base as part of VAT harmonisation. In order to achieve that, they may have to tax food, transport, or heating, in order to find the necessary resources, not only to pay more into the EEC but also to fritter away on tax cuts. The Government failed to take that opportunity, and instead agreed to pay more. They accepted budgetary discipline proposals which they know to be ineffective, and which have not been included in the Bill.

At the same time, the Community has 14·5 million people unemployed, 38 per cent. of them aged under 25. This year and next year, the regional and social funds will each represent only 5 per cent. of total spending. The Bill does nothing to deal with unemployment, which is the crucial problem in the Community. Instead, the Government have meekly given in to pressure from the farming members of the Community to give them the money that they want, and now they are trying to whitewash it in their presentation of the Bill. They also tried to whitewash it in the press briefings that they gave about the Bill, and too many members of the press swallowed the story that the Bill would be good for Britain. It will be a disaster for Britain. The EC will continue to waste money on unnecessary agricultural spending.

The House should reject the Bill, and I call on those Conservative Members who have been so critical of the Bill inside and outside the Chamber to have the courage to vote against it tonight.

9.41 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): The idea that the Government should take lessons in budgetary discipline from the Labour party is so absurd that it does not deserve comment. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary raised several of the wider issues of our membership of the EC, and those themes were repeated in the debate by my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and by many hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Time does not permit me to consider all the contents of the Bill this evening, so I shall concentrate on its European budget aspects. I should explain that part of the Fontainebleau agreement—this is the anniversary of the meeting at Fontainebleau when those decisions were taken—has been brought forward in several specific measures designed to carry out what was agreed by the leaders of the Community countries. The own resources decision provides for the increase in VAT to 1·4 per cent. and for the United Kingdom abatement. The Bill also contains the inter-governmental agreement which provided for transitional finance for 1985. At last, we have a budget for 1985, although it was rejected in the latter part of last year, and towards the end of this year the House will be asked to decide upon the accession of Spain and Portugal. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), who asked about this matter earlier, I should say that the provision for the increased contribution under the own resources decision is contingent on the ratification of the accession treaty.

The debate has, not surprisingly, concentrated on previous agricultural and other expenditure by the Community. Most hon. Members who are against the Bill have said that, because in the past the Community has spent too much money on agriculture, we should not vote for a Bill which is part of a package that includes measures to contain future expenditure. That is an absurd proposition. Of course, it is highly unsatisfactory that surpluses have grown in recent years and that they now cost so much to store and to dispose of. That excess production has imposed a great burden upon the European Community's budget. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire said, this is now a declining problem.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Stewart: Three years ago, the increase in agricultural expenditure was 27 per cent., two years ago it was 16 per cent., last year it was 9 per cent. and next year it will be less than 3 per cent.

Mr. Marlow: Is my hon. Friend saying that agricultural surpluses will decline? Will there be fewer surpluses next year compared with this year and fewer surpluses the year after that? If so, how does he know?

Mr. Stewart: If my hon. Friend will allow me to continue with my speech, I shall talk about the future for agricultural expenditure.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) referred to the contribution to the European budget this year of £240 million as if that were money thrown down the drain. She forgets that part of that money will come back to this country in agricultural and other payments and that the balance will be subject to the Fontainebleau mechanism, so we shall probably pay only about £40 million. This is a measure of the importance of the abatement mechanism.

Many hon. Members have concentrated upon the guideline. The matters that are agreed between the Council members—they are in the form of conclusions which are binding on the Council — relate to agricultural expenditure and to non-obligatory other expenditure. The reference framework covers both. The guideline has not yet been brought forward merely because the whole budgetary process this year is late because last year the European Parliament threw out the 1985 budget. The budgetary discipline with respect to the agricultural guideline is fully endorsed by the European Commission. It has said that it will not permit the agricultural proposals to exceed the guideline as already established. For 1986 that is 20·6 billion ecu, which is an increase of only 3·5 per cent. over the current year's budget—a decline in real terms. The Commission's proposals are within that guideline; they are only 2·5 per cent. Last year, we had a zero price increase in the agricultural price fixing. This year, we are having a similar zero price increase. That meant a reduction in real terms last year of about 3·5 per cent. We expect a further reduction this year of the same order. That is a great change of direction for the Community and represents a significant impact on the budgetary discipline arrangements on the very first occasion on which the Community has been called upon to comply with them.

Mr. Forth: Why does the 1986 preliminary draft budget already represent a 1·35 per cent. VAT rate? How can my hon. Friend explain that in the context of what he is claiming for budgetary discipline?

Mr. Stewart: I shall explain the VAT rate in a moment. I said that the percentage increase proposed in the 1986 budget is only 2·5 per cent. — the lowest increase for a very long time. It represents a tight and tough target for the Community. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I shall come to the question of the 1·4 per cent. and 1·35 per cent. rates. Let me finish on the point about budgetary discipline.

Some hon. Members have said that this was a missed opportunity. They are complaining not about the fact that we do not have budgetary discipline but about the fact that we have not had budgetary discipline in the past. The problems with the budgets during the past year or two have been caused by the lack of budgetary discipline in the past. As part of the agreement at Fontainebleau, we have come to an agreement with other member states that budgetary discipline will be rigorously applied.

Mr. Teddy Taylor rose——

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friends have drawn attention to exceptional circumstances and other technical provisions in the text, but how on earth can there be an absolutely rigid guideline for agriculture when one cannot even predict the weather at the beginning of the year? Of course we cannot. Any hon. Members who pretend otherwise are merely demonstrating how unrealistic is their approach to the Community budget.

The fact that the guideline is not rigid does not mean that it is not fast and tight. [Interruption.] The budgetary disciplinary measures are proving effective. I was asked whether France would be a net contributer. [Interruption.] France will be a net contributor in the coming year. That may be why French Ministers have shown themselves so much more interested and tougher in their approach to expenditure in the European Community.

The West Germans are in a contradictory position. They voted to support budget discipline and for guaranteed thresholds. They now find it difficult to accept the cereal price proposals.

[Mr. Stewart]

The long and difficult negotiations that have taken place in the Agriculture Council over the past four months are not a demonstration that budget discipline is not working. They are a demonstration that budget discipline is exercising a tight constraint on the decisions of Ministers of Agriculture.

If the budget discipline were not in place, I have no doubt that, as in previous years, if one country such as West Germany said that it was essential that it should put forward extra expenditure on cereals that would have been accommodated. That would probably have been the case in most past years. On this occasion, because budget discipline has been agreed by the Council and all member states and because the Commission is sticking by that, the Commission will not accept measures that will increase the budgetary cost of the Community's agricultural policy. The Commission has said that it will take the necessary measures in managing the markets to avoid any recourse to a supplementary or rectifying budget in 1985. It also said that the final outturn of the agriculture budget for 1986 and in the new price-fixing year will be budget neutral as a result of the proposals that it originally put forward.

Hon. Members may not like the fact that budget discipline is biting so hard. They may complain and say that it will impose too sharp a constraint on agriculture. Some may say that, because budget discipline applies to next year and the decisions which are now being taken, we should study what happened in the past and judge the future from that. That would be out of keeping with the arrangements agreed at Fontainebleau. The purpose of that agreement was to come to a new arrangement which would provide a lasting settlement of the British budget problem and deal with the problem of future agricultural overspending. The tight guidelines which have been agreed will ensure that that occurs.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the strict budgetary guidelines which he has explained can be exceeded if the weather is unexpected and can be ignored by any amount, in any year, if the majority of member states decides that there have been exceptional or aberrant circumstances during that year? How can the guideline be strict?

Mr. Stewart: For good reasons. In the case of enlargement, comparable discipline must be applied to the new member states on accession. The Council of Ministers must be entitled to make its own decisions in the light of circumstances, but price fixing and the arrangements for clawback have been implemented to the letter by the Council and the Commission. That is the greatest assurance that the reforms for which we have worked for so long are now being put into practice.

I come to the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling. In 1983 and 1984, Community expenditure exceeded the 1 per cent. VAT rate. If the proposals put forward for the 1986 budget were accepted in full—that assumption cannot be taken for granted because the Budget Council has not yet studied them and the details have not been published — the illustrative figures given by the Commission suggest that even if the Community budget went to a rate of 1·35 per cent. it would still leave the United Kingdom contribution at 0·82 per cent.

I have been asked why the United Kingdom contribution will stay below 1 per cent. That question has been at the heart of the debate. Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends complain that this would impose an extra burden upon the British taxpayer. The precise opposite is the case. Because of abatement, Britain will receive an automatic refund. It is called an abatement because we shall be able to deduct it from our contributions. Refunds will not have to be negotiated. Our contribution will remain below 1 per cent. Only in absolutely exceptional and unforeseeable circumstances would our contribution exceed 1 per cent. within the limit of 1·4 per cent.

For our receipts from the European budget to increase sufficiently, for our contribution to exceed 1 per cent., either FEOGA expenditure would have to rise in our favour from 11 per cent. of the Community budget to 14 per cent., which is far higher than it has ever been in the past and is unlikely to happen in the future, or our share of the regional and social fund, from which we receive about 25 per cent. of Community expendiure, would have to rise to about 45 per cent. That is clearly inconceivable. It is therefore a remote possibility that we should reach the 1 per cent. ceiling within the 1·4 per cent. limit.

Mr. John Townend: Some hon. Members who have reservations about the Bill might be persuaded not to oppose the Government if they were to give an undertaking that if proposals were introduced in this Parliament that own resources would be further increased by increasing VAT to 1·6 per cent. the Government would veto it.

Mr. Stewart: The 1·6 per cent. that is mentioned in the Fontainebleau text is not a commitment by anybody. This Government are not committed to increasing the ceiling. For the time being 1·4 per cent. is right, although what may happen in future years is not for me to predict. However, the unanimous agreement of all member states would be required and it would have to be approved by the Parliaments of all member states. Therefore, the possibility that that could happen without the full agreement of the Government of the day and of Parliament does not arise.

It has been suggested that we should be better off if the 1 per cent. ceiling were to be left in place. Nothing could be further from the truth. In domestic terms, our contribution would be about double what we shall be paying under the Fontainebleau abatement. If we kept our contributions at the 1 per cent. ceiling without abatement — and surely we should never get any abatement — [Interruption.] How could we negotiate an abatement or a refund if we were unwilling to ratify the agreement to which we have contributed so much? Our contribution would then be about £1·5 billion, which in today's values is what it was under the Labour Government. Are my hon. Friends asking the Government to return to the position in 1978 and 1979 when our net contribution, in today's prices, was about £1·5 billion? I cannot believe that they are.

We have not abandoned our bargaining power. We have used it to obtain a satisfactory and lasting settlement. It would be ridiculous to punish the European Community for its past excesses by voting against the Bill just at the time when the Community has accepted reforms that we have worked so hard to achieve. On that basis, I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the Bill.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the consideration of Lords Amendments to the Representation of the People Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

European Communities (Finance) Bill [Money]

Queen's recommendation having been signified.
Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Communities (Finance) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums to be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund, or payable out of money provided by Parliament, under the European Communities Act 1972; and

(2) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.15 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): In such moments of tension, a large gathering often finds it useful to sing a song. If it were within my power to suggest a song to the House, it would be the song which I believe was fashionable in your generation, Mr. Speaker, during the war—"We'll meet again". There is no doubt that, after the decision of the House tonight, we shall meet again, and pretty soon. One thing is obvious—we have collectively thrown away the one serious obstacle that we had to overspending in the EC. It is obvious that the proposals for the 1986 budget are already taking a serious chance.

There has been no answer from the Government on whether the proposed budget is contemplating expenditure at the level of 1.35 per cent. There has been no answer from the Government about their assumptions about the level of the dollar. There has been no answer from the Government about whether they will com back again for another cut of public expenditure.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to give the hon. Member a fair hearing.

Mr. Budgen: I ask no special favour. We shall be back, and the Treasury will tell us once again that it has control of this expenditure. We shall have yet another reiteration of lame promises.

I hope that some of my hon. Friends who were among the 131 hon. Members who signed an early-day motion last year, all of whom said that there was no place for an increase in expenditure on own resources, have a happy time this week explaining their change of stance to their constituents. I hope that they have a very happy time when we come back again in about one year—perhaps just before the next general election—and the Government present another lot of lame excuses and false promises about their having got control of expenditure in the EC.

In the words of Vera Lynn, "We'll meet again".

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As I understand my history, this once fine and robust institution was established to control the people's money and to ensure that grasping potentates did not put their hands in people's pockets and spend their money without control. The prime duty of the House is to control expenditure and to ensure that the money is properly guarded and prudently spent.

When we joined the Eurpean Economic Community we agreed to certain terms and conditions, which set out the amount of money that we would be able to make available to the Community and in what circumstances, the 1 per cent. VAT limit, levies and customs duties. We have signified today that we are prepared to allow a foreign institution of which we are a member—other people and other countries—to control the money of the British people to a greater extent. Not ony that, but the way in which we have made the agreement today will show other member states that in future they have but to ask and it shall be yielded up unto them.

Not only in the past has the 1 per cent. ceiling been overcome by reimbursable loans, non-reimbursable advances and intergovernmental agreements, but today we are agreeing to increase the ceiling to 1·4 per cent. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury was asked to give the House the guarantees that if during the life of this Parliament, our European partners asked us to increase the VAT limit to 1·6 per cent. he would veto it, but he was silent. That silence speaks words and, indeed, volumes. It tells those in the EC that if they want more British taxpayers' money, they can have it.

Today we have been concerned about the control of Community expenditure, especially the CAP. We have discovered from the speech of my hon. Friend that it is impossible to control agricultural expenditure.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is traditional for the speeches of the chief Government and Opposition spokesmen to be drowned in hubbub, because they are only doing a job and their speeches are usually boring, but, when a Back-Bench Member tries to make some serious points, he should be heard. Some hon. Members are preventing us from hearing what my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is saying. I am sure that we would all be grateful if you could ensure that those hon. Members who are interrupting our proceedings are quiet or leave the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every hon. Member should be heard in the House, and there is a good deal of discussion going on. I think that the hon. Gentleman is coming to the end of his speech.

Mr. Marlow: You may be right, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know. I may run out of steam in about 30 seconds, but I may talk for some time. I am sure that many hon. Members present do not want to hear what I have to say, and I would not be the slightest bit insulted if they left the Chamber now.

I take this matter seriously, as I am sure my hon. Friends do. On behalf of the people whom we represent, we want to, and must, control Community expenditure, especially on the CAP. If we kept the 1 per cent. on VAT, the CAP would have to be controlled, because there would be no money to pay for increases. This year's budget is about 85 per cent. above the budget of four years ago. All hon. Members know that budgets are always overrun, and that we must make loans and intergovernmental agreements and bail out the Community. The probability is that this year we shall spend twice as much on the EC and the CAP as we did four years ago.

My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary bravely said, "Do not worry. It is all right. We have a financial mechanism. We have the matter under control. Spending cannot run away in future." However, there is a regular annual increase in production of European agriculture of about 2 per cent., whereas the increase in consumption of European agricultural products within the EC is zero. Therefore, each year our surpluses will increase, and surpluses will be piled on surpluses. Obviously, if there is a disaster in the Third world, a famine and starvation, only a small part of the surplus is needed and can be moved in that direction. We would all support that, if it can be arranged. However, much of our surplus goes to the Eastern bloc, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) so eloquently said.

You and I know, Mr. Speaker, and I believe that the House knows, that the time will come when the Soviet Union and its allies in the Warsaw pact sort out their agricultural problems. They will become self-sufficient. So the Eastern bloc will be self-sufficient. China is becoming increasingly self-sufficient. India is becoming self-sufficient. Where shall we offload the growing surpluses that we shall have in the European Community? Instead of a deficit there will be a surplus, and a growing surplus, on the world market. The price that we get for our supluses, which will be even greater than in the past, will be even less than in the past. Therefore, if one multiplies the volume, which is increased, by the price difference, which is greater, one sees that the costs of the common agricultural policy will not be under control. They will increase. They will get further out of control.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Up to now, my hon. Friend has discussed only the surplus problem in the existing Community. Does he share my concern that, should the enlargement of the Community go ahead to include Spain and Portugal, which the House will be asked to approve some time later this year, the surplus problems which he has identified will be made much worse, if only because those countries are looking to the Community to invest in them to increase their productivity and production, and there will be greater surpluses in a new range of products?

Mr. Marlow: I take my hon. Friend's point. I am not against Spain and Portugal coming into the Community, but I appreciate that that will increase the burden. There is, there was, and there should be, another way, and that is to put a ceiling on EC expenditure—to put a cap on the CAP expenditure. If that happens, it may well be that there will be problems to be dealt with. It may well be that there will be increased surpluses. It may well be that those surpluses will be greater in some European countries than in others. Why do we have to maintain the same rigours of the CAP throughout each and every Community country in the same way. If in future some countries produce more surpluses, why should not the taxpayers in those countries pay directly for the increased surpluses that they are creating? Under the present circumstances, no one is directly responsible. The Agriculture Ministers all meet, and they agree, given the political imperatives in their own countries, that their own farmers have to be satisfied. They do not have to find the money. They just agree what prices they can get away with politically. Somebody else has to find the money.

If one spread the increased costs to the countries which were increasing those costs, those Agriculture Ministers, as members of their own Governments in their own countries, who have to be concerned about the taxpayers and consumers in their own countries, would sing a different tune. The buck would stop in the country where the surplus was being built up. That is a far more sensible way of dealing with the CAP. It is a way that would work and we could cut expenditure on the CAP.

People say that I am anti-European. I am not anti-European — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I thank hon. Members. I am not anti-European.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): My hon. Friend is a European whether he likes it or not.

Mr. Marlow: Indeed, I am a European whether I like it or not.

We want a large, unified market where 280 million people can trade. We want to cut down on non-tariff barriers, which we have done. But we do not need a colossal bureaucracy in Brussels across the Channel with a colossal budget to spend on European policies. If one is to allow insurance to cross frontiers in the European Community, if one is to allow goods to cross frontiers, if one is to allow companies to come together and have joint investment programmes, and if one is to increase the size of the market, why does one need money for that? We have dispensed with theproblem of the CAP. We should nationalise all or parts of it. That will save us some money. We do not need to vote for the money resolution on that basis.

Why else does the Community need money? Does the Community need money for social or regional policies? As my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Cockeram) said, do we need to send our cash across to Brussels so that the people there can launder it and send it back to us? They put great signs up outside towns and on roads saying that it is Community largesse, that people should be grateful for it, that the Community works, and that it is Community money. It is our money that we send there. They take some of it for administration and bureaucracy, dilute it in other ways, and return it to us. It would be more sensible for us to make our own decisions with our own money.

The Government have advanced their case tonight on the basis that if we did not agree to the change in the VAT limits, we would not have had the system of rebates that will exist in future. The Government have claimed many times that it is a good deal because we shall be spending less money. That may be so, but under this deal our annual net contribution to the Community will be greater than it has been, and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and others have said that within two or three years our net contribution will be about £1 billion a year.

What special benefit will we in the United Kingdom get that is not available to other Community countries? Why should we pay this extra money? Hon. Members have talked about a membership club, golf club and Christmas club fee and so on. Why is our fee so much greater than any other country's? There is no justice in that. Not only are we concerned to prevent others putting their hands in the pockets of our people and taking their money. We are concerned to see that our people get justice, and this £1 billion that we shall be spending is unjust expenditure.

The Minister said that this was the best we could get away with. I do not even believe that. We have massively underestimated our bargaining power. Consider the strength that we bring to Europe. We have oil in the North sea. There is almost a glut of energy at present, but circumstances can change rapidly. We have coal and oil, and the fact that we are energy-rich is a great strength to the other nations of Europe.

We have a massive deficit—of about £7 billion—in trade in manufactured goods with the rest of the European Community. That represents hundreds of thousands of jobs. If we drove a hard bargain with the Community and said, "Why should we spend £1 billion a year for something that you are getting for nothing?" would we be told, "Get out of the Common Market. We do not want you any longer."?

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering whether the ten-minutes rule has applied to speeches tonight. At any rate, it seems that the duration of speeches has been about ten minutes. Should it not apply now?

Mr. Speaker: Most certainly not.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me time, by raising that point of order, to get my second wind.

In view of our massive deficit in trade with the rest of the Community, what would happen if we insisted on a membership fee of, say, £300 million a year? That is a lot of money. Why we should pay £300 million when the French are paying nothing I am not sure. However, if, in negotiations, we insisted on that figure, would we be told to get out of the Common Market. Would the other countries say, "We will do without your market, your energy, your £300 million a year and your political expertise"? Not on your nelly, Mr. Speaker. They want us in.

The Government's mistake has been severely to underestimate our bargaining power. Having done that, and having brought the measure before the House today, the Government have told us—hooray, hooray—that, despite the 1·4 per cent. ceiling, we have actually got a really great deal because after the rebate it will cost us only 1 per cent. But why is that a good deal? Figures given to me yesterday by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary show that our average net VAT payment to the Community in the past four years amounted to 0·5 per cent. after rebate, so this great deal today will double our commitment.

Ministers have said that our net contribution will be under control—we know that it will be about £600 million and then about £1,000 million and so on up. They tell us that the extra £240 million membership fee will actually cost us only £40 million because the rest will eventually come back. But it is all public expenditure. The Opposition will be trying to crucify us later in the year because of our cuts in housing benefit, especially for elderly people, many of whom have voted Conservative for a long time and have got used to that extra spending money. There is a danger that that benefit will be attacked as a result of the Fowler review. That will be a small amount compared with the £240 million but it is all public expenditure.

Our gross contribution to the Community has risen by 50 per cent. in the past four years. What other Government programme has risen by that amount? Community expenditure is out of control and passing the Bill today means that we shall have no hope of controlling it in the future. In response to interventions, the Government have said that the present ceiling will be 1·4 per cent., but they have not said that they will not agree to 1·6 per cent. or that they will not agree to further loans, doles, hand-outs, reimbursable this's and take-away thats. They have not said that there will be any further control. What if it rains? If it rains there will be a bigger crop and it will cost us more money, so even the 1·4 per cent. is not sacrosanct. The 1 per cent. that we had in the past was topped up by loans, too.

The message is clear. The signal is on go. Take no account, just spend the money. Increase agricultural expenditure, increase expenditure on bureaucracy. Dream up nice little European policies and make nice federal Europeans of us all. The message from the Commission is that everyone should go off and devise strategies and policies. Then there will be great bartering and negotiating sessions. Some policies will be thrown out and some will be accepted. Then, because the British Government want some policies to be accepted, they will have to agree to others that they do not want. Last week we listened to a lot of nonsense about the temperature in the centre of a frozen pea. Our retailers and shopkeepers will have to buy expensive equipment that they do not need to meet standards that are not required because European regulations say they must.

We have lost control over our own country. We have lost our sovereignty. We have lost control over our own people's money, especially in what we have done today. If we had kept the 1 per cent. limit on own resources there would have been a chance that sanity would prevail and that sensible policy would break out. Sadly, we have sold the pass. We have given in. The message is clear and I regret it very much.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I sense that the House might not wish me to return to the broad subject that we have been discussing all evening. I therefore confine myself to answering a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) about the 1986 budget. This has not yet been published, so I cannot respond to his question.

Question put:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Communities (Finance) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums to be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund, or payable out of money provided by Parliament, under the European Communities Act 1972; and

(2) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund.

Representation of the People Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

EXTENSION OF PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 3, after "date" insert

"subject to subsection (3A) below".

10.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I beg to move, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 6, 11, 13, 15 to 18 and the amendments, in the name of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), to Lords amendments Nos. 6, 11 and 18.

Mr. Mellor: Considerable debate took place in the House and outside it to find an acceptable basis on which to make progress on the Bill. This led to the gratifying conclusion that the legislation had an unopposed Third Reading.

It is common knowledge that some Conservative Members wanted a more generous extension of the franchise to British citizens overseas than the five years contained in the Bill. It is equally clear that some Opposition Members would have preferred more modest proposals to succeed than those agreed by the House. In the proper spirit which I think should guide us when discussing issues relating to the electoral rules, a compromise was reached, and the five-year provision was agreed.

The other place proceeded to discuss the question of officials working for the European Community and concluded that European Community officials should be enfranchised as if they were diplomats and serving soldiers who, by long tradition, have had the right to vote while serving overseas. There are problems with that proposition. I can identify two of them. The first has been perceptively observed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who has noted that, if the decision is taken to extend the franchise to officials of the European Community, there is no logic in not extending it to the officials of NATO, the Council of Europe or the Western European Union. There is an irresistible logic in that proposal, as is the case occasionally with proposals advanced by the hon. Gentleman.

Secondly, there is the question whether it is appropriate for the House to make further distinctions between officials and people working overseas privately. We honour what has been dignified by a historical position in our electoral arrangements — the privilege of voting accorded to members of the armed servies and of the diplomatic corps. I should be hard put to it to say that someone who works for the European Community and undoubtedly does valuable service, as do about 1,500 of our fellow citizens, is necessarily any more worthy of being permitted to vote in a British election than someone who represents in Brussels the interests of ICI, ICL or any of our other great companies.

In logic, it is impossible to defend the Lords amendment. If we are prepared to drive that wedge into the five-year proposal, we should accept the hon. Gentleman's proposition. While I hope that, in the not-too-distant future, the House will return to this subject and determine that everyone who works overseas for a period longer than five years should have the vote, that day has not dawned. I wish to honour the arrangement into which we entered earlier. I do not think that it is right to perpetuate distinctions between officials and others and on that basis I advise the House to negative the Lords amendment.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I should like to thank the Minister for what he has said. It is highly generous of the Government to come to the House and confirm the arrangement that was reached here when the Bill was going through.

It is proper for all the reasons that the Minister has given that we maintain the Bill as it was sent to the House of Lords and that we do not start being selective in terms of allocating extended franchises to one group rather than to another.

I pay tribute to the Government for the way in which they are conducting the Bill. The Opposition will be voting to delete the amendment from the Bill.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Government and the Opposition find themselves in a strange pickle tonight. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) did not refer to the fact that his noble Friends in another place voted to include the amendment in the Bill. They did so on an official Labour party vote. The amendment would not be before us tonight if they had not done so. If we studied the arithmetic, we would find that the amendment probably would not have been accepted without their support.

A noble succession of Labour peers such as Lord Cledwyn of Penrhos joined Lord Mishcon in the Division Lobby to bring that about. The right hon. Gentleman has done us a disservice by not giving the customary summary of the arguments that his noble Friends found so persuasive in another place. Lord Mishcon said that he would put those people who worked for the European Community in the same line as members of the armed forces an the diplomatic corps. He said that he had met many of the people involved and thought that they were definitely representing British interests abroad. He said that while many of his noble Friends were in favour of continuing membership of the Community many were not. None the less, he thought it right officially to commit the Labour party to supporting the extension of the franchise to British citizens who were servants of the European Community.

I do not know what subsequently passed between Lord Mishcon and the right hon. Member for Gorton. Now that we are contemplating the televising of Parliament, provision should perhaps be made for the televising of such discussions as took place subsequently between Lord Mishcon and the right hon. Member for Gorton. It ought to be brought to our screens so that we could hear the full flow of invective from the right hon. Member for Gorton and the full range of adjectives that he deployed when the news was brought to him.

But the right hon. Member is not the only one to have reneged upon his commitments. The amendment that the Government are asking the House to overturn was not the amendment that was originally moved by Lady Elles when she proposed that British citizens working for the European Community should have the right to vote. That amendment was passed by another place, but the Government said that the amendment, although not defective, could be improved upon. They later brought before another place a Government amendment setting out in what they thought were better terms the basis upon which British citizens working for the European Community should be given the right to vote. That amendment was carried without a Division. It is the Government's own choice of words they are now asking the House to overturn in the forthcoming Division.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the vote should be extended, regardless of whether the person living abroad has a secure family background?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman's intervention is completely irrelevant. I do not speak, as did his right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, as if those to whom we say the franchise should be extended are a wholy army of tax dodgers, criminals and fugitives from justice.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: No. I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I reject the notion put about by the Labour party that British citizens living abroad are in some sense disloyal to this country because they want to vote in British elections while they are serving British interests abroad. To suggest that those who are working for the European Community, the Council of Europe or the Western European Union are disloyal to this country because of their residence abroad and have forfeited their right to take part in elections in this country is the sort of monstrous absurdity which only the modern Labour party could promote.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that somebody who works for Imperial Chemical Industries or any other commercial organisation is disloyal to this country? He has left them out of his amendment.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman tempts me to repeat the speeches that I made in earlier debates. I argued that the franchise should be extended to precisely those people. Who are denying the franchise to them? It is being denied to them by the hon. Gentleman's Government and the Ministers on his Front Bench. They are unwilling to extend the franchise because of the agreement that they have reached with the Labour party.

I understand why the Under-Secretary of State feels that he is bound by the agreement that has been entered into with the Labour party, but how could that agreement have remained in force once the Labour party gave such a clear signal to the Government as it gave by its vote in another place? The shackles and bonds were broken. Consensus politics were working. Members of every party in another place agreed that there should be a modest extension of the franchise, which the Under-Secretary of State claims he favours, to British citizens serving British interests abroad. However, the Government have reneged on the amendment that they moved in another place on Third Reading and have failed to seize the opportunity that was presented to them, based on consensus, to have a modest extension overseas of the franchise.

However, the Minister raised the fair question whether it was reasonable to make a partial extension. Of course, we could raise the same question about the decision for the five-year limit which is so restrictive that it will give few opportunities to British citizens living overseas.

I have stated the case and tabled an amendment. I stand by my case that there is a good reason to extend the franchise to those serving British interests in their work for the WEU, the Council of Europe or NATO. I tabled the amendment in that form knowing that, at this stage in the proceedings, there was no chance of getting back to what I originally argued for — and for which I would have been grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate)—which is that there should be much wider provisions for British citizens overseas to vote. It places a very low value on British citizenship if we do not assume that it confers voting rights. I wish to place a high value on British citizenship.

There is one distinction in logic that we can make between the European Community and the other institutions that I have mentioned—one which the hon. Member for Faversham would certainly make. It is that the European Community has law-making powers in this country which are not possessed by any of the other bodies. That places it in what I am sure he and others who occupied the time of the House tonight would argue as a rather different category. However, put at its lowest, half a loaf is better than no bread. I am sufficiently committed to an extension of the franchise to British citizens working overseas to believe that the step forward taken by another place in making that extension to those working in the European Community was important enough to justify this House retaining it. That makes me both a little surprised and not a little annoyed that the Government should seek to overturn a very sensible amendment.

I am fascinated by the gyrations of the Labour party, which one day of the week argues that this amendment should be passed and votes for it through its representatives in another place, but in this House take the opposite view. Things have reached a strange state, but we shall be consistent and vote against the Government.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): The speech of the hon. -Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), which I assume was the official response of the Liberal party, was both bizarre and unacceptable. It was unacceptable for two reasons. First, the Liberal party is now committing itself to the bizarre view that an important distinction should be made between officials on the one part and wealth creators on the other. The Liberal party is clearly disclosing itself as the party of the bureaucrat. I have never doubted that, but I am awfully glad that the Chief Whip of the Liberal party has come to this place to make that clear.

The other reason why what the hon. Gentleman said is unacceptable is that the Liberal party and its funny little friends in the SDP have been wandering around trying to suggest that we should govern this country by some form of consensus. On a very important matter we have a consensus — it has been possible, on a major constitutional matter, to reach agreement between the two Front Benches. I find that highly desirable. But when that happens, what do we find? The funny little men in the Liberal party and the even funnier little men in the SDP come to grumble. The bizarre speech of the hon. Gentleman is not merely strange: it is utterly unacceptable.

[Mr. Douglas Hogg]

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I had not intended to make a speech, but the wholly mischievous, ill-informed and totally unprincipled speech of the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) so aroused me that I felt that I must at least make a short contribution.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that his Minister made a lot of the fact that some compromise had been reached. I think that he used the expression "a proper spirit of compromise". He said that some Conservatives wanted a more generous allocation, that there some Labour Members wanted a more miserly allocation, so they split the difference.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the Liberal Chief Whip, said, the Liberal party and the SDP also want a more generous allocation. We are on his side, and in terms of trying to weigh a compromise that is of some significance.

The hon. Gentleman absurdly—he knows it himself, by the smile on his face—suggested that we wanted to make some distinction between officials and these great wealth-makers. The hon. Gentleman has many speeches on record that show that this is quite simply not true. We would have liked to see a proper opportunity for people working for the United Kingdom abroad to vote in British elections. It is the sort of thing that is commonplace in other countries. It happens in the case of the Italians, for example, and in the case of others, who are able to vote in this country in their own elections without any difficulty. It is regarded as normal and reasonable. Why the hon. Member for Grantham should think it is unreasonable, if he is as democratic as I dare say he considers himself to be, I fail to understand.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Following the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) somehow winds the clock back about 10 years to the debates that we had late into the night on Scottish assemblies, and so forth. I can remember a speech that he made that was a source of great enjoyment for the whole House at a late hour one evening. But I do not follow his line of argument this evening.

This debate is peculiar on one or two scores. First, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) pointed out, it is peculiar that there is such disagreement between the Labour party's stand here and its stand in the other House.

Secondly, it is peculiar that both Liberal Members who have spoken so far seemed to deride any disagreement between the other place and this House. Disagreement between them and us seems to be to be a perfectly healthy form of constitutional behaviour. It has gone on in the past and will, I am sure, go on in the future. The parliamentary democracy in which we operate is the better for it.

Thirdly, it is peculiar, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) pointed out, because, as the amendments standing in the name of the Liberal party identify, it seems to put the Liberal party firmly in the peculiar position of asking for special rights for bureaucrats. It is absurd——

Mr. Beith: Rubbish.

Mr. Rathbone: The hon. Gentleman says "Rubbish", but the amendment is only and solely on behalf of bureaucrats in Europe. It is no good his saying that at this late stage of the evolution of this Bill he could do no more, because I believe that that is the argument of the non-trier. He is showing the Liberal party in this marvellous new guise of being overly in favour of those people who travel round the world doing bureaucratic jobs but against those people—they are not included in this amendment—who are helping this country and earning their living abroad.

I am one of those who have been frustrated by the Government's lack of extension of the right to vote on a far more liberal basis than the Bill at present deploys. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister made reference to those on these Benches who are so inclined and reiterated what the Home Secretary said during the debate in the House—that this was a step forward and that we would be returning to this at some moment in future to see what further steps forward could be contemplated.

It is remarkable that a major and constitutional advance has been made across the House by agreement between the two major parties. I fear that, judging by its amendments, the alliance eschews being a major party.

There is agreement across the House about this major constitutional improvement. I hope that the Government will stand fast in denying the Lords their amendment. In the same breath, I say that the Government will have to return to the subject with energy and enthusiasm and take it a step forward.

11.15 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The offensiveness of the attack by Government Members on public servants operating in communities to which this country belongs by treaty will be noted widely and will do no credit to those who have committed such remarks to the Official Report.

The spectacle of the Government going through the gyrations which they have thought appropriate in relation to the Bill are not edifying. They have not sought to explain why it is right to reject the principles embodied in the amendments, to accept and redraft them, and then to recommend to the House that it should throw them out, having commended them to the other place.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The Government spokesman in another place did not commit the Government to accepting this proposition. It seemed fair that he should ensure that the other place having made its views clear in a Division should ensure that the Bill was set in a form approved by parliamentary draftsmen. It was made clear at every stage that the Government reserved their position for when it came back to this House.

Mr. Maclennan: The Minister is adding to his earlier statement. To use the language of the "silly little man", the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), it is bizarre. To improve the language of the Bill, it is extraordinary for the Government to commend these measures to the other place and not to produce a single argument of substance. That will not be noted.

Mr. Skinner: Not in Brecon.

Mr. Maclennan: The Minister talked about the distinction between officials and others and suggested that——

Mr. Skinner: He could be an encyclopaedia seller.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman will wish to make his own contribution.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, I will.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman will, in his own time, make his speech without interruption from me.

There should be no doubt that my right hon. and hon. Friends believe that the right to vote should be enjoyed by British citizens regardless of the territory in which they live. It is of great importance that citizens should enjoy that fundamental right of citizenship and not be deprived of it by some temporary arrangement between certain spokesmen—apparently there is not unanimity on this subject in the Labour party—of the Labour party and the junior Minister who happens to be responsible for the conduct of the Bill tonight.

One has only to read the record of earlier debates on these matters to draw a stark contrast between what the Minister said tonight and what was said by his colleague in another place. It is patent nonsense to suggest that there is anything other than a squalid political deal which deprives citizens of rights which they ought properly to enjoy. The two Front Benches have collaborated to stop the clock and to prevent people from enjoying their proper constitutional rights. That is no credit to Ministers, or would-be Ministers, and they will learn to regret it.

These amendments represent matters of great substance to many thousands of citizens, who will dislike being drawn into this debate. It has become clear that their services to the country are little appreciated by those who continue to deprive them of the right to influence the country's future. The idea that servants of the country in NATO are not worthy of a vote is not a concept that can commend itself to anybody who cares to speak about defence in the West, as the Government do.

It does not do the country any credit to deprive our officials in the Western European Union of a vote. The Government tell us that that organisation must be the centre of European defence in future. They appear to believe that increasing diplomatic weight should be put on it, and yet they wish to continue to deprive our citizens who work for it of any right to participate in our general elections. What kind of logic is that? It is all to appease right hon. and hon. Members on the other side of the Gangway. It is being done for a simple political purpose —to elevate the political importance of people, such as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who posture as members of an alternative Government. The more they posture, the less it will be believed that they are worthy of support.

The people who serve the country in commerce, banking and industry around the world are equally deserving of the vote. We shall return to this matter when we are in a position to amend our constitution. As long as our constitutional law is arranged by squalid little fixes, we live in the 19th century.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I must tell the hon. Members for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) and for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) that their argument is profoundly wrong. They will recall that I originally proposed the amendment that the right to vote for British subjects resident abroad should be open and large, and not restricted by a time limit. I was delighted that the hon. Gentlemen were prepared to support my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) and me in the Division Lobbies.

A reason why the Liberal amendment is wrong is that, having taken the five year cut off point, they propose that a limited class of persons should be enabled to vote beyond that period. The franchise should either be universal, subject to the limited exceptions that we make of convicted criminals, lunatics and members of the House of Lords, and rest in everybody or nobody. The hon. Gentlemen propose to extend that right to a small number of people, which will create anomalies. That is why they are profoundly wrong to advance the case that they have. If we want to extend the right to vote beyond the five year period, as I do, we must extend it for more than five years, not create little classes of people here and there who are given that right beyond the five year period, regardless of the rights of our people as a whole.

I shall make a further point, which is of wider constitutional importance. We live in an age when the other place imagines that it has a duty beyond that of being a revising chamber. More and more, it is taking major and substantive political initiatives, which it knows have been rejected in the House. In this area, which determines the right of people to vote for members of this House, above all other when the House has reached a deliberate, settled political conclusion, we are entitled to expect that that decision receives respect in the other place. The other place has tried to take a political initiative, which it is neither right nor proper for it to take.

In those circumstances, I commend my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for the way in which they have handled the matter. I shall certainly support them tonight.

Mr. Skinner: Tonight the House would do our electors a great service by rejecting the amendment from the Liberal offshore alliance. On Thursday I pointed out to the voters in Brecon and Radnor, including many Liberals, that this Tuesday we would have a debate about giving £252 million to the Common Market because it was bankrupt and that later there would be a debate about giving votes to the claret drinking tax dodgers in the Common Market.

I have always argued that SDP and Liberal Members are Common Market fanatics, and that has been proved tonight. We would do the electors of Brecon and Radnor a service by ensuring that tonight's voting list is sent there to show how many of those hon. Gentlemen are prepared to serve the interest of those in the Common Market before that of those in Brecon and Radnor, and Wales.

I thought that the Liberals would have more sense. They will soon want to give a vote to Ronnie Biggs, all the tax dodgers on the Costa del Sol, and Tony Jacklin with his golf clubs in Spain. It is high time we paid more attention to those who pay taxes in Britain, rather than to those who have swanned off on the gravy trains to evade paying tax. No representation without taxation.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Brixworth School, Northamptonshire

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

11.51 pm

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): After that most exhausting series of Questions which the Chair has put to the House, perhaps the remaining minutes of today's proceedings will be allowed some respite. I thank the Under-Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) for attending the debate. I know that the hour is late, and the Minister's courtesy and interest in Brixworth school and the whole subject of capital expenditure allocations is much appreciated by myself and all my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in Northamptonshire. It is also appreciated by the local education authority.

This is a debate about capital expenditure, but I should like to refer to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today at Question Time about the teaching profession. To the best of my recollection, my right hon. Friend said that most teachers are effective and hard working and do an enormously difficult task. He also said that most teachers welcomed the new initiatives introduced in education. I associate myself with those remarks, which are most appropriate to the county of Northamptonshire and the teaching profession in my own constituency. Those teachers are doing a difficult job very well, and I commend the teaching profession for its dedication and hard work in all the schools in my constituency.

In Northamptonshire there are falling school rolls, especially in the secondary schools. It is also a county which has recently grown because of the new towns, the enterprise zones and the new estates in my own constituency such as Brixworth, Rothwell and Desborough. These dormitory towns serve the growing and expanding markets and industrial centres of the east midlands. Therefore, within a county that has falling school rolls, specific towns and villages are rapidly expanding. That is the problem to which I wish to allude, with specific reference to Brixworth.

If the A1-M1 link is built, as I hope it will be, that will only add to the growth of some towns and villages in central Northamptonshire, including some of the towns that I have mentioned. There is an inevitable strain on resources, which I accept are limited. Capital expenditure allocations are not infinite, and I support the Government's policy on the control of public expenditure.

In a county with falling school rolls, it is difficult to close part of a school, sell the assets and move them to the towns and villages where the population is growing and where the number of children entering infant and junior schools is increasing. We cannot move schools like building blocks. Therefore, scarce resources must be devoted to the most important cases of new school building or additions to existing schools. Havelock school in Desborough is in the same position as is Brixworth school, but for different reasons. I shall not develop arguments about Havelock school tonight, because I do not have enough time. There are many examples not only in my constituency but in all constituencies where scarce resources must be carefully devoted to the most pressing needs.

Brixworth has a population of about 3,400. It has an active parent-teacher association, and I pay tribute to Mr. Wilson, the current secretary of the PTA, to Mr. Leeming, the former PTA chairman, and to Mr. Woodcock, who is one of the governors. They have been most helpful to me, and I admire the spirit in the PTA and its attitude towards the school and the local education authority. It has always been most supportive and constructive, and I pledge its members and the PTAs in all the schools in my constituency that I shall work with them to the benefit of their schools and the benefit of their children.

Brixworth school, which caters for four to 11-year-olds, was built about 14 years ago to accommodate six classes and about 180 pupils. That number has grown to 390 pupils. Part of the increase is accounted for by the policy of the county council—I agree with the policy—to take into education the rising five-year-olds. Clearly, that has meant some pressure on resources that was not expected 14 years ago. A new block for five infant classes was built about three years ago. The school population is expected to increase to 400 in September, and the result of the rapid expansion has been three mobile classrooms. The important point that I wish to draw to my hon. Friend's attention is that, during the next four years, we expect the school population to increase to about 600. The rapid increase has been caused by the rapid development of the housing estate.

There are three solutions to the problem. The first is to have more mobile classrooms—something which I and the Minister would not wish to be a permanent solution to the problem, with all the shortcomings that mobile classrooms have. Secondly, we could build a new school in a different part of the village. Thirdly, we could add to the existing buildings, as was done three or four years ago. I cannot say what is the correct solution, because that is the job of the local education authority. I recognise its problems in controlling the allocation of scarce resources. Indeed, I pay tribute to Mr. Michael Hemley, the chief education officer of the local education authority in Northamptonshire, for doing a difficult job extremely well. It is not my job tonight to comment on whether there should be a new school, if resources are available, or an extension of the existing one.

I make three suggestions to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State which I offer in a helpful and constructive way. They are based upon discussions with the parent-teacher association in Brixworth and the local education authority. The first concerns long-term planning. At present, central Government say to the local education authority, "We will give you a certain capital expenditure allocation only 12 months ahead." That is not a cash grant but permission to borrow. I should like the LEA to be given a three-year plan, perhaps with allocations in the second and third years as a declining proportion of the allocation in the first year. Incidentally, this system applies to the HIP allocation for district councils. To the best of my knowledge, this three-year planning horizon does not apply to the county council for school capital expenditure.

It would be a great advantage if the Treasury accepted this proposal. Admittedly, the suggestion would cramp its style a little, because it means that, looking out to year two and year three, there is less room for manoeuvre in controlling the level of capital expenditure in the counties. Nevertheless, the proposal would have two great advantages. It would enable the LEA to plan more sensibly in terms of design and the order in which problems could be tackled. It would also enable the LEA to announce publicly to parents when their school was likely to be extended or a new school was likely to be built. That would give parents a great deal of comfort and would alleviate much concern—for example, at Brixworth.

My second suggestion concerns percentage limits. Under the present rules, district councils can spend in the current year only 20 per cent. of the proceeds from the sale of council houses, but county councils, being responsible for education, can spend 30 per cent. Obviously, the county councils can spend the other 70 per cent. in succeeding years. In Northamptonshire, the necessary capital expenditure plan is met from not only the approved allocation from central Government but what is called "virement" from the other departments—for example, if the transport department has spare capital allocation money that it does not need in the current year, it can give it or lend it to another department within the county council. That is one way in which Northamptonshire has been spending above the capital expenditure allocation to meet its plan.

I suggest that a threshold for each county council should be set and that we should say, "This is the target that we would like you to achieve in the sale of surplus land and assets. If you reach that threshold, you can spend only 30 per cent. in the current year but, if you do better than the absolute figure that we have given you, you can spend 100 per cent." I submit to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, although this is a matter not for him but for the Treasury, that such an arrangement would not increase the PSBR but would provide an incentive to the LEAs to sell more surplus land and assets. The LEAs would know that they could spend 100 per cent. of their surplus sales in the current year.

My third suggestion concerns the problem that Brixworth has encountered during the past few years. Perhaps this suggestion comes too late to benefit Brixworth, but it may benefit other towns and villages. I believe that we have to improve liaison between the housebuilders and planners and the LEA. How is it that in Brixworth the housebuilders built within two years an estate that was planned to be developed over 10 years? The local authority could have provided adequate buildings within that time, and avoided the present school places crisis.

If there were a requirement that the county structure plan should include a reference to education needs and a requirement for housebuilders and developers fully to consult the local education authority, we might avoid circumstances similar to those in Brixworth.

I again thank my hon. Friend for his kindness in attending the debate and I invite him, on behalf of my colleagues who represent Northamptonshire, to visit us again. We have much appreciated his past visits. When he comes again, I hope that he will visit Brixworth.

12.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on obtaining this Adjournment debate on the expansion of Brixworth school. I am pleased to be able to reply to him. I note his interesting suggestions, some of which, as he said, are not for decision by the Department of Education and Science.

My hon. Friend has spoken tonight about a matter which is of immediate interest in his constituency—the important matter of school provision when there is a growth of new housing in the area and the school population is likely to rise. This raises issues of national as well as local interest, since it relates to the Government's policies in relation to capital expenditure. In raising these issues my hon. Friend has demonstrated the active and diligent way in which he represents his constituents' interests.

My hon. Friend spoke about the position at Brixworth school. I shall come to that in a moment, but before I do so there are a number of relevant issues of national policy that need to be set out because they form the background to a full understanding of the local position.

Each year, local education authorities are invited to send to the Department details of their plans for capital expenditure in the following year. In aggregate, these plans inevitably exceed what the country can afford. We are therefore faced with having to decide between conflicting priorities when distributing the limited resources available for capital works. In doing so our priority has been to meet expenditure required for commitments on on-going projects which previous allocations have allowed for. This accounts for a large part of the resources available. We also take account of local education authorities' legal obligations to make sufficient provision for the children in their area. Where the area is one of population growth which leads to a demand for new places in an authority's schools, a high priority is given for a capital allocation to meet this demand, whether by building new schools or extensions to existing schools. In recent years we have always been able to meet local education authorities' bids for such projects. In addition, where authorities have published statutory proposals to remove surplus places, which have been approved by my right hon. Friend, and where these include a capital building project, which is related to the proposals, we have generally been able to provide a capital allocation so that the work can go ahead. This is to enable the authority to implement the proposals, which it has a legal duty to do.

Before the introduction in April 1981 of the present system for controlling local authority capital expenditure by means of annual prescribed expenditure allocations for each of the five service blocks—housing, transport, education, personal social services and other Government services—the Department operated a system of annual building programmes under which each local education authority received an allocation of the total value of building work that it could start in a given year. This allocation carried with it a borrowing approval, and local authority borrowing was controlled by this means rather than as now by control of expenditure.

Up to and including 1974-75, the allocation of building programme resources was by individual named projects based on DES consideration of annual LEA bids related to priority. A sum for minor works was added by the Department. This was an unnecessarily burdensome system, leaving LEAs with virtually no room for manoeuvre. With effect from 1975-76, in line with the then Government's desire to leave more decisions about the use of educational building programmes to LEAs, a three-stage rolling programme was reintroduced to promote the systematic processing of work, and authorities were given firm lump sum authorisations of starts based on their own priorities, leaving them free to start projects which they thought essential. As I have said, this system, wherein a rolling programme gave a useful facility to authorities for forward planning, came to an end in 1981.

Since that time, under the arrangements introduced by the Local Government. Planning and Land Act 1980, LEAs have each year indicated to the Department the level of capital expenditure which they would wish to undertake. Priority in making the prescribed expenditure allocations within the resources available for schools is given, on the basis of the expected deficiency of places assessed by LEAs, to the need to provide additional school places in areas of population growth—that is, roofs over heads without which pupils would be out of school, and then to work for the removal of surplus places and other improvement and replacement projects. Once allocations are made, authorities are free to use them how they wish and can transfer between the service blocks at will if they decide to do so.

Clearly, under a system of expenditure control, it is for an authority to determine its own priorities and to formulate its capital programmes, and in doing so it could well quite reasonably adopt a system of rolling programmes if it wished to do so. Indeed, we are aware that many authorities already have such a system, which enables them to plan ahead in a sensible and logical way, with sufficient flexibility to cope with unexpected eventualities. Given that the Department no longer manages a building programme, we must rely on local authorities, which are, after all, better placed, to assess their needs and priorities and, within the resources available to them, to establish the best and most efficient way of managing their capital programmes.

As regards the disposal of surplus assets, it is our policy to encourage local authorities to identify these and, where no alternative educational or community use can be found for them, to sell them wherever possible. Authorities are well aware of the benefits, both educational and financial, to be obtained from seeking to rationalise their educational provision and the removal of surplus places and realising assets found to be surplus. Since 1982-83 we have positively helped in this direction by providing in the prescribed expenditure allocations the capital resources for building work necessary to release surplus schools for closure and disposal.

There is no doubt that the sale of education assets has been increasing over recent years. In 1980-81 receipts from such sales were £23 million. They rose to around £46 million in each of the years 1981-82 to 1983-84, and, on the basis of local authority returns to the Department of the Environment, are expected to be around £80 million in 1984-85. This increase is in line with the higher number of schools approved for closure by my right hon. Friend in each of the years since 1980.

The system of capital expenditure control allows authorities to increase the limit of their capital spending in any given year by a proportion of their actual capital receipts. This proportion, prescribed by regulation, is currently 30 per cent. for non-housing receipts, including those realised from the sale of surplus school and other educational buildings and land. It is very much in the interests of authorities to rationalise their school provision at a time of falling school rolls. Such rationalisation schemes result in better deployment of teachers and improved educational provision for the pupils concerned. At the same time, where whole schools or parts of them can be closed, there are valuable savings on recurrent expenditure to be achieved in addition to the capital receipt from the sale of redundant buildings and land.

The prescribed proportions of capital receipts were reduced for 1985-86 in order to restrict authorities' access to their accumulated receipts. These are estimated to be about £5 billion in total and unrestricted access to them posed a serious threat to the national cash limit for local authority capital expenditure set by the Government. Nevertheless, the more capital receipts an authority can generate in a particular year, the further it can increase its spending power in that year. Furthermore, an authority is under no restriction on the use of its capital receipts for non-prescribed expenditure and for redeeming outstanding loans with benefits in terms of reduced debt charges, which will be a further saving in recurrent expenditure. These are very real advantages which provide a worthwhile incentive to the realisation of surplus assets.

Turning at last to the question of Brixworth school, I understand that Northamptonshire LEA has indicated that there may be a deficiency of 200 primary school places in the area by 1988-89. I have to tell my hon. Friend that very shortly the Department will be asking LEAs for details of their plans for capital expenditure in the next few years. Provided that Northamptonshire can satisfy us that a capital project is necessary to cater for that additional demand, and that it meets the parameters that I mentioned earlier, I can assure my hon. Friend that it will receive careful consideration. He will realise, and I know that he will appreciate, that I cannot give him any assurances at this stage. What we are able to allocate to individual LEAs will depend upon the amount which is available to us nationally, and this in turn, will depend on what the country can afford.

I conclude as I began, by congratulating my hon. Friend on firmly placing before the House the interests and needs of his constituents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eighteen minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Spain and Gibraltar

1. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding frontier co-operation between Spain and Gibraltar.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): During my visit to Gibraltar on 7 and 8 June I was pleased to learn at first hand of the excellent co-operation which exists between the Spanish and Gibraltar authorities at the border between Spain and Gibraltar.

Mr. Taylor: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that helpful reply. Can he assure me that the arrangements are working mutually beneficially for the Spanish and Gibraltarian people? Does he agree that we continue to have a special responsibility for the people of Gibraltar, for their economy and welfare and to ensure their satisfaction with the arrangements?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to reconfirm to my hon. Friend that we undoubtedly have a responsibility for the future of Gibraltar. During my time there I frequently repeated the commitment contained in the preamble to the 1969 constitution. The arrangements for the border are working well. Since 5 February there have been over 1 million visitors each way, including many vehicles. That is about four times higher, without vehicles, than the number of visitors before the border was opened. The arrangements are providing a good foundation for growing economic co-operation and future prosperity in the region, including on the Spanish side of the border.

Dr. Glyn: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, although we appreciate the good and improving relations that will result from the visit by His Majesty the King of Spain to Britain, we still recognise our obligations to our own people in Gibraltar?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I can only repeat what I have just said. I endorse what my hon. Friend said about the importance of improving the excellent relations between ourselves and Spain and about our continuing commitment to the people of Gibraltar.

Dooge Committee

2. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Dooge committee report will next be considered by the European Economic Community Council of Ministers.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The future development of the Community will be discussed at the Milan European Council on 28 and 29 June.

Mr. Deakins: Will the Minister assure the House that the Prime Minister will this weekend stand firm on the three important reservations, to which the Minister himself subscribed, to the Dooge committee report? Will the Prime Minister maintain the Minister's position and report back to the House next week?

Mr. Rifkind: The reservations which I entered in the report by the Dooge committee represented, and continue to represent, the policies of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Malone: Does my hon. Friend agree that, following the enlargement of the Community, the section of the Dooge committee report which deals with easier decision-making by the Council takes on a particular significance if progress is to be made? Will my hon. Friend confirm that his suggestion that if there is any difference of opinion within the Council it must be defined at an early date will go a long way towards reconciling differences between the preservation of national interest and making progress within the Community?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. We believe that the enlargement of the Community to 12 will make the existing procedures more unlikely to be capable of reaching early agreement on matters of importance. Therefore, we believe that there should be more majority voting, as long as the right of a member state to invoke the national interest provisions remains in a form which, while not being capable of abuse, protects national interest.

Sir Russell Johnston: Is the Minister aware that the formula is vague? Will he confirm my impression of Dooge that the Government would oppose an inter-governmental conference following Milan? Does he accept that many of us would regret such opposition, and can he explain it?

Mr. Rifkind: The best inter-governmental conference is that of Heads of State. We hope that at Milan the Heads of State—I should say Heads of Government—will be assembled and will be able to agree a package of proposals which, apart from anything else, will make any other conference worthless. We see no need for the procedural device of an inter-governmental conference. We hope that the agreements reached at Milan will be sufficient for the progress that we all wish to see in the Community.

Mr. George Robertson: It appears from the well organised press coverage that the Milan summit will be dominated by the bright ideas coming from the Foreign Office, especially in the guise of the Foreign Secretary. Why have these allegedly bright ideas not been available to right hon. and hon. Members, certainly up until yesterday? The Foreign Secretary would not answer this question last night. When will we be told what the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister will propose at next week's summit at Milan?

Mr. Rifkind: First, I must thank the hon. Gentleman for his compliment to the Government and for his correct assessment of the Government's important and constructive role. He asked when he and his hon. Friends would be made aware of the Government's views on the Milan discussions. The Government's proposals were outlined at some length in the debate on the European Community which I opened last week and to which he replied.

Later——

Mr. George Robertson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have heard the exchange at Question Time when I asked the Minister of State about documents which were tabled last week by the British Government at the Foreign Minister's Council at Stresa, and which are to form part of the agenda for the Heads of Government summit in Milan this Friday. The Minister of State told the House that he mentioned the ideas that will be proposed in a debate in the House last Thursday. However, there are two documents related to this issue, one of which is called "The Draft European Council Conclusions: Decision-Taking" and the other "The Draft Agreement on Political Co-operation", which has two annexes. Those documents form a vital basis for what is being proposed at the Heads of Government summit later this week. They have been extensively used in press briefings in the Sunday and Monday newspapers throughout the country, yet they have not been made available in any form to hon. Members. They have not been deposited in the Vote Office and, until a few minutes ago, they were not in the Library.

Surely hon. Members cannot possibly assess what the British Government's position is to be at this vital summit of Heads of Government unless we, the representatives of the British people, know what the Government will propose in our name. Surely it is to treat the House with grave disrespect, if not contempt, to deny us the final proposals of this country at this vital summit meeting. Can you do something to protect hon. Members from the cavalier way in which the Foreign Office has treated us?

Mr. Speaker: Order. No point of order arises from that because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, it is in order for Ministers to refer to documents. However, if they quote from documents, the documents must be laid on the Table. The hon. Gentleman has done what is necessary by making the position clear.

Cyprus

3. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent talks he has had about the reunification of Cyprus.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): We keep in close and frequent touch with the United Nations Secretary-General and the parties concerned with a view to assisting progress towards a settlement in Cyprus.

Mr. Powell: Will the Minister make a declaration that he will do something about the re-unification of Cyprus? An assembly has been established in the occupied section, but is it not time that something was done to alleviate the 11 years of suffering of those who have been exiled from their area of Cyprus? Is it not time that the Government took a different line and implemented different action to put more pressure on the United Nations to ensure that the troops are withdrawn from the occupied section so that people can return to their homes, land and country?

Mr. Renton: I must emphasise that we have never recognised the Turkish republic of northern Cyprus. We do not recognise any of the so-called constitutional developments that have taken place in recent weeks. I hope that the way is now clear for the Secretary-General of the United Nations to resume his initiative, which we have supported strongly in recent months. It will be necessary for all sides to show some degree of flexibility for the initiative to succeed.

Mr. David Atkinson: If talks on re-unification do not succeed, do not the people of northern Cyprus have an ultimate right to self-determination, which we should recognise?

Mr. Renton: Our aim is to achieve a unified, federal and prosperous Cyprus. That is also the aim of the Secretary-General. I think that both sides should show some degree of flexibility to enable the Secretary-General to get under way with his initiative.

Mr. Haynes: When discussions have taken place, have the 1,600 missing persons featured in them? Is the Minister aware that 1,600 Greek Cypriots are missing from their families and loved ones, and what do the Government intend to do about it?

Mr. Renton: There have been frequent discussions in recent months between my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister, both with President Kyprianou and the Turkish Foreign Minister. Most recently, my right hon. and learned Friend met the Turkish Foreign Minister during the North Atlantic Council meeting in Lisbon on 6 June. The main purpose of the discussions was to press on both sides the need to move towards a solution in Cyprus that would bring about a united island. If the hon. Gentleman would like to raise particular issues about the missing Greek Cypriots, perhaps he will write to me about them. If he does so, I shall see that they are pursued.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that a continuation of the present uneasy stalemate in Cyprus is in no one's interest? Therefore, will he go on using every possible endeavour to get both sides to accept the United Nations initiative to get negotiations going again so that we may have some progress in this matter?

Mr. Renton: Yes, I wholeheartedly agree, and the Secretary-General earlier this year created an important opening. It is up to all sides to see that that opening is made use of.

Mr. Nelson Mandela

4. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have received on the continuing imprisonment of Nelson Mandela in South Africa; and what has been the response of those representations.

Mr. Rifkind: We receive many representations, from individuals and organisations, in accord with our view that Nelson Mandela should be released immediately and unconditionally. We shall continue to press for this.

Mr. Fisher: Do those representations include the petition presented to the Prime Minister two weeks ago by 45 lord mayors and lord provosts, including the Lord Mayor of Stoke-on-Trent, Councillor John Birkin? They will no doubt be delighted to hear that the Government will continue their support for Mr. Mandela's release, but would be more cheered if the Government would take some action. Will the Foreign Secretary raise this issue at Milan and consider a joint initiative with European, EC and Commonwealth Heads of State to put some pressure on the South African Government?

Mr. Rifkind: I can confirm that the representations received include representations from local authorities, including those from the specific individual about whom the hon. Gentleman is so concerned. As to action by Her Majesty's Government, I remind the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised this issue with Mr. P. W. Botha when he was in the United Kingdom last year.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: Have not the South African Government made it clear that they are prepared to release Nelson Mandela on condition that he renounces terrorism and violence? Is there to be a distinction so that some are to be allowed legitimately to pursue terrorism and violence as long as it is against South Africa? I remind my hon. Friend that South Africa is one of the 13 of the founder members of the League of Nations whose Governments have not been changed by force since the first world war.

Mr. Rifkind: Bearing in mind that Nelson Mandela has been in prison but was never convicted of any personal act of violence, and that it is somewhat unusual, to say the least, to impose conditions on the release of persons in prison, either in South Africa or any other country, neither I nor Her Majesty's Government believe that it is appropriate to require statements from Mr. Mandela before he is released.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not unfortunate that there are Conservative Back Benchers who are far more concerned to see Hess released from prison than Nelson Mandela, who all his life fought against the principles on which Hess was convicted at Nuremberg? Is the Minister aware that we require from this Government and the United Nations, not simply words but determined action and pressure on the South African authorities, to ensure that Nelson Mandela, after 20 years of imprisonment, is allowed, without any conditions, to be released and to become a free man again?

Mr. Rifkind: I have already said that Her Majesty's Government shared the view expressed in the hon. Gentleman's latter question. As to his first question, that is a most unworthy comparison, which is both irrelevant to the questions under consideration and also, I am afraid to say, rather typical of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Thornton: Did my hon. Friend have the opportunity to read the leader in The Times on Monday? Does he agree with its assertions that terrorism can never be given a political legitimacy no matter where it occurs, and that terrorism against civilian targets must never be justified? Is it not the refusal of Mr. Nelson Mandela to repudiate such acts of violence that means his continued imprisonment?

Mr. Rifkind: While I entirely agree that it would be inappropriate for the Government to have formal contact with an organisation that is committed to acts of violence of the kind described, given the very lengthy period that Mr. Mandela has already spent in prison I do not believe that further conditions need to be imposed before he is released. All those who are seeking a peaceful solution to the problems of South Africa ought to believe that Mr. Mandela's release might help in that direction, and might also help to persuade the ANC as an organisation to renounce the road of violence as a means of achieving political change.

Mr. Anderson: Why do the Government not meet leaders of the ANC, who are denied any political role in their own country? While the IRA can fight elections if it wants, the ANC cannot, because it is excluded from national franchise. Is it not impertinent and unrealistic of President Botha to impose the pre-condition of disavowal of violence, when the South African authorities constantly carry out acts of violence against the black majority? Will the Government now press South Africa to allow Mrs. Winnie Mandela to leave her own country next month to attend the women's conference in Nairobi?

Mr. Rifkind: Of course we hope that Mrs. Mandela will be free to leave South Africa if she wishes, and we hope that the South African Government will act in a responsible and constructive way to any such request. As to the hon. Gentleman's general points, there is nothing I can add to the comments that I have already made.

Mr. Anatoly Shcharansky

6. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Soviet Union for the release of Anatoly Shcharansky.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised the case of Anatoly Shcharansky with Mr. Gorbachev last December. Most recently Mr. Shcharansky's case was among those raised by our delegation to the conference on security and co-operation in Europe experts meeting on human rights in Ottawa.

Mr. Carlile: I congratulate the Government on raising Mr. Shcharansky's case at a very high level, but does the hon. Gentleman feel that there is any thaw in the Soviet attitude towards dissidents and individual liberty? If not, what further steps beyond representation do the British Government propose to take to ensure that such a thaw occurs?

Mr. Rifkind: I regret to say that it is very difficult to discern any significant evidence of any change in attitudes by the Soviet authorities towards dissidents or questions involving human rights since Mr. Gorbachev's accession to power. Naturally, we hope that that situation will change, and we shall lose no opportunity to impress upon the Soviet Union that if, like us, it wishes to see an improvement in East-West relations, an improvement in human rights would make an enormous contribution towards the realisation of that objective as well as being in accordance with the Soviet Union's obligations under the Helsinki final act.

Mr. Latham: I thank my hon. Friend for his own strong commitment to this cause and for the heavy pressure that he has placed on the Soviet Government in an attempt to do something about it, but is he aware that, rather than getting better, things are getting worse? We must take every possible opportunity to press the cause not only of Shcharansky and other dissidents and refuseniks but of Soviet Jewry and other Soviet citizens who want the right to emigrate from that country.

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his personal comments. We sought to use the recent Ottawa meeting to pursue the exact objectives to which my hon. Friend has referred. Next month is the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki final act, and therefore it is an appropriate time to remind the Soviet authorities of the explicit commitments which they undertook to honour at that time, but which, sadly, they have failed to do.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that the annual award of the all-party parliamentary committee for the release of Soviety Jewry went to Anatoly Shcharansky in a previous year and is this year to be awarded to Professor Alexander Lerner? Will my hon. Friend please emphasise to the Soviet authorities the importance to all hon. Members of respect for the rights of people accorded by the universal declaration of human rights and the Soviet Union's own constitution, so that people may leave that country in accordance with international law in a way that they are not permitted to do at present?

Mr. Rifkind: It was very appropriate that that award was made to Mr. Shcharansky, who, after all, was a member of the original Helsinki monitoring group in the Soviet Union. The fact that that monitoring group was persecuted by the Soviet authorities shows, I regret to say, how cynical is their attitude towards the obligations into which they have entered.

Mr. Holt: While it is understandable that hon. Members should raise in the House the question of Anatoly Shcharansky and Nelson Mandela, both of whom have been found guilty of crimes in their own countries by their own Governments, what are Her Majesty's Government doing about Graham Coveyduck, a British citizen incarcerated without trial in Nigeria?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That does not arise on this question.

Mr. Holt: A good try, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Not bad.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Is the Minister aware that there would be more hope for the release of people such as Anatoly Shcharansky if the Soviet authorities allowed Russian brides out of the country to join their husbands who are working in the United Kingdom? Does he agree that that aspect should also be pressed on the Soviet authorities?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct to emphasise that that, too, was an undertaking which was entered into at the time of the Helsinki final act and which has not been properly honoured. Her Majesty's Government do all that is required of them in terms of their obligations to their citizens to try to ensure that anyone detained without trial is released at the earliest opportunity.

Namibia

8. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the South African Government following their decision unilaterally to establish a transitional Government in Namibia.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We told the South African Government, both privately before their announcement and in a public statement following it, that we regarded the establishment of an interim Administration in Namibia as null and void. We have taken every opportunity to remind South Africa of its international obligation to implement Security Council resolution 435.

Mr. Madden: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman concerned about the fact that the British Government's present posture on Namibia is causing Britain to become isolated in the Commonwealth and among much of the international community? Will he make it clear at forthcoming meetings of the United Nations Security Council that Britain will not automatically oppose the imposition of sanctions on South Africa? Will he also make it clear that Conservative Members who saw fit to attend the inauguration of the puppet Government recently were not there with the support or, indeed, silent blessing of the British Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The answer to the last part of that supplementary question is that I fancy that some of my colleagues who attended that occasion are not in the habit of seeking the blessing of Her Majesty's Government, silent or otherwise, and seem able to speak and act for themselves. I have already answered the earlier part of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question about Her Majesty's Government's position. I must also make it clear that we do not believe that an advance in the direction on which the whole House is agreed — namely, the implementation of resolution 435 — would be most effectively secured by the imposition of economic sanctions. However, it is, of course, important to maintain pressure in the most effective way that we possibly can.

Mr. Amery: What progress is being made towards securing the withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola, which is a necessary precondition for the fulfilment of the United Nations plan for Namibia?

Hon. Members: No.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As Opposition Members are pointing out, the withdrawal of Cuban forces does not form any part of resolution 435, as my right hon. Friend knows. Nor do we recognise it as a precondition for a settlement. The South Africans have made it clear that they will not agree to the implementation of resolution 435 unless a way of implementing the withdrawal of Cuban forces is found. It is to that end that the United States-led negotiations have been and continue to be directed—not helped by the recent incident, which we all deplored, at Cabinda.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman taken the opportunity to express to the South Africans the disgust of the House about their behaviour of late and particularly about their invasion of Botswana and the terrorism that followed, which represented an affront to all decent standards of behaviour?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As was made plain at the time, we stongly condemned the blatant violation of Botswana's sovereignty that was involved in that affair. We deplored and deeply regretted the loss of life involved, and I summoned the South African ambassador immediately to see me and made clear the serious view that we took of that attack.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Why are the British Government not prepared to support an interim Government of national unity, representative of all the major political parties in Namibia, which are united in their determination to remove all vestiges of apartheid? Why are the Government not prepared to support them, as this in no way undermines the determination of that interim Government ultimately to hold elections under international supervision?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The answer is basically because the so-called interim Administration has no standing under the plan endorsed by United Nations resolution 435. The plan was accepted by the South African Government. We have made our view entirely clear to South Africa. Previous internal arrangements in Namibia have not proved of lasting significance.

Mr. Robert Hughes: When the Foreign Secretary this afternoon meets the President of SWAPO, Mr. Sam Nujoma, will he tell him two things? First, will he tell him that the Government do not have unlimited patience with South Africa and will not allow it to flout the wishes of the vast majority of countries in preventing resolution 435 from being passed? Secondly, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman try to explain to Mr. Sam Nujoma what the purpose is of having a transitional Government in Namibia if it is not to thwart resolution 435?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Although I am prepared to try to explain many things, it is not for me to explain the answer to the last question that the hon. Gentleman raised. This is a matter for those who are responsible for that action. I shall certainly make plain to Mr. Nujoma the importance that we attach to securing progress on resolution 435, and will leave him in no doubt about that.

Mr. Robert Banks: Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider whether there could be an alternative to United Nations resolution 435 by bringing together all political parties in Namibia, and SWAPO, to agree on a constitution and a formula for holding elections? Given that the transitional Government obtain the essential reforms that are necessary to that country and the credibility that goes with them, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider whether support at that stage will be relevant to Namibia's obtaining independence through those means?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One starts from the universal importance attached even by the South African Government to resolution 435. Of course, one does not exclude the possibility of some means of help of the type that my hon. Friend has described. If SWAPO were involved in such talks and if those talks led to conclusions that would assist in the implementation of resolution 435, one would not exclude that possibility.

Sir Russell Johnston: I refer to the meeting which the Foreign Secretary will have with Sam Nujoma, to which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) referred. My impression from conversations this morning with Mr. Nujoma is that, while he recognises the positive nature of the statements which the Government have made — they were repeated today by the right hon. and learned Gentleman—about Namibia and the status of a transitional Government, he has the impression that neither the British Government nor the contact group have any practical proposals which are likely to have any effect on South Africa. How will the right hon. and learned Gentleman respond to that question?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One has to recognise — [Interruption.] I am sure that the House would like me to welcome the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) at this late stage in the afternoon. In answer to the question from which we have been diverted, the role that we can play is to identify the objective, which is resolution 435, and to recognise that the United States-led negotiations, for all the patience that they require, represent probably the most effective route towards making headway in that direction. We give our support to that and to any other measure which is likely to be effective and which does not cut across that process.

Mr. Anderson: Is it not becoming just a little comical to see the number of times that the South African ambassador is called in for a ticking-off or a mauling from the Foreign Secretary, whatever the gravity of South Africa's actions? Even the Americans, for example, withdrew their ambassador over the Gabarone incident. Let me not say that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) can add respectability to anything, but does not the Foreign Office believe that the visit on 17 June of those Conservative Back Benchers to the inauguration of the new interim Government was unhelpful and is to be condemned?

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Certainly not.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hear my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) expressing his view in his own characteristic fashion. So far as we are concerned, we have made our view quite clear that the establishment of that interim Administration is null and void, and we have nothing to add to that. Of course, it is necessary for us to make our position clear to the South African ambassador as we have done not just in relation to the Gabarone incident but also to the Cabinda incident. The hon. Gentleman points to the fact that the Americans have withdrawn their ambassador for consultations. It is our view that it is not helpful, if we are trying to get our views across to the South African Government, for us to take that step. Each country takes its own view.

Helsinki Final Act

9. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to republish the Helsinki Final Act in all signatory states on the occasion of its 10th anniversary.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): The Helsinki Final Act and Madrid concluding document are already widely available in the United Kingdom and in other Western countries. Republication of the Final Act in all signatory states to mark the 10th anniversary of the Council on Security and Co-operation in Europe process would require unanimous agreement among the 35 signatories, which at present does not exist.

Mr. Atkinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the failure of the human rights conference in Ottawa this month to agree indicates the most urgent necessity to revitalise the Helsinki process? Does not the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Act present a new opportunity for the citizens of each signatory state to be aware of the Act's provisions? Can he therefore confirm that it is Western states which are preventing the publication in all the signatory states of the Act, on the ground of cost?

Mr. Luce: First, I know the long-standing interest that my hon. Friend has taken in the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. Let me make it quite plain that it is the Eastern bloc which has refused to consider the republication of the Final Act, not the West, and it requires unanimous agreement to achieve that. Of course, documents on the Final Act are fully available in the West. I wish they were more fully available in the East. Her Majesty's Government's commitment to the Helsinki Final Act is very strong. We would like to see a renewed sense of commitment on the part of all the members. Indeed, I should add that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will be representing the British Government at the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki Final Act.

Mr. James Lamond: Is it not misleading to suggest that the Helsinki Final Act is freely available in the West when the British Government, for example, in response to the signed agreement to publish it widely, thought that 5,800 copies were sufficient to cover the 55 million people in this country, that is, one copy per 10,000 citizens? There are only 300 copies left in stock, while the Helsinki Final Act was published in full in many millions of copies in the Eastern bloc countries.

Mr. Luce: The regrettable thing is that the copies of the Final Act are not adequately available in the Eastern bloc. I assure the hon. Gentleman that adequate supplies of the Helsinki Final Act are available in this country through various sources.

Sir Bernard Braine: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not republication of the Helsinki Final Act that is required, but implementation? Is it not time for the West, and for the United Kingdom Government in particular, to get much tougher? Should we not publish a list of all the named prisoners of conscience suffering in Soviet gaols or in the gaols of the satellite countries so that there oppressors know that we have not forgotten them?

Mr. Luce: I think that my right hon. Friend, who has taken a constant and prolonged interest in the question of human rights and in the Final Act, has put his finger on it. The matter that I am sure concerns everybody in the House and outside it is the implementation of that Final Act. There has not been satisfactory progress, and there have been six weeks of discussion in Ottawa in which we as a Government have been able to focus attention upon the very issues that my right hon. Friend has raised. But there must be a renewed sense of vigour in which the British Government can play a leading part.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is more likely that the Soviet Union would implement the Final Act if the Western Allies were not so exhuberant in giving the impression that the Soviet Union is the source of all the evil in the world?

Mr. Luce: It would be wrong to say that the Soviet Union is the source of all the evil in the world, but we have been discussing very fully this afternoon the deep concern felt by all parties about the lack of real respect for the rights of the individual in the Soviet Union. A large number of cases have been drawn to our attention and it is only right that the Government should be vigorous about pursuing these issues under the procedures of the Final Act.

Spain and Gibraltar

10. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what restrictions imposed by the Spanish Government on access to Gibraltar by land, air and sea, respectively, in 1967 have been removed following his recent discussions with the Spanish Foreign Minister, and which remain.

Mr. Renton: The then Spanish Government imposed a series of restrictions on land, sea and air movements between Spain and Gibraltar over a period of several years, culminating in the complete closure of the border in 1969. Subsequently, some of these restrictions were eased until, on 5 February 1985, all abnormal obstacles to land, sea and civil air traffic were lifted. The flight path for military aircraft, however, remains subject to limitations, about which we are in discussion with the Spanish authorities.

Mr. Stanbrook: In view of the rosy picture painted earlier this afternoon by the Foreign Secretary of the state of British-Spanish relations, what possible legitimate reason can Spain have for continuing to impose restrictions on British aircraft wishing to use the Gibraltar airfield? Is not Spanish policy inconsistent with her obligations under the terms of the NATO treaty? As Spain is a candidate member of the European Community, will my hon. Friend arrange for her to be told that her policy is unacceptable and unfriendly?

Mr. Renton: I agree with my hon. Friend that we have a strong interest in developing further the civil use of the Gibraltar airfield on a mutually beneficial basis. On his point about NATO, Spain is not a full member of NATO in the sense of participating in the military arrangements of the Alliance. However, I can assure my hon. Friend that we have made our position about the movement of aircraft very well known to the Spanish authorities.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most serious actions taken in 1967 by the Spanish was the cancellationof the extradition treaty? Can he say what progress is being made to reimplement the treaty?

Mr. Renton: Considerable progress is being made over the extradition treaty between Spain and the United Kingdom. We hope that it can shortly be finalised.

Cuba

11. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he or other Foreign Office Ministers have any plans to seek to visit Cuba.

Mr. Renton: There are no plans at present for a ministerial visit to Cuba.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there has been no ministerial visit of any kind, Foreign Office or otherwise, to Cuba since 1975, and does he agree that such a visit now would do a power of good? On his attitude to such a visit, will he assure the House that he will not be swayed one way or another by anything that is said in Washington?

Mr. Renton: Following his visit to Cuba in January of this year, I understand my hon. Friend's interest in this matter. It is not a question of being swayed one way or another by Washington. Commercial relations between the United Kingdom and Cuba are developing well, but we have been unable to make plans for a visit within the heavy schedule of ministerial visits. However, this will be kept under review.

Mr. Foulkes: Surely this is an important area to visit. Is not Britain being left behind by events in Central America? Cuba is building up strong links with all the Latin American countries, including the new democracies. Is the Under-Secretary of State aware of the Cuban proposal that Western Governments should take over from the banks responsibility for external debt, amounting to £360 billion in the case of Latin America? Since British banks have a large involvement, what is the British Government's response and what action are the British Government taking?

Mr. Renton: This question has nothing to do with taking over the debt responsibilities of Latin American countries. The hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he does not believe that there has been an improvement in our relations with Cuba. Last year our exports to Cuba greatly increased and Cuba is now Britain's fifth largest export market in Latin America. However, as I said, we are not at the moment considering a ministerial visit.

Turkish Peace Association

13. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Turkish Government regarding the prosecution of members of the Turkish Peace Association.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have been in close touch with the Turkish authorities about a range of human rights issues, including the Turkish Peace Association trials. They can be in no doubt about our opinions. I spoke personally to the Turkish Foreign Minister on these issues when I met him in Lisbon on 6 June.

Mr. Wallace: I am very grateful to the Secretary of State for his answer and for the continuing attention which he is obviously giving to this important matter. Quite apart from representations on the specific issue of the Turkish Peace Association prisoners, what pressure does the Secretary of State believe can be brought to bear on Turkey, which, after all, is a NATO ally, to try to change its ways regarding the serious limitations on personal freedom, which many people in this country would consider inconsistent with the type of free society which NATO is supposed to be defending?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that the measures that can be taken include, beyond exhortations of the kind that the hon. Member has just indulged in, encouragement and acknowledgement of progress when it has been made. It is important to note that not only have there been the national elections in 1983 and the local government elections in March 1984, but there has been a steady reduction in the number of areas subject to martial law. When I visited Turkey in February of this year about half the provinces were still subject to martial law. Since then, 17 provinces have been freed from that. It is important, therefore, not only to bring matters to the attention of the Turkish Government, but to acknowledge progress when it is made.

Mr. Forth: Is there any limit to the extent to which her Majesty's Government might seek to interfere and intervene in the internal affairs and judicial systems of other countries? What would my right hon. and learned Friend's reaction be were the Head of Government of the Soviet Union, South Africa or Turkey to approach him with representations on what we should do about our judicial system?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is not as perceptive as he customarily is. He must acknowledge that questions of this kind are a matter of natural discussion between, for example, fellow members of the North Atlantic Alliance or of the Council of Europe. Indeed, progress by Turkey towards securing fuller recognition of its position in the Council of Europe is one of the matters that Turkey understands and discusses with us. In that context, we welcome the changes that I have described. We welcome, for example, the transformation from a scene in which there were 20 political killings a day—which was the situation that the Turkish Government had to grapple with—to one in which the number of people in military gaols dropped from 43,000 in 1981 to 8,000 in February 1985. It is in that context that we welcome and encourage progress towards democracy by a fellow member of the North Atlantic Alliance.

Mr. Deakins: Does the Foreign Secretary not think that there will have to be a considerable improvement in the human rights situation in Turkey, particularly in relation to the treatment of trade unionists and opposition political parties, before a Turkish application to become the 13th member of the Common Market could be favourably considered?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that the general validity of observations of that kind has been acknowledged by the Turkish Government throughout the years that we have been talking about. It would be helpful in this context if some hon. Members who are always ready to criticise the Turkish Government were equally ready to give encouragement and approval when steps are taken in the right direction.

Mr. George Robertson: The Foreign Secretary cannot level an accusation at me for not giving encouragement to the small, tentative steps that have been made back towards Turkish democracy. But surely it is unacceptable that 8,000 people should still be held in military prisons by a fellow member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and that some of the curtailments of martial law should be accompanied by the suggestion of new, repressive laws. Surely that that must be met with more forthright economic sanctions from the EEC, rather than mere pious words of hope that democracy will return to Turkey.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: All these matters have to be looked at in perspective, against the situation with which the Turkish Government was originally called upon to deal. It must be recognised, for example, that some of the changes that the hon. Gentleman has been talking about have been the subject of vigorous debate and analysis in the Turkish Parliament and press in a way that would have been quite unimaginable some years back. So, progress is being made. It is right for us to keep a watchful and interested eye on this and leave the Turkish Government, as I made clear in my original answer, in no doubt about our concern.

Central America

15. Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the United States Government on the possible consequences for East-West relations of instability in Central America.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We regularly discuss the situation in Central America with the United States Administration. We share with the United States the objective of an early return to peace and stability in the region on the basis of the Contadora principles.

Sir Russell Johnston: When the Secretary of State met the President of Mexico, did he express concern about the pressure that the United States is exerting on Nicaragua? Did he, perhaps, suggest that it would have quite the opposite effect and would drive Ortega into the arms of Moscow, rather as happened with Castro? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with that analysis, and, if so, what views is he expressing to the United States Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Obviously, because of Mexico's important part in the Contadora process, the position in Central America was one of the subjects discussed with the Mexican President and, indeed, during my talks with the Mexican Foreign Minister when he was here. We were both willing, ready and enthusiastic to endorse the Contadora process, anxious to assert the principles underlying that — that the utmost restraint must be exercised on all sides in Central America—and to draw attention to those aspects of Nicaraguan policy that are causing anxiety in the region.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Does the Foreign Secretary accept that, from the point of view of Western Europe, the roles of the United States, with its massive power, and the minor power of Nicaragua—even in Central American terms—are unequal? Has not the role of the United States been almost totally unhelpful in the Contadora process? Indeed, it is almost certainly designed to sabotage that process.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: United States general policy is that it wants to see political reform and stability in Central America through peaceful means. We support that objective. We also urge on Nicaragua the need for it to avoid those actions that are causing anxiety in neighbouring states, which threaten the stability of neighbouring states, and the need for it to engage in a more genuine dialogue with all parties in the country to try to achieve more progress towards true democracy.

Mr. Forman: My right hon. and learned Friend has spoken warmly of Western European support for the Contadora process. What steps might now be available to Western European countries to make progress in that direction?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is, of course, a continuing aid relationship. We held a conference in San José in September last year. Arrangements are now being discussed for a future meeting of that kind, but not necessarily in the region, together with arrangements for a possible association agreement.

Mr. Healey: May I begin by reciprocating the right hon. and learned Gentleman's courtesy to me and congratulate him on surviving President Reagan's displeasure at his comprehensive critique of the star wars programme?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman point out to the United States Administration that by organising and financing the most inhuman type of terrorism against the citizens of a friendly state he is undermining the attempt, which I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman would support, to organise some international action against terrorism in general?

Secondly, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman point out to Mr. Shultz, who has threatened to invade Nicaragua if terrorism fails to overthrow its Government, that such an invasion would create the deepest breach between the United States and its European allies since the war and, moreover, would unite the whole of Latin America in a wave of anti-Yankee imperialism?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If we are to continue these friendly personal exchanges, I must say that it is strange for the right hon. Gentleman to congratulate me on surviving a speech that I made about two months ago. I congratulate him on having woken up and returned to our proceedings.

Of course, there is a need for restraint on all sides in the light of the present position in Central America. President Reagan recently gave a written assurance to an American Congressman that he is not seeking the military overthrow of the Sandinista Government. The American Government want political reform and stability in Central America through peaceful means. It is important that restraint should be exercised on both sides, and that Nicaragua should undertake an internal political dialogue.

European Community Policies

16. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he intends to place before his European Community partners for the development of Community policies.

Mr. Rifkind: We have made several positive proposals, including ideas for the completion of the internal market by 1992, improvements in decision-making, the development of political co-operation between the Ten, and other matters, which we look forward to discussing at the European Council in Milan.

Mr. Knox: Can my hon. Friend explain how Community economic policies can be developed while Britain remains outside the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system?

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom has not been a member of the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS for several years, and I do not believe that that has significantly held back the development of Community policies. Indeed, it is significant that the use of the ecu is more freely available in the United Kingdom than it is in many states which are members of the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS.

Dr. Owen: Will the Minister ensure that, in Milan, the Foreign Secretary or the Prime Minister raise the serious problems that are developing in southern Sudan? Food is being held up at the ports, and there are no means of getting it through by road. Is there not a great need for a European initiative to try to achieve an air lift? An EC initiative in this area would be much welcomed.

Mr. Rifkind: I cannot say whether that item will be on the agenda at Milan, but I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Community has a deep and abiding interest in Sudan and hopes to make a constructive contribution to that problem.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: At Milan, will the Prime Minister be discussing Lord Cockfield's plan for 304 changes to achieve harmonisation? May we have a clear assurance that no British Government, until they have put the case to the people, will concede any such harmonisation involving the imposition of VAT on food, and that they will not restrict their right to decide internal taxes?

Mr. Rifkind: Although we agree with the broad thrust of Lord Cockfield's proposals, we have made it clear, as have several other Governments, that the case for tax harmonisation has not been proven. We do not believe that the achievement of an internal market requires the harmonisation or approximation of taxes, and we have pointed to the example of the United States, many of whose 50 states have different direct and indirect taxes, which in no way impedes the operation of a free internal market there. I assure my hon. Friend that the Government have no intention of introducing VAT on food.

Nicaragua

17. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's current attitude toward the Government of Nicaragua; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We share the concern of many Central American states at Nicaragua's build-up of arms and increasingly close contacts with the Soviet Union and Cuba. Our future relations will depend on Nicaragua establishing genuine democracy, scaling down her armaments, and putting an end to support for subversion in the region.

Mr. Dubs: Why does the Minister persist in putting all the blame on Nicaragua? Would not our relations with Nicaragua and peace in Central America be significantly improved if the Government said categorically that they did not support the American policy of giving money to the Contras, and that they do not support President Reagan's avowed aim of getting rid of the Sandinista Government by peaceful or other means? Is that not the right policy for us?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman should be aware that the $27 million recently voted by Congress was specifically an appropriation for non-military aid to cover food, medicine, clothing and other humanitarian purposes. It is not a case of putting the blame entirely on Nicaragua. As my right hon. and learned Friend said, the emphasis of our policy and, indeed, of the policy of the Contadora group is to persuade all countries in Central America to scale down their military spending and to withdraw their forces from other countries. That is the only way to achieve peace in the region.

Sir Frederic Bennett: Is it not a fact that Nicaragua could make the best possible contribution towards a generally more acceptable atmosphere for its country if it followed the example of other dictatorships, such as Uruguay and El Salvador, and held genuinely free elections, not the sort of bogus elections, which were so bogus that Her Majesty's Government refused even to send observers to them?

Mr. Renton: Yes, Sir. One of our aims is to persuade Nicaragua to move towards a genuine pluralist democracy.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985.
2. Ports (Finance) Act 1985.
3. Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985.
4. Hill Farming Act 1985.
5. Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985.
6. Nottinghamshire County Council Act 1985.
7. King's College London Act 1985.
8. Leicestershire Act 1985.
9. Associated British Ports Act 1985.
10. Nottinghamshire County Council (Superannuation) Act 1985.

BILLS PRESENTED

SPORTING EVENTS (CONTROL OF ALCOHOL ETC.)

Mr. Secretary Brittan, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Jenkin, Mr. Secretary Ridley, Mr. Giles Shaw and Mr. Neil Macfarlane, presented a Bill to make provision for punishing those who cause or permit intoxicating liquor to be carried on public service vehicles and railway passenger vehicles carrying passengers to or from designated sporting events or who possess intoxicating liquor on such vehicles and those who possess intoxicating liquor or certain articles capable of causing injury at designated sports grounds during the period of designated sporting events, for punishing drunkenness on such vehicles and, during the period of designated sporting events, at such grounds and, where licensed premises or premises in respect of which a club is registered (for the purposes of the Licensing Act 1964) are within designated sports grounds, to make provision for regulating the sale or supply of intoxicating liquor and for the closure of bars: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 173].

TENANTS' PROTECTION (SCOTLAND)

Mr. Bruce Millan, supported by Mr. David Marshall, Mr. Jim Craigen, Mr. Michael Martin, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Gregor MacKenzie and Mr. Norman Buchan, presented a Bill to give further protection to tenants in Scotland: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 176].

WILDLIFE AND COUNTRYSIDE (SERVICE OF NOTICES)

Dr. David Clark, supported by Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Jim Callaghan, Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Peter Hardy and Dr. Mark Hughes, presented a Bill to apply section 283 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and section 269 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 to notices and other documents required or authorised to be served or given under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 174].

Environmental Pollution Information

3.34 pm

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide a public right of access to information concerning the discharge or disposal of substances into the environment and the presence of certain dangerous substances on premises, held by certain government departments and other authorities and by persons responsible for such substances; and to require certain government departments and authorities to notify those affected of hazards to their health or safety, or danger to their property likely to be caused by such substances; and to establish the office and powers of the Environmental Information Commissioner.

I apologise for the length and complexity of the long title, but I hope to show that there is need for such legislation and that my proposal would meet that need.

The aim of the Bill is to ensure that the public have access to full information about pollution of the environment and attendant risks to public health. Too often that information is treated as confidential when it need not be. Unnecessary obstacles may be placed in the way of people who want to know about environmental hazards and the corrective action that may or may not be taken to deal with them. In some cases that is because the law prevents a pollution inspector from disclosing information. In other cases, information is withheld on the grounds that it may alarm people or that people would not understand the technicalities. Inevitably, in those circumstances there is suspicion that secrecy exists to protect those who create environmental hazards or to conceal official inaction. That secrecy and the public mistrust that it can create is a problem which has long worried the Royal Commission on environmental pollution.

In 1972, the Royal Commission reported that the need for commercial secrecy seldom required information about pollution to be withheld. It therefore called for a more open approach to such matters. It has repeated that call on a number of subsequent occasions.

Although some progress has been made, when the Royal Commission published a major review last year of the availability of information on environmental pollution it concluded that unnecessary secrecy continued to frustrate legitimate inquiries and it recommended that the public should be entitled to "the fullest possible amount of information on all forms of environmental pollution, with the onus placed on the polluter to substantiate claims for exceptional treatment."

The Royal Commission went on to make the overriding recommendation that

"a guiding principle behind all legislative and adminstrative controls relating to environmental pollution should be a presumption in favour of unrestricted access for the public to information which the pollution control authorities obtain or receive by virtue of their statutory powers, with provision for secrecy only in those circumstances where a genuine case for it can be substantiated."

I am glad to say that that is a recommendation which the Government accepted in principle in paragraph 21 of their response to the 10th report of the Royal Commission, and my Bill would implement that recommendation.

The Bill provides the public with a right of access to information about pollution while exempting from disclosure some categories of information where a genuine case for confidentiality can be made out. It gives people the right to see and copy any official documents about pollution unless the document contains exempt information. It applies to information held by central and local government and by any other public authority with responsibility for pollution matters.

The Bill would enable anyone to see information, such as monitoring data, hazard assessments, research findings, cost-benefit analysis of various pollution control strategies and a wide range of other relevant material. It would also require a pollution control authority to provide information to anyone whose health or property was put seriously at risk by pollution or by the storage of dangerous chemicals. That is a duty which factory inspectors already have in relation to people at work. It seems right that the general public should benefit similarly.

Furthermore, the Bill requires that those who create pollution should disclose relevant information on request. That is necessary because it would be unrealistic and unreasonable to expect the pollution control authorities to possess complete information on all pollution problems which might arise.

Some categories of information would be exempt from disclosure. The exemptions are designed to protect four main interests. The first is the interest of national security. The disclosure of information which would jeopardise our defence or foreign relations would therefore be exempt. The second interest is that of legitimate commercial secrecy. For example, the Bill would not require the disclosure of information which might prejudice the protection of vital commercial interests, such as sensitive product testing data, or give an unfair advantage to competing firms. However, that exemption could be waived in those rare cases where the public interest in disclosure was deemed to be paramount.

The third interest is that of individual privacy. For example, information on the health of someone adversely affected by pollution would not be made publicly available. The fourth category is the interest of pollution control. Polluters would not be able to use the legislation to gain advance notice of what should otherwise be an unannounced inspection by the relevant pollution control authority.

Equally, pollution control authorities might sometimes depend upon information given to them voluntarily and in confidence but which they have no legal power to demand. It would, therefore, be unwise to require them to disclose such information if as a result that information was no longer forthcoming. However, where the authority has the legal power to require the information or where there is a positive incentive for a firm to supply it—for example, if this is done in return for the granting of a licence or to influence draft legislation — the public disclosure is unlikely to cause the supplier to withhold it and the information would, therefore, not be exempt.

In cases of dispute the Bill provides for the establishment of an environmental information commissioner with legal powers to ensure that the legislation is enforced and with the power to require or prevent disclosure in a particular case. However, there would also be a right of appeal to the High Court on a point of law.

In connection with wider considerations, I stress that the Bill provides a legal right of access to information which can be enforced by the commissioner if the authorities fail to comply. It does not leave disclosure simply to the discretion or good will of the pollution control authorities. Experience has shown that the latter approach is not adequate.

For example, the English water authorities have decided to make use of their newly acquired discretion to exclude the public from their meetings. The local authorities have power under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 to obtain information about air pollution in their area. Any information so obtained must be published. However, in practice most local authorites obtain such information informally without using their powers and thereby circumvent the obligation to publish the data.

I stress that the Bill will provide what the Royal Commission has called for — unrestricted access to information held by pollution control authorities. That is not the same as specifying one or two items of information which will be available, perhaps on a register, while leaving the rest of the information as difficult to obtain as before.

We want to get away from the approach suggested by the Health and Safety Commission in its recent discussion document. It suggested that access should be given only to very limited information held by Health and Safety Executive inspectors, that disclosure should normally be at the discretion of the employers, that information should be available only to those with a demonstrable "need to know", and that instead of full access to complete data the public should make do with "some relatively simple account of the type of hazard which might occur."

I hope that the House will agree that the HSC approach is unsatisfactory and that progress along the lines of my Bill would be infinitely preferable for the cause of environmental protection.

The Government make clear in paragraph 22 of their response to the 10th report of the Royal Commission that they also hope to find a uniform way of implementing the commission's recommendations on confidentiality. The search for such a uniform regime is now the responsibility of an interdepartmental working party which will have to report to Ministers by the end of the year.

I stress that the Government have taken a positive line throughout and remain firmly committed to the principle of greater openness in environmental matters. I am also glad to say that I have received messages of support for the Bill from the National Consumer Protection Council and the National Association of Local Councils.

A uniform regime on confidentiality would be achieved by my Bill since it applies equally to all bodies with official responsibility for controlling pollution. At present there are too many anomalies. Some pollution control authorities are required to disclose certain information about discharges, others are prohibited by law from doing so. Employees have explicit statutory rights to information about work place hazards, but the general public is often denied that information even when equally at risk.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that he has been speaking for just over 10 minutes.

Mr. Forman: I am coming to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker.

My Bill would also be of benefit to the pollution control authorities themselves since they are sometimes exposed to needless criticism because of the restrictions on disclosure prevent them from explaining properly the steps which they have taken to control a pollution problem

However, my Bill's most vital contribution would be to enable people to find out for themselves the risks which they face from pollution, to discover whether everything necessary has been done to control it, and to press for greater public protection where it is necessary. I therefore hope that the House will approve my initiative and will give me leave to introduce the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Nigel Forman, Sir Hugh Rossi, Sir Bernard Braine, Mr. Sydney Chapman, Mr. Kenneth Warren, Mr. Nicholas Lyell, Mr. Kenneth Carlisle, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mrs. Virginia Bottomley, Mr. Derek Conway, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory and Dr. Ian Twinn.

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION INFORMATION

Mr. Nigel Forman accordingly presented a Bill to provide a public right of access to information concerning the discharge or disposal of substances into the environment and the presence of certain dangerous substances on premises, held by certain government departments and other authorities and by persons responsible for such substances; and to require certain government departments and authorities to notify those affected of hazards to their health or safety, or danger to their property likely to be caused by such substances; and to establish the office and powers of the Environmental Information Commissioner: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 175.]

Orders of the Day

Food and Environment Protection Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 15

CONTROL OF PESTICIDES ETC.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 15, line 14, after 'effect', insert '(a)'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 22, 26 and 56.

Mrs. Fenner: The Committee had a full and detailed debate about the public disclosure of information relating to pesticides during which I explained at some length the Government's intentions. In the drafting of subsections (2) (j) and (5) of clause 15 the Government believed that they had struck the right balance between the public interest in access to information and the protection of the commercial interests of those who supply the information. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) raised this very issue when introducing a few minutes ago his Bill on environmental pollution information. I have no doubt that the balance is weighted in favour of public access, but the feeling in Committee was that more could be done in the Bill to favour the public interest as the Royal Commission recommended.

The Government have reflected carefully and in response have tabled the amendment to the first subsection of clause 15 on the general purposes of this part of the Bill. If accepted, the amendment would have the effect that the following provisions of part III

"would have effect with a view to making information about pesticides available to the public".

This would apply to safety data about chemicals and to other information and to information about the controls exercised over pesticides in the Bill. I believe that this addition to clause 15 further strengthens the presumption in favour of public access. We cannot adopt the Royal Commission's use of the term "unrestricted access" in a legal statute because that would nullify the effect of subsection (5), which protects the legitimate interest of manufacturers. Again, that is an issue to which my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington referred in introducing his Bill.

We are moving public information into the highest category of purpose of the Bill, which, because of the widespread public concern about pesticides, is the appropriate place. Moreover, we are maintaining the balance between the public interest and the respect for commercial interests in the body of clause 15. That seems to us to be a significant improvement.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Minister explain the difference between summaries and the general principle of far wider access to all the information that is made available? What is the Government's position on that consideration?

Mrs. Fenner: We believe that the public's access to information should have a high priority and should be an integral part of these provisions. By moving the relevant provisions to the first part of part III we have highlighted the emphasis that we attach to the principle. The Government believed that they had struck a perfect balance between subsection (2)(j) and subsection (5), but it was made clear in Committee that those considering the Bill felt that something more could be done to emphasise the importance that is attached to public access to information. It is in that spirit that we have moved the emphasis on public access to the beginning of part III to make it the top priority.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for that explanation, which was suitably brief. I am also grateful to the Government for accepting the principle of the three amendments moved in Committee, Nos 98, 99 and 100, which we think were of great significance to the Bill. The Government could easily have reversed the three amendments, and those of us who voted in favour of them in Committee are grateful that they have been retained, more or less as they are. We congratulate the Government on their wisdom.

Clause 15(1) is an important part of the Bill. As the Bill is now, subsection (a) speaks of the need "to protect the health of human beings".

That can be understood, but my hon. Friend's amendment will mean that there will be two subsections lettered (a). That will serve only to make a complex Bill more complex.

Apart from that, I welcome what my hon. Friend has tried to do. We are grateful to her for preserving the spirit and the quality of amendments tabled in Committee. However, I ask my hon. Friend to give some clarity to the drafting of these amendments.

Mr. Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I always want to be helpful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, and I hope that she will think that by tabling amendment No. 56 I am being so. She gave an impressive television performance recently in which, in answer to a journalist, Penny Junor, in a programme on Thames Television, she said that when regulations come out, it is her wish that all the details will be available. I hope that we can move in that direction. I am not suggesting by my amendment that we should have all the details, but we can go a little further in trying to reconcile the interests of the public and those of the manufacturers.

I had a discussion with the director of the British Agrochemicals Association only yesterday. He assured me that he supported my amendment, which goes rather further than that on which my hon. Friend is anxious that the House should agree.

It must be in the interests of the public to be able to see the data submitted by the manufacturer about the safety of the pesticides and their effect on the environment. When I speak of the public, I put in a word for our working farmers, who deal every day with pesticides. There is growing anxiety among them about the pesticides and to what extent they should use certain of them. That anxiety is increased when they read about how other countries forbid the use of the very pesticides that they are using. Therefore, it is right that a small organisation with which I am associated, the Smallfarmers Association, should have access to the data in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and then be able to engage its own scientists to investigate that data to see to what extent the testing has been carried out satisfactorily.

Equally, it is in the interests of the manufacturers that rivals, particularly countries such as Korea and Thailand, which are getting into the pesticide business, should not be guilty of piracy. Therefore, my amendment is couched in such a way as to ensure that there can be no piracy, nor any danger to any manufacturer. I would welcome my hon. Friend's comments on that. That would enable those concerned, either on behalf of farmers or environmental lobbies — even doctors, because many of them are concerned about this—to have access to the data so that they can assess it.

My hon. Friend may say that it is intended to produce monographs on these different pesticides that will give a summary of the data, but that will not be enough. I am sure that she will realise that. They will not recite the methodology or the kinds of tests that have been carried out, nor will they give details of the sorts of animals that have been used.

My hon. Friend knows that the tests on these pesticides are almost entirely carried out on rats and mice. If the pesticide is mutagenic, we must know whether the tests have been carried out for at least two years on three generations of rats and mice. One will not know whether a pesticide is mutagenic unless such data are given.

I understand that what is made available by the Ministry will not include that information. If a pesticide is carcinogenic, the tests must be carried out for a certain time. We must also question whether, if it is carcinogenic in respect of rats or mice, it will be the same on humans. I do not want to repeat the thalidomide story, but that was tested on rats and was perfectly satisfactory, yet we know only too well what the effect was on humans.

There is a question mark over the use of only rats or mice when testing such pesticides. The public should therefore be told what animals are being used so that they can judge the extent to which the tests are valid.

I stress that, because in the United States, as my hon. Friend knows only too well, people are beginning to realise that by themselves tests on rats and mice are not sufficient and that other tests should be carried out. The Minister and I know that a number of pesticides have been called into question in the United States and will now be prohibited, yet their use will still be allowed in this country. Is there a difference in testing between the United States and the United Kingdom? How will we know if all we are to get are monographs? Will they contain the kind of information that will be sufficient to enable people to pass their own independent judgment?

My hon. Friend will be familiar with the name of Professor A. E. M. McLean, who until recently was a member of the scientific sub-committee of the Government's own Advisory Committee on Pesticides. I hope that his views will not be dismissed as those of a crank but will be acknowledged as the views of someone who has had an inside knowledge of the subject. Professor McLean was joint author of a book entitled "Safety Testing of New Drugs. Laboratory Predictions and Clinical Performance", which was published only last year. He said:

[Mr. Richard Body]

"the ordinary criterion of scientific reliability (that the results are reproducible in other laboratories) does not operate".

He added:

"When the methodology of conventional test procedures is discussed it becomes evident that quite small differences in procedure can have large effects on the outcome, and so on the inferences which may be drawn from them".

The Parliamentary Secretary will appreciate, therefore, that the summaries will be useless to the public, to farmers and to the members of environmental groups and others who want to probe these issues unless they have some understanding of the methodology and what led up to the data being provided. Unless that information is forthcoming, we shall not satisfactorily solve the problem.

Let us suppose that the boot were on the other foot and a manufacturer, having produced a new type of pesticide, had to have it tested by an agency of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Let us suppose that the Ministry then published only a summary of the data, such as that which my hon. Friend has in mind. What, then, would be the feelings of the manufacturer? Say that the new pesticide was condemned by the Ministry and the manufacturer was not permitted to obtain the full data comparable to what I have in mind should be disclosed to the general public. The manufacturer would be in an impossible position.

The United States has its Freedom of Information Act. We have the chance now to go to Washington and find out the full details of how the same pesticides have been tested in that country. Indeed, officers of Friends of the Earth tell me that they have been to America and seen the very data that they will not be allowed to see in Britain.

I fear that the Government's not allowing the same information to be available here—remembering that we are concerned with circumstances in which some pesticides forbidden in the United States will be permitted here—will cause ugly statements to be made, and such a state of affairs will not be helpful to anyone.

I hope, therefore, that the Minister will give careful consideration to my amendment No. 56 and will agree that, if it is right that people in the US should have this information, it is right for the people of Britain to have it. It is wrong that we should have to cross the Atlantic and go to Washington to get the sort of information that should be available to us here. If it is not made available, the worst suspicions will be aroused, and I fear that we in Parliament will not do well as a result.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I apologise in advance for the fact that I shall have to leave at 4.15 to attend a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, where I wish to deal with an important item on the agenda. I shall then return to the Chamber, but I may miss the Minister's speech in reply to this amendment.

Like the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body), I fear that the Bill, in the way in which it will be amended, will not clarify the position and may, instead, disguise the intention of the Government. The result will be that the public will be denied information about pesticides. The Government amendment contains the words

"with a view to making information about pesticides available to the public".

What it does not say, but should say—because that is the intention—is that it will be restricted information. All the information available to the Department will not be made available to the public. In Committee, the Parliamentary Secretary said:

"I assure the Committee that we shall seek to ensure that the public will have every opportunity to judge for themselves whether the Government have reached a reasonable decision about a chemical . . . information will not be kept under wraps unnecessarily."

Who will decide on what is unnecessarily being kept under wraps? Will it not be the Department? It is unreasonable that those who wish access to information will be denied the right to determine whether something should be made available. A bureaucrat will take the decision.

It was clear from the debate in Committee that there are divisions of opinion about what should constitute information being "kept under wraps unnecessarily." The Government are totally misreading the representations of Campaign for Freedom of Information, the environmental groups and all others interested in these issues. They are demanding that full information be made available.

In Committee, the Minister said:

"it is our intention to ensure that the information released will enable an informed judgment to be made by the public". — [Official Report, Standing Committee H, 30 April 1985; c. 334.]

What does the Minister regard as an "informed judgment"? What she regards as an informed judgment may not be what environmental groups and researchers believe it to be. All the time we are leaving subjective judgments to be made by officials who make recommendations to Ministers. The Minister is misreading the sense of environmental outrage that is felt by the public on this issue.

We dealt at length in Committee with the position in America. I pointed out that the Environmental Protection Agency there found that IBT — Industrial Biotest Laboratories — had fabricated data. Some of those studies were submitted in the United Kingdom and were accepted by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides, and decisions were taken based on the ACP's recommendations. The same officials will decide to what extent information should be restricted.

The Minister should take on board the American experience and ensure that United Kingdom researchers are given full access to information. After all, often no alternative information about hazards is available.

That information should be available, for example, to those concerned with the effects of pesticides on their employees and to persons affected by spraying. Otherwise, it will be difficult for them to obtain information relevant to the problems with which they must deal and with which doctors are concerned. Indeed, medical practitioners may wish to research into the effects of certain products. They should not be denied information which is available to the Department but which will be under lock and key.

The full disclosure of safety data under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rhodenticide Act in America works well. FIFRA has shown that it is possible to combine full disclosure with the protection of commercial interests. The amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Holland with Boston would not alter a company's indefinite right to the exclusive use of such data.

To deny information on the ground that the public is not competent to make correct use of it is unacceptable. The British Agrochemical Association accepts the principle of "the right to know." Disclosure would increase public confidence, prevent amateur research being carried out by other organisations and, to some extent, prevent the need for duplication of research. Public anxiety increases when people are denied the facts.

Even at this late stage, the Parliamentary Secretary, should heed the substantial representations that are being made by people inside and outside the House. In particular, she should heed the remarks of her hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, who has great knowledge of these matters. He is in contact, through an organisation representing small farmers with which he is associated, with many people in Britain who are involved with the use of pesticides. I am sure that he brings to the House through that association the value of their experience.

All Committee Members received persistent demands from a number of organisations to set up a more open regime with respect to freedom of information. The Parliamentary Secretary must respond to those demands and be fair.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The Government should accept the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body). I pay tribute to the Government for responding to pressure and to the other place for having moved forward. They have accepted that there should be a move towards giving people the right to know about pesticides.

The Parliamentary Secretary's words a fortnight ago on television are important because they highlight not only the possible advantages of the Government's amendments but the gap that will exist if we go only as far as the amendments take us. The hon. Lady said:

"The Bill empowers Ministers to make information available to the general public regarding the safety of pesticides."

She went on to say:

"The details will all be available."

Those two statements are not consistent. Government amendment No. 22 states:

"with a view to making information about pesticides available to the public".

The criteria are set out, but the Government retain the right to determine exactly what will or will not be included in that information. If the Parliamentary Secretary is to give the House the assurance that she gave the nation via television—

"The details will all be available"—

she must logically accept the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston. It provides that information will become available automatically and naturally and not simply in a conditional sense because of what the Government's regulations impose.

Mr. Body: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that my amendment does not go as far as the statement on television by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary? I am only going 90 per cent. of the distance.

Mr. Hughes: Yes. We are constrained by the fact that the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston goes as far as we shall be able to go today. He has imposed a condition too. He has restricted disclosure relating to commercial interests, for reasons that I understand although I may not entirely share them. If the Parliamentary Secretary accepted that premise, we would be making progress. She said that she was satisfied "that the preponderance is on making information available to the general public."

We must not have battles year after year when Governments always resist and have to be dragged through the hedgerows until they are forced to give a concession. Countries that learned democracy from us have long before us established the right to know. The High Court has decided that councillors have the right to know. That means that not only officials but the people who are concerned with the issues have the right to know. They include farmers, business men, researchers and legislators. I ask the Government to say that those people need to know now.

I give one bizarre and important example which shows how ridiculous the position is. I am told that research is being conducted in London university on lemons sold in shops in London. After they are harvested, a fungicide called hydroxydiphenyl 2 is sprayed on them. That fungicide is governed by World Health Organisation limits, because it is dangerous when used above a certain limit. WHO says that the acceptable limit for that fungicide is 10 parts per million. The fungicide on lemons sold in London shops regularly measures 200 parts per million.

4.15 pm

This is what happens to the lemons. They are harvested and then scrubbed to remove the pesticide. They then look a little withered and as though they will not appeal to the consumer, so they are dipped into a wax fungicide mixture to make them yellow, shiny and appealing. When one washes those lemons there is no problem because the fungicide does not react in any way. The water runs off them because the skin is protected. However, if one regularly dips a lemon into one's gin and tonic, alcohol causes a chemical reaction.

One might need to drink a few gins and tonics in a day for this to have any effect. I may have vices, but that is not one of them, although there may be some hon. Members present who are worried about this information. The chemical reaction dissolves the wax and releases the fungicide into that drink at nearly 20 times the recognised international level.

This research was conducted by an eminent and respected group of people at London university who thought that they should ascertain whether the Ministry knew about this. They telephoned the Ministry and asked about its findings. The answer was, "I am sorry. We cannot tell you. It is governed by the Official Secrets Act." Here were researchers offering the Government information, which may save Conservatives more than any others by protecting them when over-indulging in gin and tonic —yet the Government could not say whether they were researching the same issue.

That is an amusing example, but it is an example of a fundamental point. If science is to be of benefit to our society, it must be of benefit to everyone in our society and not selectively of benefit to those who take unto themselves the rights that go with being in the Civil Service.

I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to give the House an assurance in exactly the same terms as the assurance that she gave on television and consider what the Government would do to go even further than the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston.

Amendment No. 26 provides that, on payment of "reasonable fees", information will be made available. I accept that there must be a reasonable fee, but the Parliamentary Secretary knows that we are again considering the question of definition. What is "reasonable"? It is clear that, since the last stage of this Bill was considered, the Treasury has been at work on it. We are considering several small amendments that quietly emanated from the Treasury and add little money-recouping measures. This is one of them. I do not object to the Treasury suggesting that a reasonable fee is required. Of course we must pay for photocopying and the like, but we cannot have fees that reflect the cost of the work going on and partly pay for the research and the officials. They are there anyway. The officials' time is given in the public service, for which they are paid. Members of the public, who may not be on big salaries paid by the British Agrochemicals Association or any other firm, need to be assured that we are talking about matters of pence, not pounds, and that the fees are reasonable at all stages. If the Government are committed to access and to freedom of information, they must not put up barriers, whether of cost or of bureaucracy.

I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to think again and ask her—reflecting in the glory that she is partly enjoying by having pulled her Government from resistance to a welcome of freedom of information—to go the whole way and do the job properly.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The hon. Members for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who spoke in a most amusing fashion, have identified one lacuna. I want to touch briefly on another omission, although I welcome the measure as it is at least a move towards freedom of information. It touches on the question of public confidence and the processes by which we come to decisions on pesticides which are covered in the Bill and which have been established for some time.

I refer in particular to the constitution of the advisory committee. In a written question to the Minister in column 58 of Hansard on 18 June this year, I asked her in what way declarations of interest on the advisory committee are stated. This is relevant because the amendment states that information about pesticides is required to be made available to the public. I point out to the Minister that it is also important to have information about the decision-making process made available to the public. This is a matter of concern to me and, I believe, to other hon. Members, and I hope that the Minister will see fit to touch on it. With regard to the declaration of interests by members of the advisory committee, the members at present are required only to sign a piece of paper which says:

"I have no commercial interest which might make it undesirable for me to receive confidential trade information."

In relation to freedom of information, it seems curious to me that members are not required to make——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Will the hon. Gentleman tell me to which amendment his remarks relate? I find it difficult to see such a link.

Mr. Ashdown: It is amendment No. 22,

"with a view to making information about pesticides available to the public".

My case is that this should include information about the way in which the decisions on pesticides are made. It is on that matter that I wish the Minister to comment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is difficult to see the relationship between the two that the hon. Gentleman draws.

Mr. Ashdown: I ask the Minister to consider accepting as more appropriate amendment No. 56 tabled by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston, which is broader and may well allow for members of the advisory committee on pesticides to nominate their interests in a more specifc fashion. We are dealing with decisions taken in secret about products which could cost £1 million to bring to market. It is important that members of the public should have full confidence in how the decisions are taken. Therefore, a broader declaration of interest would be more appropriate if the Minister is indeed interested in following through full freedom of information effectively in the Bill.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): It is necessary to comment only shortly upon the debate, in view of the long discussion on the subject in Committee.

We started from the premise that as full information on pesticides as possible should be available on the basis that public concern relates to the concealment of information. This gives rise to fears which, although they may be groundless to the experts, are nevertheless real because members of the public are unable to comprehend fully.

I welcome amendments Nos. 21 and 22 as a move from what is provided in clause 15(5), dwelling exclusively upon confidentiality and commercial considerations, towards a presumption that full information shall be available.

I understand the fears expressed by hon. Members about the face of the Bill, but we must be clear that the mechanism provided by the Bill on this matter, as on so much else, is little evident on the face of the Bill. Little on the face of the Bill is adequately covered by amendment No. 22. Regulations will follow under clause 15(2)(j) which will provide for the type of information required. I believe that here we must be vigilant to ensure that summaries are not perfunctory and the information provided is not sketchy. We must ensure that the sort of information mentioned by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston is incorporated in those regulations. It will be for us at the stage of consideration of the Government regulations to make sure that that is so.

I am glad that the Government earlier in Committee stated that hon. Members would be involved in the consultation process on the draft regulations and would be able to make the necessary representations. I believe that, if we are not satisfied with the draft regulations, we will make those representations.

What is included on the face of the Bill is a major step forward. For the first time in consideration of the Bill the Government are saying that the provisions shall have the effect of providing information. In my view, that general statement of intent must be followed up by adequate information being provided for in the regulations. Parliament will scrutinise the regulations closely and, if they are inadequate, will be accordingly critical. I believe that the fullest information possible should be available and the exemptions allowing secrecy should be kept to a minimum. The public will be more reassured by information being available than they will by its being hidden.

Secondly, I wish to take up the point made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). It is one thing to have information available, but it is another if it is available, as some farming booklets are, at a price of approximately £15. Price can be a determinant of how widely knowledge is disseminated. If there is an entry of the type mentioned by one of my hon. Friends in the case of the Environmental Protection Agency in America dealing with particular chemicals, that should be done at as nominal a sum as possible. I underline that, although I am sure that the Government have it in mind. In this way, those who are interested in obtaining the information will have it freely and without undue expense.

I welcome the Government's amendments on this matter as meeting a point that was widely canvassed in Committee as a source of anxiety.

Mrs. Fenner: I welcome the acceptance of the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) of amendments Nos. 21 and 22 and the motives of the Government in tabling them. The amendments make clear the purpose of the Bill. Concern has been expressed that the purpose should be made clearer, and that the amendments seek to do. I understand that hon. Members will scrutinise the regulations carefully to be sure that they live up to that objective.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body). I had intended to refer to amendment No. 26 to try to prevent a misunderstanding of the kind which has arisen in the mind of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). I am glad that the hon. Member for Pontypridd understands what we are trying to do.

The amendment to clause 15(2)(j) is a technical one to enable Ministers to recover the costs of copying and postage, if necessary, from those who request information about pesticides. The Government's intention is to provide in part III a measure similar to that already contained in the last three lines of paragraph 13 of part II. Parliamentary counsel have drafted the amendment with some care to ensure that the provision covers only the incidental costs of providing copies of the document. I assure the Committee that this will not have the effect of inhibiting the public's access to information. Equally, we must not run the risk of becoming an unlimited source of free material at public expense.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston, who has tried to table an amendment that meets the needs of all concerned with disclosure of information. Amendment No. 56 is admirably drafted, but it has one serious disadvantage from the Government's point of view. The amendment does not provide for the release of raw data, but our advice is that Ministers will be constrained to provide access to raw data to anybody who requests it. I explained in Committee that it would involve great administrative effort and that the advantage would in practice be small. The amendment would prevent the provision of summaries of data.

4.30 pm

I have already explained that summaries have been prepared for the meeting of the advisory committee. They include methodology, details of tests, the different kinds of animals and periods of time. Carcinogenicity, mutagenicity and teratogenicity are described in the summaries, and the questions surrounding pesticides are also listed. Therefore, I assure him that the summaries include all the details that he said are not included. They are lengthy, amounting to about 20 pages.

The Freedom of Information Campaign agrees with the Government that the summaries would satisfy the overwhelming majority of inquiries. The raw data on each approved product stand about 3 ft high. It would be a waste of time and effort to make that information available to everybody. Access to raw data may be of use to those engaged in research, and we are prepared to consider granting access to it if a scientific case can be established. We shall discuss the matter when we consult all the relevant interests about the proposals.

The Bill would not prevent either this Government or any other Government from providing access to raw data. I have explained the problem of providing an extreme degree of public access to raw data. My hon. Friend's amendment constrains Ministers to provide access to raw data to anybody who requests it. I hope that I have reassured him about the contents of the summaries and that he will therefore withdraw his amendment.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey made a serious point about lemons in London. The pesticide residue working group survey found that lemons in London have exceeded the codex limit of 10 parts per million. Between 1981 and 1984 the level occasionally found was 18 ppm. However, hon. Members who consume large quantities of gin and tonic are much more likely to contract cirrhosis of the liver and to be put at risk than they are if they consume lemons.

Mr. Simon Hughes: It appears that research shows that there may be other sale points at which the danger level is much higher. Can the Minister assure the House that it will be provided with that information, whether in the form of raw data or a summary, before the Bill is enacted so that protection may be provided?

Mrs. Fenner: We monitor residue levels not only in individual items but in the complete diet. The levels found over many years have been well below the level that is internationally regarded as safe, and the levels are declining. The Bill provides for action to be taken on residue levels.

I appreciate hon. Members' difficulty about understanding how far the Government have moved on this issue. I become a little agitated when I am told that I am being dragged screaming into the 20th century. We have sought to enact a good Bill. The Government are not being dragged into the 20th century. The legisation permits disclosure in full about safety data, but in practice that must be subject to consultation and practical considerations—how long it will take, how much it will cost and how much information is required. We must attempt to reach consensus within the ordinary practical constraints of commercial secrecy. We shall make available all the information that is necessary to reassure the public about the safety of the pesticide in question.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 22, in page 15, line 19, at end insert—

'and (b) with a view to making information about pesticides available to the public;'.—[Mrs. Fenner.]

Mrs. Fenner: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 15, line 19, at end insert—

[Mrs. Fenner]

'and references in this Part of this Act to the general purposes of this Part of this Act are references to the purposes mentioned in this subsection.'.

Mr. Deupty Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 30 and 44.

Mrs. Fenner: These are purely drafting amendments. Their effect will be to remove subsection (8) from clause 17 and to insert it at the end of clause 15, to remove superfluous words from subsection (7) in clause 15, and to provide drafting improvements that are consequential upon the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body).

Amendment agreed to.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 15, line 41, at end insert—

'(ff) provide for the payment of compensation to beekeepers who incur financial loss as a result of the use of pesticides;'.

This amendment tries to create a statutory compensation scheme for beekeepers who incur financial loss by using pesticides. In Committee and on Report we have spent many hours talking about birds. It is perhaps appropriate that we are now talking about bees. They are very much affected by the misuse — I emphasise the word "misuse"—of pesticides.

Bees are a valuable national asset. They provide us with a considerable amount of honey and serve a useful agricultural purpose. It is therefore in the interest of nobody that bees should be killed by pesticides. Nevertheless, there are about 36,000 colonies of bees in this country and according to the Beekeepers Association there are between 100 and 200 incidents each year of bees being affected by pesticides. About 1 per cent. of beehives are affected each year by pesticide poisoning. We ought to try to reduce it and, if it occurs, we ought to be able to offer compensation to the beekeepers. Aerial spraying in particular is responsible for poisoning bees and causing most of the damage.

Another cause for concern is the increase in the cultivation of oilseed rape. If oilseed rape is incorrectly sprayed, many more bees die. We are aware that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food issues guidance to both beekeepers and farmers each year and urges the farmers to keep to a code of conduct.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): If I heard the hon. Gentleman aright, he was talking about the spraying of oilseed rape and the fact that many bees die. Surely he would acknowledge, though, that the vast acreage of oilseed rape that is now grown is of direct benefit to beekeepers. Indeed, much honey now comes from oilseed rape, although it is not as tasty as honey from lime trees and other sources.

Dr. Clark: I did make the point that I was talking about the misuse of pesticides. If the hon. Gentleman wants to follow that particular analogy, looking at the benefits to beekeepers of oilseed rape, I would refer him to a very useful article in Farmers Weekly of 12 April by a beekeeper who produces a great amount of honey from oilseed rape. However, without going into the technical aspects, as the hon. Member knows, one should not spray oilseed rape when it is in flower because that is the time when the bees are killed. I am very much aware of the point raised.

It is worrying that bees are killed, but what is perhaps also worrying is the great difficulty that beekeepers have in claiming compensation. I will quote a particular case to the House because it exemplifies the problem very clearly. It concerns a Mr. Houldey of Hartpury in Gloucestershire. I know that the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), who is here today and has been of assistance to Mr. Houldey, will not mind my quoting the case because I think he accepts that it raises a very serious point.

Mr. Houldey has had a number of spraying incidents. In 1984 alone, in four separate incidents, he lost 47 hives of bees. He estimates his total financial loss to be about £9,000. The interesting point is that, in spite of the fact that Mr. Houldey received compensation in one case, in one of the other cases the contractor was successfully prosecuted but compensation was still refused by the NFU Mutual Insurance Company, which said to Mr. Houldey, "Sue us." Of course, no small farmer or beekeeper is going to take on a massive insurance company; he just has not got the financial assets to risk. I think it is a matter of shame that the NFU Mutual Insurance Company, which by and large has a very good reputation, is refusing to pay compensation in this case.

I raised that example to show the difficulties that beekeepers face. The difficulties come from two main points: first, the failure of farmers, but mainly of contractors, to give notice and to abide by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service recommendations and code of conduct; and, secondly, the question of getting compensation even when the claimant is able to bring a successful case for compensation.

We believe that there is need to compensate beekeepers. We emphasise that we wish that the code of practice and the Ministry of Agriculture recommendations were more strictly adhered to by contractors and farmers. However, we accept that accidents will happen and that there will be misuse of pesticides. We believe that in such cases there should be compensation paid to the beekeepers, and that is what we call for in this amendment.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government cannot accept this amendment, which singles out one sector of the community for right to compensation in law. Such a provision might prejudice the position of others, if they found themselves in dispute with users of pesticides.

The proper course of action for such grievances is to seek redress in the courts, and I know from a recent case that aggrieved beekeepers have been successful in such actions. The case to which I refer was brought to court before we introduced this legislation to enable Ministers to control use of statute. In finding against the farmer, the judge relied on the considerable advice already made available to users of pesticides both from my Department and from the pesticide manufacturer about the effects of pesticides on bees. I shall explain the action taken by my Department in this area.

4.45 pm

When pesticides intended for use in agriculture are submitted for clearance under the PSPS, information on their toxicity to bees is invariably taken into account. By their very nature most insecticides are toxic to bees to a greater or lesser extent; but an unacceptable level of risk would in itself be sufficient grounds for denying a particular clearance. Such decisions have been taken in the past. The withdrawal of clearance in 1978 for the aerial application of triazophos to oilseed rape was such a case. Cleared products may carry labels with warning phrases, such as "Dangerous/harmful to bees. Do not apply at flowering stage. Keep down flowering weeds."

To back up the warnings on product labels, my Department provides a great deal of advice to farmers and growers about the use of these pesticides. We give warnings on the general incidence of pest attack and the circumstances in which spraying should be, or is unlikely to be, cost-effective. When we advise that spraying is worth while we recommend farmers to use wherever practicable pesticides that are least toxic to bees, to spray early in the morning or late in the evening, when bee activity is minimal, and generally to take care and to think of others when spraying. We issue a considerable amount of publicity literature. All this is supplemented by advice to individual farmers.

Furthermore, our scientists are ready to investigate any incidents involving the suspected poisoning of bees by pesticides whenever the beekeeper concerned is able to provide a sample of the bees for chemical analysis. The Ministry also arranges meetings at both the national and the local level between representatives of the National Farmers Union, the beekeepers associations and spraying contractors. Our objective is to get the people involved to discuss common problems and to agree on the measures necessary to prevent bee losses from crop spraying. I believe that advice, consultation and communication are the best way to ensure that growers and beekeepers are aware of each other's problems and needs and aware of how to co-exist.

Our legislation will add another dimension. During our consultations on its implementation we shall need to consider very carefully how to protect bees by legal control — for example, by making application at the flowering stage of certain crops an offence. But this is the kind of detailed control on which we must consult all interests affected, so I speak without commitment.

I hope that with this explanation the hon. Gentleman will feel able to withdraw this amendment.

Dr. David Clark: I must admit that I find the last comment from the Minister very helpful and I take the point that she is talking only about the possibility. If the Ministry of Agriculture is about to consider that possibility in the future, that is somewhat reassuring. There has been movement in law and in the case to which the Minister referred—which I think was a case in Sussex where a number of beekeepers combined and were paid damages of about £7,000 for loss of honey crops — the High Court judge did clarify the ruling as to what exactly a bee was, whether a bee was trespassing, and so on. I think that as a result we have moved forward.

I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 16, line 21, at end insert

'and to payment of such reasonable fees for furnishing copies as the Ministers may with the consent of the Treasury determine,'.

Mrs. Fenner: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 17, line 16, leave out

'when consulted in accordance with subsection (9) below, and'

and insert

', either when requested to do so or otherwise,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 29.

Mrs. Fenner: These amendments are minor drafting improvements suggested by the parliamentary draftsman to the new subsection 15(7), which was adopted in Committee. My hon. Friend said in Committee that they might be necessary and I hope that the House will accept them.

Sir John Farr: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for tabling this minor amendment and also for her letter to me on this matter. There is certainly no weakening of the Committee's intention in the amendment. The key to the amendments made in Committee was that the advisory committee should offer advice upon matters that concerned it without being asked, and that has been preserved intact. The House regards that as an important point, and it probably deals with some of the points that we discussed earlier about the provision of information and so on. If the advisory committee feels that additional information should be made available, it can proffer advice to the Minister without being asked. Therefore, I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what she has been able to do.

Amendment agreed to.

No. 30, in page 17, line 20, leave out

Mr. John: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 17, line 26, at end insert—

'(aa) as to the extent and implications of resistance to pesticides among pests in Britain;'.

This amendment brings us back to a point that was raised in Committee, but which, for one reason or another, was not responded to in full.

For a long time there has been considerable anxiety that the very objects for which pesticides are designed are developing immunity to them. Therefore, the pesticides which in minute quantities could kill and control the pests, can no longer do so.

The Royal Commission on environmental pollution mentioned that factor, but said that it found it difficult to get an exact picture of both the seriousness and the scope of the problem. Many scientists throughout the world are concerned that constant use of pesticides is developing strains of pests immune to their toxicity. There is anxiety that what I call the first world war mentality—that is, if there is resistance we put forth even more to overcome that resistance, which develops more resistance—should be avoided at all costs.

The Ministry acknowledged the problem but put it on the governmental back burner by saying that, although there was a problem, it would not occur until the end of the century. But, of course, even the end of the century is only 15 years away and we are talking about a development of other sources of pest control that are effective during that short time.

I think that we all agree that pesticides should be used at the minimum level consistent with being effective. Because there is resistance to a certain pesticide, we do not want to engender the philosophy that the farmer should add a little extra in the hope that it will kill the blighters.

[Mr. John]

The Minister said that there were 25 strains resistant to 28 pesticides. We have also been told that both fungicides and herbicides are finding resistant strains. The Farmers Weekly on 15 March noted:

"Earlier drilling of winter cereal and widespread use of fungicides may lead to a sudden rise in MBC-resistant eyespot."

People are worried because in the ADAS eastern region the resistant strains had risen by 90 per cent. in the year 1984-85. There are similar quantum leaps in resistance in other crops.

The Big Farm Weekly of 11 April said:

"The first signs of herbicide resistance in blackgrass have been recorded by scientists at the Weed Research Organisation, Oxford."

When I was looking at the fairly daunting forecasts for the size of this year's harvest—that is, if we ever get any warm weather—the problem of blackgrass was central to the question of cereals. Blackgrass is now becoming resistant to herbicides, so a major problem is arising.

The amendment seeks to ensure that the Ministry consults the advisory committee about pesticides so that it can express its view on this increasing problem. There is no doubt that a resistance will occur, that it will take different forms, that it will apply to a wider spectrum of crops and that it will cause many problems.

In Committee, a similar amendment was moved as one of a large group. I am sure that that is why the Minister replied to it with less than her usual thoroughness. I counted about six lines in Hansard—and I was being generous—when I read her reply. But such is the importance of the subject that it warrants a reply. The Government should refer the problem to the ACP at the earliest possible opportunity to determine how it may be overcome and what may be done to avoid resistant strains growing. I hope that the Government can reassure me on that.

I tabled the amendment not to make a party political point or even a point of sharp difference, but to try to make the legislation—as the hon. Lady wishes—as good as we can possibly make it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This amendment is a watered-down version of an amendment tabled in Committee, but it is effective. The amendment tabled in Committee asked for a report to Parliament on resistant pests, but it was negatived.

The most serious problem of pesticides is that they can lose their effectiveness due to the appearance of tolerant strains of pest. The pesticides create selection pressure on pest populations that invariably have a genetic pool of widely differing susceptibility to the poison. Certain strong individuals survive the pesticide to breed the next generation. The tolerant pest strain is so serious because there is a real danger that the appearance of such strains will obstruct the production of effective pesticides. The outcome is that we are led to increase the amount of pesticides used to counter the resistance, and that is at the heart of much of our concern and underlines the need to table the amendment.

If we are to respect the policy of minimising the use of pesticides to a degree compatible with efficient farming, a thorough consideration of the implications of resistance is of the utmost importance. The Minister said in Committee that resistance did not necessarily lead to a breakdown of control because there were alternatives. It would be a necessary function of consultations with the advisory committee to determine — based on an appreciation of the extent of the resistance — the implications for the implementation of alternative measures. It is only within the past 10 years that any progress has been made in collecting the data necessary to formulate strategies to control the spread of resistance. Many opportunities have been missed and research has been largely limited to listing occurrences and investigating inheritance patterns and biochemical mechanisms. That is unsatisfactory. We need to understand all the processes, including the evolutionary ones, that lead to a failure in pest control. If we wait until there is a control failure it will be far too late. The alternative attitude is to assume that resistance will eventually arise everywhere and to treat it with larger and larger doses. Our amendment seeks to avoid such an approach, which would be environmentally and economically unsound. It would certainly be most unpopular and damaging to everything that we hold sacred in the countryside.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I support the amendment and endorse the arguments for it. If the amendment is accepted and included in the three specific matters on which the advisory committee should be consulted, the importance of the increasing resistance that exists because of the genetic process of pesticides will be highlighted.

I know that the Minister made a response in Committee. I know she is aware of the problem and I accept that the advisory committee will consider the issue, but the question is whether it will regard the matter as sufficiently important to devote some of its members' time to it.

The most graphic example that I have seen recently —the Minister will have seen it also—is the super-rat, which is resistant to all rat poison and rat removal operations known to local authorities which deal with rodent control. Small rats are difficult and frightening enough to deal with, and we wish to remove them from our communities, but now we have super-rats, which cause great alarm where that species is found.

I ask the Minister to reconsider the matter and incorporate the amendment as a specific task for the committee.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department already undertakes a considerable amount of work on resistance to pesticides in agriculture, horticulture and food storage and among houseflies and rodents. I apologise if my response in Committee was brief. I am trying not to be too wordy now, but I feel compelled to inform hon. Members about the work that is carried out.

The Ministry has a small team at Harpenden monitoring crop pest and disease resistance on a regular basis, and at present its work is directed to monitoring eight aphid species of economic importance. As the answers to many questions show, resistance has been confirmed in three of these species. Our regional laboratory at Wye is responsible for monitoring resistance in pests of protected crops for which the problem is most acute, but which have benefited from considerable work on integrated pest control.

Resistance to pesticides for storage pests and houseflies is monitored by the Slough laboratory in collaboration with the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and Ministry advisers. The pests covered include seven species of storage pests, houseflies in poultry houses and in intensive animal-rearing units, beetles in poultry houses and mites in cheese stores. Resistance to malathion has been demonstrated in one grain beetle and resistance to the fumigant phosphine occurs in stored grain beetles. Flies in animal houses developed resistance to a pyrethroid insecticide which was withdrawn, and the laboratory was instrumental in developing alternative controls. Mites in cheese stores are now resistant to available pesticides, and the Slough laboratory is investigating fumigation techniques to achieve control of pesticide-resistant cheese mites.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred to resistance in rodents. Work on the extent and implications of anti-coagulant resistance in rodents has mostly been undertaken by the Ministry's agricultural science service, although some studies have been carried out in universities. Monitoring of the extent and incidence of resistance has also been carried out by the Ministry. Staff at the agricultural science service central laboratories are researching two methods of controlling anti-coagulant resistant rodents, alongside work to screen candidates for new rodenticides submitted by the pesticide manufacturers.

I hope that I have given hon. Members some idea of some of the programmes relating to resistance to pesticides. I should say to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey that the advisory committee already considers the problems of resistance to individual pesticides, and with the widening of its terms of reference as a result of this legislation, it will be given powers to examine the extent and implications of resistance to pesticides. Therefore, there is no need for the amendment. We are very conscious of the problem and are already devoting considerable resources to investigating and overcoming it.

Mr. John: I knew that, given a little encouragement, the Minister would give vent to the self-expression which was denied to us in her six-line answer in Committee. I am reassured by her comments on the work that is continuing, and especially by her confirmation that the widening of the terms of reference of the ACP will mean that its task of solving the problems will be far easier. Given her assurance that it is unnecessary, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. John: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 17, line 34, at end insert—

'(10A) Within 12 months of the passing of this Act the Ministers shall jointly review the extent of and necessity for aerial spraying of pesticides and shall report to Parliament with proposals for reducing the use of this method of application.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 34, in page 17, line 34, at end insert—

'(10A) Within 12 months of the passing of this Act the Ministers shall jointly review the scope for improving techniques of pesticide application and for promoting integrated pest management and shall set out in a report to Parliament a strategy for reducing the use of pesticides to a minimum consistent with efficient food production.'.

Mr. John: The only connecting factor in the two amendments is the fact that they choose the same mechanism—a review by Ministers within 12 months of the passing of the Bill — to deal with two separate matters. The first is aerial spraying. Lest there be any misunderstanding, especially on the part of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who challenged me on this point, I should say that some aerial spraying is necessary, for example, in difficult terrain. The spraying of upland bracken is extremely important, and spraying is important in controlling pests in forests. However, modern technology has already made it less necessary to use aerial spraying in the lowlands than it was some years ago. The development of low-pressure-tyre vehicles means that spraying can now be done by ground-based vehicles in conditions which would have been unthinkable a decade ago, and probably less. Therefore, to some extent, the need for aerial spraying in the lowlands has diminished.

We are asking for a report to be produced with a view to reducing aerial spraying to the minimum necessary. I should set out briefly to the House my reasons for asking for this limitation. One point that was voiced in Committee — it has been voiced by environmental groups and at public meetings—is the tremendous concern about aerial spraying, and about the involvement, accidental or otherwise, of people, animals and flora. There is unresolved public anxiety, which is not reassured by the often well-meaning statements that nothing can happen and that there is no real problem or danger. Many of those incidents are highly frightening and cause a great deal of emotion. We will not be reassured unless MAFF examines the working of the Act and aerial spraying, and reports to the House so that the matter can be publicly aired.

A second reason why the minimisation of aerial spraying should be undertaken — in Committee we considered a few fairly ropey forms of spraying—is that of all forms of spraying, it is probably the most inaccurate. I expect that many members of the Committee will have received a recent memo in which the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds reiterates its concern for areas that become affected, although those areas were not due to be sprayed. Two of the examples that it gives are SSSIs and ponds. Spray drift is a particular problem for aerial spraying. It is a problem in itself, and relates to the next reason why I believe that a report is necessary, which is that on occasions aerial contractors spray in unsuitable weather conditions. That climatic problem means that wider areas of land are affected than originally intended. The effect of that on the inhabitants of neighbouring properties is tremendous.

The third reason is that often such spraying is unannounced. The Minister will no doubt reassure me that a formula is laid down under which spraying visits are reported to the nearest police headquarters, and so on, but I ask her to accept the evidence, produced on an anecdotal but significant basis by hon. Members, which shows that in practice many people find aircraft spraying crops adjacent to their properties without having had the faintest idea that spraying was to take place that day or that low-flying aircraft would spray at or comparatively near to houses.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has my hon. Friend seen the report of Friends of the Earth, which has been circulated to hon. Members—copies have been sent to Ministers and to the Prime Minister—which sets out in detail the facts of a number of incidents that have taken place this year when people have not complied with the rules? Do they not show that there is a need to tighten up in this area where there is abuse by many aerial sprayers?

Mr. John: I have seen that report. I was going to refer to it both in that connection and in response to the riposte that the Government may feel obliged to make, which is that the number of incidents reported are small. I contend that there are many more incidents that those that are reported.

I shall return to the point relating to an unannounced visit, with an aircraft flying fairly low and unreasonably close to dwelling houses or other buildings. That has an affect on people. In a letter written to my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) I noticed that it said that in Germany, for example, the intention of a contractor to spray aerially must be conveyed to both the police and the local authority. I hope that in the Bill we shall secure, among other things, much more effective communication about where aerial spraying will take place. Those are the reasons why the report is necessary within 12 months to reassure the public. It should be targeted towards the reduction of aerial spraying.

As I have said and as my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) pointed out, the number of incidents reported is comparatively low. I believe that it bears only scant relationship to the number of incidents that occur. The Friends of The Earth report suggests that where the public are gathered together at a meeting there is immediate testimony to such incidents by many. That is of much greater significance than the number of reports suggest. That may be due partly to the complexity of the rules of reporting, and partly to a lack of knowledge about how to go about reporting and why it should be done.

5.15 pm

We must also take account of the feeling that the controls are not properly enforced. On 26 April in a Ministry press release I noticed a warning about pesticide spraying and the minimisation of risks. The warning is fairly prominently displayed and says:

"The CAA will prosecute and in serious cases revoke an operator's Aerial Application Certificate if its requirements are not observed."

Would that that were so. It does not seem to be the case, in view of the low number of prosecutions this decade —the average must be about three a year. Although that number started from a low base and has increased to six or seven a year, such a reminder is not likely to strike terror into the hearts of the aerial operators who may undertake the work.

There is a widespread belief among reputable people in the agriculture industry that the CAA does not carry out its duties in this case with the same degree of interest as it devotes to other duties. I ask the Minister to accept that that is the feeling of people in agriculture. That needs to be borne in mind when we consider the preparation of a report and the consideration of aerial spraying generally.

My fourth point is that any admission of departmental responsibility between the Department of Transport and MAFF is blurred. That was referred to on 16 April in Committee when the Minister, reminded of the fact that the Royal Commission on environmental pollution had already drawn attention to the matter, said that a review would be undertaken and a statement made about departmental responsiblity and the relationship between the Department of Transport and MAFF on this subject. Will she tell us when that review and statement can be expected because they are important?

I understand from the farming press that the review of clearances for aerial spraying has already been begun by the advisory committee on pesticides. Will she confirm that, and tell us when the committee is likely to complete its review? As aerial spraying is an important subject and a potentially damaging form of pesticide spraying we should like a separate report on it to consider the aspects of safety and dislocation for those living in the countryside, and to deal with the question of how to reduce that form of spraying to minimum.

Amendment No. 34 deals with the improvement of application technique. It is important and calls for a system of integrated test management. We alluded to it in part when we talked about resistance to pesticides, fungicides, and herbicides of present strains of produce, which will apply in future. We are committed—the Minister was good enough to confirm this—to the use in agriculture of the minimum amount of pesticides, consistent with the effective use of that pesticide to control pests on crops.

We need the most efficient and accurate techniques possible, and well maintained equipment. Those two things do not necessarily automatically follow. Sometimes we have good designs which a few farmers, wanting to reduce their costs, use long after the repair and maintenance of such equipment has been neglected. We sometimes have inefficient systems, which are not as modern as they can be. The result is that there is unnecessary spraying of pesticides.

There are two general methods of spraying which would yield a lower pesticide use—ultra-low volume or controlled droplet application. We examined these two methods in detail earlier, but I refer the Minister to an article in Farmers Weekly of 20 June about low volume spraying. The article claims that low volume spraying minimises the check to the crops that spraying inevitably gives them. It is calculated that the use of ultra-low volume spraying or controlled droplet application is equivalent to a 25 per cent. reduction in the use of the active ingredient in pesticides.

In a report from a conference which appeared in Big Farm Weekly an ADAS representative who is an entomologist said that one third of all insecticide sprays applied to cereals were a waste of money. That must give the farmer and outselves a great deal of food for thought. The representative described revenge spraying. That occurs when the cosmetic damage to the crops leads farmers to want to get rid of the pests merely for the sake of the crops' appearance rather than to improve the quality of the crop.

The Opposition call for an integrated pest control system. Apart from the techniques that we adopt in the spraying of pesticides, there are a number of other steps which would and should be taken, such as crop rotation, the timing of planting, soil management, the use of pest and disease resistant crop varieties and, most importantly, biological controls, which are a growing source of pest control.

Biological control, as a preventive measure, has been discussed in Committee and its most interesting use at present is in the glasshouse cultivation of salad crops. Dr.

Payne, and others, have been responsible for developments in that sector. In Farmers Weekly of 14 June there is an article about Doctor Lynch of the Glasshouse Crops Research Institute. He has pioneered techniques which include straw breakdown. The active microbes released through that process will form a pest control. That new development shows the importance of soil surveys in identifying where a turning-in of straw would provide maximum benefit and could be done safely and to the benefit of the soil. I commend to the Minister early-day motion 575 that I have tabled on that subject. It would be to the country's and the farmers' advantage to study it. It will be at least four years before those developments are commercially applicable and viable.

Mr. John Carlisle: The hon. Gentleman knows that the turning back of straw can create bacteria and soil-borne diseases which are detrimental to the crop. In some cases, a form of chemical application may be necessary to cure those very bugs—if I may use that term—which are engendered by keeping the straw rather than destroying it by burning.

Mr. John: Yes, I understand that, but that is the value of Dr. Lynch's research. It is important. The soil survey would be able to advise whether it would be beneficial to turn straw back or whether it would present the risks of which the hon. Gentleman speaks, in which case one would not expect it to be done.

There is likely to be a spin-off from the work of Dr. Payne and Dr. Lynch within the fairly near future not just for glasshouse crops but for outdoor crops. Farmers Weekly of 7 June talks about microbial techniques and the fact that Microbial Resources Ltd. has pioneered five pesticides based upon the biological method of control. We are talking about the many possibilities that there will be in the future for growing crops.

More importantly, there has been general unease about the use of pesticides on stored crops. That is a facet of the problem that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The use of pesticides on stored crops can be a problem unless they are severely controlled. The use of insect hormones, which is being pioneered instead of pesticides, would provide a safer way of preserving the quality of stored crops.

In the research programme there are exciting possibilities for the biological rather than chemical control of pests. We are asking for an overall strategy, which combines healthy crops with the lowest possible input of chemical pesticides.

Amendments Nos. 33 and 34 call for the Government to study the results of the control of pesticides after the first year of the Act's operation and to return to Parliament with a report so that we can continue the debate which the Bill has stimulated and which has revealed a degree of unease about the use of chemical pesticides that the House ignores at its peril.

Mr. John Carlisle: The hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John), in his usual charming way, has put forward two reasonably attractive amendments. He will, perhaps, forgive me if I concentrate on amendment No. 33. However, when he spoke about amendment No. 34 he expressed the hope of many within the industry that improved methods will be used and he is correct to point out that more research will need more funds. I believe that my hon. Friend the Minister will take note, and that every encouragement will be given to any such projects so that we might one day be able to move to biological rather than chemical answers to some of our problems for the majority of the time. I am sympathetic to what the hon. Gentleman said about amendment No. 34.

One is tempted to go over some of the ground that was extensively debated in Committee in relation to the proposals contained in amendment No. 33. I shall, however, try to confine my comments to the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I am not entirely attracted to that amendment because an instruction to the industry to reduce aerial spraying is creeping in. He correctly pointed out that with modern techniques and methods the need for aerial spraying is not as important as it was, but the "necessity" — I use his word — exists. It has been relevant over the past few days and weeks.

It does not need someone who knows much about agriculture to understand that ground conditions are now such that in many parts of the country the ground application of pesticides would be impossible. Judging by the conditions in the part of the world where I live, and on my farm, that will probably be impossible until we harvest the crop some time in August.

The House must not underestimate the tremendous boost and bonus that aerial spraying has brought to crops. Our food production system is efficient and good and we are able to enjoy remarkable cereal crops partly because aerial spraying is available and has been used sensibly by the industry in the last few years.

5.30 pm

I do not want the message to go from the House to the industry that we are intent on reducing aerial spraying so that one day a Government, of whatever colour, might consider legislating to ban it. That would be a sad day. I was pleased with the Opposition's stance in Committee when they said that they would never go down that road. I hope that if they ever become the Government—God forbid—they will remain of that opinion.

I shall deal with some of the arguments by the hon. Member for Pontypridd. He talked about public anxiety. He is right to say that a low-flying aircraft can be frightening, particularly if notice has not been given. However, Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends agree that scare stories are often put about. Many allegations are unfounded, but just because the number of prosecutions is small does not mean that instances have not occurred.

I was disturbed when the hon. Member for Pontypridd implied that he did not believe the figures. All allegations are investigated thoroughly. The public easily become anxious and there is talk of scaremongering. The reports from the public are no more than allegations. They are always investigated and are often unfounded. However, I acknowledge the anxiety about aerial spraying. It is a dangerous occupation, not only for the pilot but for people on the ground.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) seems to be trying to minimise the dangers and value of reported incidents. Is he saying that the report by the Friends of the Earth is irrelevant? Is he saying that most of the allegations are empty and do not reflect what happens? Does he understand that only with difficulty can a private citizen successfully secure a prosecution? Will he address himself to that problem?

Mr. Carlisle: Of course I have seen the report. I do not minimise the dangers or the allegations. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) will have seen the figures put out by the British Agrochemicals Association and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which show that a large number of allegations are found to be unjustified after investigation. That is not to say that members of the public are not expressing an anxiety that anyone would express after seeing a low-flying aircraft near or over his house. Anyone would be anxious about what would happen if he came in the path of the spray. I am saying that not every allegation is found to be justified after investigation.

Accuracy is important. The industry is concerned about it, if only because of the cost of the chemicals. It would be foolish for any farmer or grower to spray a crop in a strong wind — this cannot be done under the code of conduct — because he would probably spray his neighbour's crop instead of his own. The code of conduct lays down strict rules so that no spraying can take place when the wind is above a certain speed. Some drift could occur, but the 200 ft recommendation solves the problem of spray drift, which the hon. Member for Pontypridd over-emphasised.

The hon. Member argued for more effective communication. Most hon. Members would support him in that, as would most people in the industry. The debates on the Floor of the House today and in Committee will have informed the trade that the public needs to be told what is happening. The trade has already responded. It fully realises that the public must be told where spraying is to take place and that it has a duty to people who live in the area. The point has been well taken.

In general, we must be careful not to discourage the aerial spraying industry, which is engaged in an expensive and necessary operation. It is necessary, not only for the large areas of cereal crops in the East Anglia region which I represent but, as the hon. Member said, in the Highlands and overseas. If we lost the technique of aerial spraying and the ability to spray, food production would suffer. The message must go from the House that aerial spraying should continue under the strictest control and with cognisance of the public's anxiety. I do not think that it is the duty of any Government to give instructions to the industry. It will sort itself out in its own way. The market should take its own course. If aerial spraying proves to be an impossible operation for farmers because of its expense or practicalities it will go away. I believe that aerial spraying will be with us for a long time and that it will be of great benefit to agriculture and the community.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I have great sympathy with the two amendments. A reduction in serial spraying is necessary. First, it is necessary to assist conservation. A reduction in aerial spraying will improve our efforts to conserve wild life. Secondly, a reduction in aerial spraying would be welcomed by the public, which regards it as a nuisance. Many people have suffered from it. Thirdly, a reduction in aerial spraying will not be detrimental to farming. We have the techniques to ensure that we can, regardless of the weather, put pesticides on to the crops at the right time.

We must accept that aerial spraying inevitably leads to drift. However skilled the operator, it is almost impossible to avoid some drift in any conditions. It is almost impossible to avoid the spray drifting over hedgerows and into neighbouring areas. There is a clear need for greater controls because the damage that aerial spraying does under any conditions cannot be denied.

There are fewer arguments for aerial spraying than there used to be. We discussed in Committee new developments such as low-pressure tyres which can travel over heavy clay lands, even when they are wet. The tramline system enables a vehicle to go even into an oilseed rape crop. As a farmer growing oilseed rape a few years ago, I had to use aerial spraying at certain times of the year. Those days are gone because we have developed other techniques and machines which can spray crops from the ground. We do not now have the technical need for aerial spraying. Now that we have advanced, aerial spraying should be used only in exceptional circumstances. I doubt whether the Civil Aviation Authority has the right methods to control area spraying. Perhaps in a year's time, under the review, we should look for a system of licences to be issued by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for those exceptional cases where aerial spraying will take place because other techniques do not exist.

I welcome amendment No. 34. Without any doubt the great increase in the use of chemicals in the countryside has led to increasing damage to the wildlife and to the conservation of our natural heritage. We must put far greater emphasis on the use of techniques and sprays that will minimise this damage.

My hon. Friend the Minister gave a helpful answer during Question Time the other day that explained how the Government are attempting to explore techniques for the better application of sprays. I welcome that but I think we must go further. It is essential that the sprays we use are far more specific. They should attack the problem and should not affect other insects and weeds that are harmless. We need equipment that is more accurate and ensures that the sprays affect only the area that needs spraying and do not drift and vaporise.

I welcome the fact that the amendment advocates integrated pest management. A good example of such management is the research being undertaken by the Game Conservancy. Under this research 6 m is left round the hedgerows which is unsprayed either by pesticides or herbicides. This has had a beneficial effect on the numbers of insects which survive as well as butterflies and hence on birdlife. Indeed it has had a beneficial effect on the whole of wildlife. The evidence shows that yields have not been affected if the system is managed well. This is a good example of integrated pest management without any loss of agricultural production. I ask the Minister to support the scheme and to consider other ways in which we can seek a balance between agriculture and conservation. To achieve this it would be necessary to publish from time to time our findings and our strategy. It is one thing to have vague aspirations but quite another to set down what we have accomplished, what our intentions are and how we are to achieve the goal of a balance between agriculture and conservation.

I hope that the Minister will look with sympathy on these two amendments. I cannot see how they will harm agricultural production and within them are the seeds of benefit.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This is the more controversial part of the Bill, and we spent some time in Committee discussing these matters. It is the part of the Bill on which the public's expectations of Parliament are highest.

We are grateful to Friends of the Earth for its work to identify cases that have been reported to the authorities and those cases that were not. Even as late as today a Mrs. Simmonds contacted Friends of the Earth from Henfield in Sussex because of her concern over aerial spraying which took place this morning in her area. Also today a Mrs. Judy Holder from Totnes, Devon, contacted Friends of the Earth because a helicopter was spraying right over her farmhouse. Friends of the Earth has given me a copy of a letter from Mrs. Slade of Romney Marsh in Kent. She wrote:

"Only last Thursday I was working in the fields when a spray plane suddenly appeared and proceeded to spray the adjacent fields. Luckily the wind was blowing away from me and when I went home it was spraying the fields around our house. The plane was turning right overhead. I was not informed that spraying would take place. I don't know what they were using, there was no smell whatsoever."

The point is that the public do not know what is happening and they are frightened. They are looking to Parliament to deal with this matter. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) was speaking to the House as though there was no problem.

Mr. Carlisle: I did not say that.

5.45 pm

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is a great problem. I have a copy of the early-day motion which I tabled last year along with two of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members. I believe that about 50 to 60 Conservative Members, along with almost the whole of the Labour Party and a few alliance Members, signed the motion. Two hundred and thirty four Members signed the motion calling for "an effective ban on the aerial spraying of certain arable crops and additionally of specified products and progress towards the introduction of a more effective means of pesticide application: further urges the Government to adopt such a programme as a matter of urgency."

Two hundred and thirty four Members expressed concern about aerial spraying. The Minister should recognise the concern of those who signed the early-day motion and ensure that adequate safeguards are provided in the regulations that are to be published in due course.

Friends of the Earth has produced other information. It appears that in April a farmer sprayed the corner of a Mr. Martin Potter's garden with what the farmer described as a "deadly poison bug killer". That is the statement that was made by a constituent of an hon. Member. I accept that he might have exaggerated what took place, but that is what he said. The fact is that that individual did not know what was happening, and that is what the argument is all about. People do not know what they are being sprayed with because they are given inadequate information.

A Mrs. Betty Clarke of Birchington near Thanet contacted Friends of the Earth in April. She explained that she and a neighbour had suffered seven days of wheezing, swollen glands and bleary eyes as a result of crop spray. I accept that the cause may not have been crop spray, but it may have been. Many people—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) wishes to intervene, I shall be glad to let him do so. Many people find it difficult to establish what has happened. They see an aeroplane and watch it spraying within the vicinity. Afterwards, they are taken ill and they assume that there is a connection between aerial spraying and their illness. If there is a connection, it is often too late to establish it.

The parliamentary private secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), knows that I have a letter from one of his constituents in which a complaint is made about a spraying incident in his constituency. It is only parliamentary protocol and good manners that prevent me from reading the letter to the House. The hon. Gentleman's constituent states in her letter that she made representations to her Member of Parliament and describes the action that was taken as a result of the representations.

The public are extremely concerned and they look to Parliament to take action. I have a series of letters—I shall not recite them all — which refer to spraying incidents, and it is clear that Parliament is expected to respond to the public's anxiety. Environmental groups such as the Soil Association and Friends of the Earth want a ban to be imposed on aerial spraying of farmland. They say that continued aerial spraying should be permissible only by a special permit for bracken control and forestry purposes.

Although aerial spraying involves only about 2 per cent. of British pesticide application, it has led to an extremely large number of pollution incidents. Much of the problem is due to spray drift. Some incidents are due to the failure of pilots to observe adequate precautions.

In Britain, aerial spraying is controlled by the Civil Aviation Authority under the Department of Transport, so it is distanced from the Ministry and the Department of the Environment. This division of responsibilities may go some way to explaining the problems over the control of aerial spraying in the past.

During the process of listening to the groups that came to us to refer not only to aerial spraying but to other aspects of pesticide legislation, I was told repeatedly that division of responsibility between the Departments was creating confusion, and my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) commented at length on this in Committee. Division of responsibility has created difficulties in pesticide control.

The National Society for Clean Air is concerned that the notification procedure that should be followed under CAA control has been widely ignored, and I have referred to cases illustrating that point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman means Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Having spent so much time on the Standing Committee of the Finance Bill, I have become used to referring to the person in the Chair as Mr. Chairman. I apologise.

The notification procedure has been widely ignored and, as a result, local residents, schools, beekeepers, hospitals and market gardeners have been unable to take precautionary measures against spray drift.

Pesticides sprayed from the air include a number that are sufficiently toxic to be covered by the 1972 poisons rules or the Health and Safety Executive's poisonous substances regulations requiring special clothing for operators, such as rubber gauntlets and respirators, as the pesticides have such a high acute toxicity. As the pre-notification system has failed in so many instances, it is possible for incidents to occur in which people are sprayed directly by a poisonous substance. They are not wearing rubber gauntlets, respirators or special clothing. They simply do not know what will happen and they have to put up with the results of this abuse.

There is considerable feeling both inside and outside Parliament that the Government do not go far enough in controlling the use of aircraft for the release of pesticides. The public needs to be assured that Ministers have the power to regulate or stop the more distressing features of aerial spraying. The Royal Commission on environmental pollution has called for stricter controls on aerial spraying and the British Crop Protection Council has recommended that it be used in only a few cases.

The amount of spraying could be more effectively controlled if the number of sprays that could be used from the air were reduced. Insecticides applied from the air could be drastically reduced in number because of the increasing success of integrated pest management schemes which utilise only minimal ground application of insecticides in the control of many insect pests.

Research could also be undertaken into the conservation of spray released into the air. There is a need for more rational consideration of the insect target in relation to droplet size and formulation, a point to which the hon. Member for Luton, North referred and on which we agree. Target behaviour is largely unknown and needs to be studied because of the large payoff in spray effectiveness. There is also an urgent need for a scientific analysis of the behaviour of smaller spray droplets to take advantage of their large potential for reducing pollution and costs and providing an understanding and control of drift.

As it stands, the Bill does not give the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food new powers over aerial spray. The ambiguity about whether pesticide regulations cover aircraft, the confusion over this Bill, the large number of spraying incidents connected with this type of spray and the widespread concern that the CAA does not exercise sufficient disciplinary control together provide a strong case for clarifying the extent of, and necessity for, aerial spraying.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I should like to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but it is nearly 6 o'clock and I believe we intend to give the Bill a Third Reading by 7 o'clock.

Sir John Farr: I welcome these amendments, which are both interesting and well worth consideration. Amendment No. 34 is a good amendment. We are all anxious to see farming problems controlled without the excessive use of pesticide. I shall speak to amendment No. 33, which concerns aerial spraying. The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) served a useful purpose in promoting this matter for debate. There are grounds for concern, and it is no use saying that there are not. Some people have behaved badly and affected many people in rural areas, villages, hamlets and isolated houses by their lack of respect for whatever code of practice may exist.

We discussed a similar amendment in Committee and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary said that the CAA, which controls the performance of aerial spraying, had established much tighter controls and that the regulations would be made available to the House. I hope that my hon. Friend will follow this up. I recognise the need for aerial spraying most of the time, and particularly in weather like this. Nevertheless, the practice badly lacks some good public relations. All neighbours must be informed before aerial spraying takes place. Spraying should be not less than 100 yd from the outside boundary of the area that is being sprayed. Spray should not go within 200 yd of villages and hamlets, as they do in my constituency. However careful one is, and however still the day, there is always a risk of some spray drift affecting a neighbour's property.

I welcome these amendments. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary can give some idea of the acreage that is sprayed every year. I reinforce my belief that while we need aerial spraying, there must be a strict code of conduct. People who have not complied with the code of practice are bringing all the aerial spraying industry into disrespect. Therefore, I support the amendments.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I also support the amendments. It is unnecessary to elaborate the concern rightly expressed by the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) and others. The Bill gives us an opportunity to put down a marker saying that, rather than allow uncontrolled expansion of this practice, we shall change direction. I welcome the fact that the Government have accepted that. However, we need also to make sure that progress in that direction is continued.

I read the Committee debates on the subject. My view has always been that certain areas such as those quoted by the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) need aerial spraying. The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) had an exchange about marginal hill land in Wales. I know that in areas of Snowdonia and the Brecons one cannot gain access to the hillside to spray by other methods. However, for reasons that have been clearly advanced we should be moving towards the principle that aerial spraying is the exception rather than the rule.

Amendment No. 33 is a simple and straightforward amendment to ensure that there is a process of monitoring movement in that direction. It is a well tried and tested device used by the House to make sure that Ministries are responsible to us and report back on the progress that is made. Only if one sets a direction can one, over time, cause production and agricultural machinery and techniques to be adapted to move in that direction. That is why the amendment is important. We do not want the Bill to set a signal that is not followed on by consistent review to ensure that spraying is reduced rather than increased and that the methods and efficiency and accuracy of spraying is improved.

Mr. John Carlisle: Did the hon. Gentleman or any of his colleagues in the alliance sign the early-day motion in the name of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) calling for an effective ban on aerial spraying?

Mr. Hughes: My recollection is that several alliance Members did sign it, because we are seeking to reduce the amount of aerial spraying. Some of them signed it, but not all. I think that the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) was saying that there is great pressure, as exemplified by the signatures on that motion, from within the House and from people who have written to most hon. Members here and in the other place for a move in this direction.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am sorry to say it, but it was with great difficulty that I secured the support of some of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends and that some members of the alliance did not support the motion.

Mr. Hughes: I cannot enter into a discussion of the reluctance or lack of it to sign the motion. All I know is that during discussions at an early stage between at least one of my colleagues, myself and the hon. Member for Workington, there was an agreement to support that move from the beginning. I know that there was full co-operation from one of my hon. Friends, who is not here today, but who liaises with me on a regular basis. Therefore, in that respect there was enthusiasm and co-operation as opposed to reluctance.

People from different backgrounds and with different jobs will have different views. My hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North, who served on the Committee, is a farmer and has seen the need for and practised aerial spraying on difficult farming terrain. I have not said that spraying should not take place, and my support for the amendment is on the basis that it signals a move to reduce and curtail, except when necessary, aerial spraying for all the reasons that have been advanced.

Mr. John Carlisle: It is important that the House should know whether the alliance supports, as is said in the early-day motion:

"an effective ban on . . . aerial spraying".

The impression given by the alliance spokesman in Committee was that, for the reason the hon. Gentleman has put forward, spraying should be available to the hilllands and lowlands of Wales. The hon. Gentleman's answer to that point could be of particular relevance to a certain by-election that is taking place in a few days.

Mr. Hughes: The answer has no more relevance to the by-election in Brecon and Radnor than to any other part of the country where aerial spraying is carried out. Since 1967 the Liberal party has sought effective controls on spraying, and it has regularly passed motions to that effect at its assemblies. The motion to which there were signatories from the alliance called for effective control of spraying. It did not say there should be no control; rather that such control should be better. There will be exceptions, and those were canvassed in Committee.

The early-day motion seeks effective control of aerial spraying. That is a view that my hon. Friends unanimously support. It does not mean that aerial spraying should be discontinued if it is impossible to spray by other means. The geography of Britain would make that a ludicrous position, and we have not adopted it.

The other amendment states that there should be a review so that we can ensure that there is integrated pest management. We have seen failures as a result of contradictory methods of pest management in the past. I do not blame the Department for that, or those who have used those different methods. The amendment requires that we look at the application of pesticides.

My hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has similar concerns about other amendments. This is a continuing process. We are continuing to improve the mechanism and are learning by experience.

The only way of ensuring that a Department does what the amendment requests is to make sure that a review is presented to Parliament in the same way as Royal Commissions present their reports through Ministers to Parliament. In that way we can ensure progress along the line that the Bill intends. That will ensure that intention becomes reality.

I hope that the Minister will reassure us that what is sought by both amendments, supported by Members on both sides of the House, will be responded to positively by the Government. I hope that the Government will report back to the House so that we have the information on which to evaluate the effectiveness of this legislation.

Mrs. Fenner: As the Bill has proceeded through Parliament, a great deal of time has been spent discussing aerial spraying — in the other place, during Second Reading, in Committee and again this evening. On the whole, our discussions have been expressive of the concern that we all feel—that this area of pesticide use should be properly regulated. As a result, I feel that we have made progress in our considerations of this issue and I am grateful to all who have contributed.

Let me sum up the Government's position. We are very aware of the irritation and, indeed, distress that can be caused by spray drift from aerial applications. We are sensitive to the concerns and fears of those who live in rural areas and who feel themselves to be at risk from what can be, when it occurs, a gross nuisance. However, there is another side to the coin, and we should not forget it.

The hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) made it clear that he is not talking about a ban on aerial spraying, and my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) has put the case for aerial spraying. Many aerial spraying contractors in this country are very aware of their responsibilities to the community and take great care to spray safely. What we have to do, as legislators, is to find a balance — to achieve a situation in which the aerial application of pesticides may continue to be used as an important tool of agriculture and forestry, but without endangering people or the environment.

In earlier debates I have described the ways in which the CAA's control last autumn has been tightened up in respect of distances from houses and roads and the threat of prosecution if operators do not distribute proper notification that aerial sparying is to take place. In response to points put to me in Committee, I have already asked the Advisory Committee on Pesticides to review the list of chemicals cleared for application from the air, and as a result of the concerns expressed in Committee, we have initiated a review of departmental responsibilities in controlling aerial spraying. We expect that in the autumn, because the results of that review will influence our proposals for implementing regulations later this year.

I have also explained that we see the controls provided by this legislation complementing those exerted by the CAA. In particular, it will become a criminal offence to spray from the air any chemical that does not appear on the permitted list. I recognise that some may argue that still further controls may be necessary. I respect their point of view, and to them I say that this Bill provides ample powers for Ministers, by regulations, to place any additional controls on aerial spraying that may, from time to time, be considered necessary. Precisely what controls may be necessary will be discussed in detail in our consultations on the regulations, and we will welcome the views and advice of all those with an interest in the aerial application of pesticides. As we shall be returning to Parliament with our draft regulations within the time envisaged by this amendment, I cannot see the need for a specific requirement to report on this in 12 months' time. I therefore ask the House to reject the amendment, which is unnecessary, given that we shall come before the House within the time specified.

Mr. John: The hon. Lady misunderstands the anxiety on both sides of the House. Regulations will be legalistic. They will reveal the Government's thinking, but not the state of knowledge that has led to that thinking. We would be happier if she could give an undertaking that she will make available the latest results of the CAA investigations into aerial spraying incidents. With respect, it is not sufficient to say that the regulations will take the place of the information and discussion that we want.

Mrs. Fenner: I tried to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the draft regulations, which will come before the House within the time during which he would like a report, will give an indication, being the result of consultations, of the review of departmental responsibilities and of any views expressed to us about the aerial application of pesticides. I was asked for information about the tightening up process of the CAA. I will see that a copy of it is placed in the Library.

Amendment No. 34 does not take enough account of the work that the Government already support and finance on techniques of pesticide application and integrated pest management. Furthermore, it implies that the Government's other actions—such as this legislation—have nothing to do with our declared policy of reducing pesticide use to the minimum, consistent with efficient food production.

With the Agriculture and Food Research Council, ADAs has been in the forefront of the development of integrated pest control in the United Kingdom. Programmes based on parasites, predators, selective pesticides and fungal pathogens have been developed to control the major pests of cucumbers and tomatoes, and these techniques are being used on 70 per cent. of cucumbers and 40 per cent. of tomatoes.

We have also developed a supervised control programme for apples, involving close monitoring of the crop and selective, rather than calendar, spraying. Other integrated control programmes are available for the control of potato cyst menatode, the major pest of potatoes. The PSPS has already cleared a number of biological pesticides and an insect virus. Our work at the Boxworth experimental farm to investigate the effects on the flora and fauna of pesticides used on cereals includes an area of cereals under an integrated control system for evaluation. Currently, we have 31 separate commissions with AFRC for integrated control research.

In collaboration with the National Institute of Agricultural Engineering, my Department is investigating the design of field sprayers and the control of spray rates, an issue which particularly concerns my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle). Work is going on to identify the physical factors which affect the formation, transport and deposition of spray droplets and to quantify how these factors affect spray deposit and spray drift.

Information from the analytical and laboratory studies of the design and development of field spraying equipment is made available to engineers for the design of equipment. My Department publishes an annual report on our research and development work which is available from the Stationery Office.

As I said at the beginning of my reply, the legislation in part III of the Bill is a major part of our strategy to ensure pesticide usage consistent with efficient food production.

Mr. Cambell-Savours: In the light of all the complaints that hon. Members have received——

Mr. John Carlisle: All the complaints?

Mr. Cambell-Savours: I have not read the whole list, but it is clear that innumerable complaints are received daily by Friends of the Earth. In view of that, will the Minister give an undertaking that when the regulations are introduced, she will, in effect, be setting up a regime on aerial spraying of pesticides which will effectively end what is happening now? That would give some assurance to hundreds of thousands of people who live in rural areas of Britain and who are looking to the Minister for reassurances to relieve them of their concerns about the future.

Mrs. Fenner: I reiterate that we are concerned about some aerial spraying and that we believe that it should be regulated. I said that the regulations would come before the House in 12 months' time. For that reason, I said, the amendment was not necessary.

We shall continue to give a high priority to the work that the Government are supporting into alternative and improved methods of pest control. I do not, therefore, see the need for a special report to Parliament on this aspect of pesticide policy, as the whole purpose of the Bill is to support our strategy to ensure pesticide usage consistent with efficient food production. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. John: I was disappointed with the Parliamentary Secretary's reply. While the House is anxious not to go over ground that was trodden in Committee, there are certain aspects that we must consider. For example, there is the question of regulations as against a report, for which the amendment calls.

I would describe regulations as legislative icebergs; they are what emerge into the public's gaze, not the totality of what occurs in their production. About five sixths of the consideration that goes into the framing of legislation never becomes known outside the conferences with advisers about which the Minister will know well.

On subjects of this nature, however, I should have thought that there was every virtue not only in making the regulations known—with their necessarily exact and spare use of English to make them legally enforceable—but for making known to the House, by means of an explanatory memorandum or by some other means, exactly what information impelled the Government to take the course of tabling regulations.

If the Minister would be prepared to do that, we would be reassured about the Government's intentions. I therefore ask the Parliamentary Secretary to accept amendment No. 34 on an integrated strategy for pest control. I have heard much about what is going on in specific projects, but nothing about an overall strategy, whereas we are asking for such a strategy.

Unless the Parliamentary Secretary can, by way of regulations in respect of the aerial spraying issue, reassure the public, their anxiety will not go away. The Government may avoid parliamentary bother—in that they will not have to produce an explanatory memorandum and explain why a hundred and one cases are not apposite or borne out by the facts—but in so doing they will be building up anxiety that many people feel about aerial spraying, either through incidents of which they are aware or of which neighbours have told them.

That anxiety will not disappear if the Government avoid dealing with it now. Thus, when the regulations are being published, I urge the Minister to publish at the same time an explanatory memorandum setting out an analysis of the incidents that have occurred and her conclusions on them.

Amendment negatived.

Mrs. Fenner: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 17, line 38, leave out from 'of' to 'or' in line 41 and insert

'controlling pesticides in the United Kingdom'

During our examination in Committee of clause 15(11) the Opposition expressed concern that its present wording may not enable us to collect the information that we need to determine whether an approval should be reviewed, revoked or suspended. I agreed to consider this and, as a result, have decided that this amendment would be appropriate. Although short, it leaves no doubt that the power to require information may be exercised at all stages of pesticide supply and use controlled by part III, so that Ministers can exercise those controls properly. It therefore ensures that the Minister can have both information to approve and information to revoke or suspend pesticides, as the Opposition requested.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I welcome the amendment. We are looking at words that effectively limit the provision to controlling pesticides in the United Kingdom. Page 18 of the Bill refers to complying with international obligations. Do we consider at this stage our obligation with respect to the export of pesticides, which may not be governed simply by our international obligations? I know that these are matters of convention. We are making certain provisions with respect to information from manufacturers and users of pesticides in the United Kingdom. Are we referring also to information that will be available when we export pesticides?

This is one of the underlying issues of the debate. We are ensuring that we do not include within pesticides for export properties that are undesirable, unacceptable or dangerous and which we would not allow to be used here. Will it be possible to deal with that issue in this clause, or will it be dealt with elsewhere?

Mrs. Fenner: We have adequate powers under the 1939 Act to deal with all pesticides for export.

Amendment agreed to.

'(2A) Where either of the Ministers has given an approval, he may require the payment of reasonable fees from time to time—

(a) in respect of the collection of information under section 15(11) above and the processing of information supplied under that subsection,

(b) in respect of monitoring the effect of the use of pesticides in the United Kingdom, by such persons as he considers appropriate

(2B) Fees under this section shall be determined on principles settled by the Ministers with the consent of the Treasury and after consultation with organisations appearing to the Ministers to represent persons who are likely to apply for approvals.' [Mrs. Fenner.]

Clause 17

ENFORCEMENT POWERS

Mr. Simon Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 19, line 37, after 'Ministers', insert 'or a local authority',

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 60, in clause 22, page 25, line 10, at end insert—

'"local authority" means—

(a) in England and Wales, the council of a district or a London borough, the Common Council of the City of London, the Sub-Treasurer of the Inner Temple and the Under Treasurer of the Middle Temple; and

(b) in Scotland, and islands or district council;'.

Mr. Hughes: This amendment has been tabled by my hon. Friends the Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and myself. It relates to the enforcement by local authorities of the powers that are provided for in clause 17. As drafted, the Bill provides:

"Either of the Ministers may authorise any person . . . to enforce this Part of this Act".

The other place has debated how much power this provision gives the Government to delegate to for example, local authorities so that they can undertake the enforcement role. I should like the Parliamentary Secretary to reconsider the practical reasons for specifying that officers of local authorities should be given this job. I hope that she will take in good part the good reasons why my colleagues and I believe that they should be given this job.

There is a strong case for environmental health officers—each local authority has several of these—taking on the role of enforcement in relation to pesticides. I should like to put out of the way the suggestion that this could be done by trading standards officers. That red herring came up at an earlier stage of the debate, and I want to dispose of it. Trading standards officers are the people who go around Sainsburys to ascertain whether the weight of the cheese is specified correctly. I am concerned about those officers who are more ready to put on their wellington boots and tread out into the mire to deal with matters away from their offices and urban areas.

Environmental health officers are specifically well equipped to do this job. Indeed, they are necessary if the Parliamentary Secretary is serious about wanting to enforce this legislation. There are between 4,000 and 6,000 environmental health officers in Britain. The Minister said in Committee that this compares with only about 160 inspectors in the Government's agricultural safety inspectorate. The original memorandum to the Bill said that, because of increased work on pesticides, another 18 staff at the Health and Safety Inspectorate and 10 at the Ministry would be required. The Minister said that about 14 of the 18 extra HSE staff would be additional agricultural inspectors. I do not believe that 14 or 18 extra staff will make much difference. Compare a possible 4,000, 5,000 or 6,000 people having the power to do this job with the 160 staff presently in post, to which would be added a mere 14 or 18 extra staff. I would opt for giving these powers specifically to the army of environmental health officers, numbering thousands rather than tens.

I do not know the number of people in the pesticides branch of MAFF, but I believe that officials at Whitehall place—the Parliamentary Secretary's headquarters—are not likely to be dealing with enforcement on the ground. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary accepts that they will be dealing with the monitoring of information and the efficacy of the regulations. A pathetic number of people employed by the Ministry will be doing the enforcing. The Government have already accepted that they are setting a great task. They have conceded that the number of inspectors is relevant. The fact that they are increasing the staff by 14 clearly shows that they have conceded that it is important to have more inspectors. It follows that 4,000 will be more effective than 14.

If there are doubts—I share those doubts, although I would be delighted to be proved wrong — about the political will of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to enforce this legislation effectively, I would prefer the power of enforcement to be dispersed to others. One would not then be entirely reliant on the political will of the Parliamentary Secretary's Department, with all the pressures placed on her from other Departments. We have had debates about giving the Ministry an environmental over-duty. This idea was strongly resisted in debates on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The Government said that they were not willing to take it on because all Departments had a responsibility to look after wildlife, the countryside and the environment and that it would be wrong to allow one Department to be the lead Department. It would be much better to allow all local authorities to have the same responsibility. I trust that there would be greater effectiveness of enforcement in that case than if only one Department were involved.

To have the Minister decide the priorities of enforcement is clearly not as good—this is no criticism of the Parliamentary Secretary—as having a wide range of local authorities deciding enforcement priorities, given their personnel and resources. Different local authorities in different parts of Britain will have different priorities in terms of the enforcement of pesticide legislation. It depends on the farming, the nature of the terrain and all sorts of things. Therefore, it could be seen, by comparing one with the other, which were the most successful authorities, and the Ministry would have benefit of that experience.

6.30 pm

There is also the argument, which my hon. Friend and I always advance, that we believe in strengthening local authorities as against Government Departments. It is an important principle of democratic control that one gives the power to enforce legislation to the people nearest to the ground. That argument for decentralisation applies in this case even though one is depending upon the information coming from research, whether it is the Ministry's research or independent research carried out in the universities.

Many local authorities are keen to have these powers of enforcement. They know their areas. Many officers live and are brought up in the areas. The best information comes directly from the area. People are more likely to go to the local environmental health officer, the local town hall or the county hall than they are to write to Whitehall, so that the Whitehall machinery would seldom be called upon to deal with these issues.

As a complementary point, environmental health officers in local authorities are likely to be, as they should be, more responsive to local pressure and concerns because they are in the front line. It would seem illogical for people who go to them on what is clearly an environmental health matter to be told, "I am sorry, we are not the front line agency for dealing with this."

Whatever the case, it is true that the Ministry is more suited to deal with major problems and national incidents, given all its resources. The Ministry should not have to deal on every level in every farm, field, district and county with the various issues that crop up every day.

It may also be the case that the Ministry officials, as they are bound by duty to do, start from being pro-farmer rather than pro-environment. They rightly have a duty, because it is their task to ensure that there is an effective agriculture industry, to take into account the concerns of those involved in the industry. It is better that these issues should be looked at with the eye of those who are interested in the environment—the farmer, farm worker, employee, farm resident, rural resident and countryside user. The Ministry has to consider agricultural production and agriculture from its position, but environmental matters should be dealt with by people who have a responsibility for the environment.

I think that the Minister would agree that environmental health departments and officers are keen to do the job. All the information that I have been given suggests that they are ready and willing. For the Government to hold close to their chest, in a quiet closed department of 14 or 18 officers, the task of doing this job when there is a great army saying, "Please give us this work, we want to help you," seems an ungenerous attitude. I know that the Minister can be generous, and I look to her to give away the workload with which her officials would otherwise be lumbered if she does not accept my arguments.

I anticipate the Minister saying that to accept the amendment would be inconsistent with the format of the rest of the Bill, which is concerned with establishing structure. The Minister promised us regulations in 12 months, by which I hope she meant within 12 months. The regulations will give us the teeth to fit the mouth of the Bill. I accept that local authorities get little mention in the Bill. That is to be regretted because it reflects a rather centralist view of what can be an effective Bill at all levels. The most effective Bill will be one that allows local authorities to play their part. The debate in the other place included the statement with which I began, that clause 17 gives the Government sufficient powers to authorise local authority officers to carry out this job.

I have put the arguments and by way of summary of the arguments, I ask the Minister to give a commitment that the Government will authorise, as from the date of the enactment of the legislation or within a short period thereafter, local authority environmental health officers to carry out this job. The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was on the right lines, but was found to be defective because the resources were not available to make it effective. If we are endeavouring to protect the environment, we should avail ourselves of resources where they are available.

The Bill is welcome, but let us hear the Minister make the commitment to give those who wish to do the job the power to enforce the legislation.

Mrs. Fenner: I thank the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for moving the amendment, which I cannot accept.

The purpose of the Bill is not to give local authorities powers in the control of pesticides. As he rightly pointed out, it is the tool to ensure that Ministers have all the powers they need to effect such control. Before we could give local authorities such power, we would need to consult them and all other interests involved about that proposal. Indeed, we had a consultation meeting with the Association of Local Authorities last week. It is fair to say that on that occasion no clear new area of activity for local authorities was identified that would justify the amendment.

It may reassure the House to know that Ministers can authorise local authority officers or local authorities as legal persons to undertake an enforcement role. We believe that they will have a part to play in the enforcement of the legislation in future, particularly in relation to pesticide residues. However, that is still some time in the future, and we will be consulting at the appropriate time.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of the number of people in the field. As he rightly pointed out, in the Health and Safety Executive there is an agricultural inspectorate of 160. Of the new additional staff quoted in the Bill, two of the London staff will be in the field on wildlife. In the Health and Safety Executive, of the 18 there will be 12 additional inspectors. That is the number requested by the executive to carry out the additional work involved, although there already exists an agricultural inspectorate of 160. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The figures that the Minister has given confirm my fears. She did not give the specific commitment for which I asked, that the Government would authorise local authorities. I must therefore request that we should hear the Government refuse to accept the amendments rather than that I should withdraw them.

Schedule 5

THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. Ashdown: I beg to move amendment No. 52, in page 36, line 5, at end insert—

'(1A.) The Ministers shall, in their appointment of persons as members of the committee, have regard to the general purposes of Part III of this Act, mentioned in section 15(1) above, and review annually the range of expertise required for those purposes.'.

The purpose of this amendment is to ask the Government to pay regard to the aims of the Bill, as outlined in clause 15(1). We have used the words "have regard" so that the Government may think carefully about the composition of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides. The Bill sets out the Government's aims which lie at the heart of the Bill, but it lacks any specific indication of the Government's intentions. They will probably be included in the regulations. The Government have resisted giving a date for the publication of the regulations which will put into effect the laudable aims of clause 15(1).

However, we are concerned about a lacuna in the Bill. We want the ACP to be able to put into effect the general aims of clause 15(1). Many believe that the first aim of the Government was to protect not the public but the industry. The mechanism of the pesticides safety precautions scheme has broken down because of the import of cheap pesticides, so we want the Government to fulfil its aims. In the absence of regulations we need to be reassured that the general purpose of clause 15(1) will be fulfilled.

The composition of the ACP is vital. Will it carry out the Government's intentions? To use the words of clause 15(1), will it provide "The continuous development of means—(a) to protect the health of human beings, . . . (b) to safeguard the environment; and (c) to secure safe, efficient and humane methods of controlling pests."?

The composition of the committee does not reassure us. Many organisations, including the Royal Society for the

[Mr. Ashdown]

Protection of Birds, believe that the committee's expertise is insufficient to protect wildlife, but I wish to concentrate upon human health, one of the aims of clause 15(1).

Five of the 10 full members of the committee are doctors. However, three of them are pathologists whose expertise relates not to the living but to the dead. The other two doctors are academics. None of the ACP members is currently concerned with the care of living patients. The medical expertise that is available on the advisory panels is related more to the dissection of dead rats on laboratory tables than to dealing with people. It is a pejorative term, but in the medical profession they fall into the category that is roughly known—I use the word "roughly" in both senses of the word—as rat doctors.

This may have been appropriate in the past. The PSPS was concerned primarily with the clearance of pesticides before use, on the basis of animal test data, rather than with monitoring their effect upon human beings after use. However, the monitoring of the effect of pesticides on human beings is one of the main aims of the Bill. Continuous monitoring after use is part of its purpose. If the Minister is serious about protecting human beings on a continuous basis and about safeguarding the environment, should not more emphasis be placed upon monitoring pesticides by the ACP? Will its composition change to take account of what she seeks to achieve? If monitoring is to take place, where will the expertise be found? It will not be found in the ACP. There should be doctors on the committee who have practical experience of dealing with patients, not with dead rats on the laboratory table. If the Government are serious about providing protection, a true clinical toxicologist, with practical experience of caring for people who have been poisoned, should be appointed to the committee. There is no substitute for such expertise. If the Minister can assure us that the constitution of the ACP will be suitably amended, we may reconsider this amendment, even though we should like it to be incorporated in the Bill.

Paraquat is a well-known substance for which there is no antidote. Since its introduction, there have been 331 deaths. Those people died in a uniformly horrible way. Some of them, though not necessarily all, died by their own hand. This substance ought to be reconsidered because of its effects upon human beings rather than upon weeds.

The Black committee investigated the possible increase in the number of deaths in Cumbria from cancer because of Yorkshire Television's allegations about a disproportionately large number of children in the Sellafield area with leukaemia. The numbers were low but the ratio was high. The allegations were taken seriously and led to the appointment of a committee whose report has now been published. The results were largely inconclusive, but the committee said that further research was needed. In reaching those important conclusions the Black committee had the help of two epidemiologists. Is it not precisely this kind of work, relating not to radiation but to pesticides and similar chemicals, upon which the ACP should provide advice? Yet there is no epidemiologist on the committee. The hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Mr. Body) referred earlier to thalidomide, which had been tested on rats before it was brought into general use. Later it was proved to be dangerous to human beings. That danger would have been established if an epidemiologist had served on the committee.

Today I received a press release from Friends of the Earth which calls for a ban on the sale or use of all pesticides containing the chemical Ioxynil. There is evidence to support the theory that it causes a certain number of birth defects. That is unproven, but should not the ACP advise on just such a claim? How could it provide advice if none of its members has the appropriate medical qualifications to form a reasonable judgment? This is not a fanciful point. The suspicion that the high incidence of cancer in farm workers is caused by pesticides is being investigated by the Medical Research Council. Should not the ACP be able to investigate that allegation, too? If the Government wish the health of human beings to be protected on a continuous basis, the ACP must be provided with the necessary means.

The Bill will have little effect if it becomes an instrument for the continuous clearance of pesticides before use by the study of dead rats instead of monitoring pesticides in use by examining their effect upon living human beings. We ask that the ACP be restructured to take account of the changed needs that result from this Bill and we welcome that change. If the Minister were to accept this extremely limited amendment, it would make sure that in future the ACP reflected, at least in some measure, the Government's concern. This amendment does no more than give effect to that wish, which we hope the Government share. I hope that the Minister will feel able to accept it and commend it to the House.

Mrs. Fenner: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his explanation. I hope that he will forgive me if I respond rather predictably by saying that we cannot accept the amendment because it is unnecessary, since clause 15(7), which enables Ministers to establish an advisory committee, makes it absolutely clear that the area of activity of the committee and indeed the reason for its existence are the general purpose of part III of the Bill. That being so, I can assure the House that this Government at least—I venture to say, any Government—would not consider making any appointment to the ACP without having regard to the general purposes of this legislation.

The hon. Member made some astonishing comments about the members of the ACP. Professor Kilpatrick, the chairman, is concerned with living patients, as is Professor Berry, the chairman of the scientific sub-committee, whose expertise also includes carcinogenicity and teratogenicity. I remind him that pathologists are not solely concerned with the dead but are also greatly concerned with diagnosis of ailments in the living.

As for the future, I have already said that we shall be reviewing the structure and composition of the ACP and the sub-committee and panels that assist it in the light of the changes which the legislation will bring. We have already had some preliminary discussions with the committee on the implications of extending the pesticides screening system to cover efficacy and humaneness as well as safety, and we are looking at ways of benefiting from user and supplier experience by giving those groups access to formal advisory panels.

I should, however, make it clear that it is our firm intention to invite the present chairman and members of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides to serve on the statutory committee, and I very much hope that they will agree to do so. This Government and preceding Governments are greatly indebted to the advisory committee and its scientific sub-committee for their meticulous assessment of the risks attached to the use of pesticides and for the sound and unbiased advice that they have given us over many years. That the general public do not always realise just how well they have been protected is a fault of communication on our side, and I am glad to take this opportunity to express our appreciation of the considerable service which the advisory committee provides.

Mr. Ashdown: I am extremely disappointed with the Minister's answer. The phrase that I used—and I have it noted down — was: "None of the ACP members is concerned currently with the care of living patients." There is no provision for a clinical toxicologist or an epidemiologist on the committee.

Mrs. Fenner: I am getting some more advice, and I would like to reassure the hon. Gentleman. Professor Knowelden, who is an ACP member, is an epidemiologist.

Mr. Ashdown: I am looking in her answer to me of 12 February 1985 for the name of the learned professor to whom the Minister now refers. Perhaps this is something which has changed since I asked the question, but that was my understanding. In any event, there is not on the ACP at the moment a clinical toxicologist, even if an epidemiologist has now been put on it.

The Minister has not given the assurances that we have sought in order to ensure that the balance of the committee is corrected. I make no criticism of those who serve on the committee or of the way in which they have served it in the past. I think that the Minister is absolutely right to identify them as people who have shown diligence and care. The point that we make is that the committee needs to be changed so as to reflect the changed nature of its job as a result of this legislation.

I am disappointed that the Minister felt unable to give a stronger assurance along those lines, and I must ask the House to consider this matter a bit more seriously.

Amendment negatived.

Order for Third Reading read [Queen's and Prince of Wales's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

6.57 pm

Mrs. Fenner: Now that we are coming to the end of our debates on this Bill I should like, before I go into the specific points raised, to express my appreciation and that of my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the way in which hon. Members have responded to these proposals.

There have been many questions and amendments, some probing the Government's intentions, others seeking to modify or extend one provision or another. But the most striking feature throughout our debates has been the desire shown on all sides of the House to make this a better Bill and to ensure that it deals adequately with the problems which might arise.

I am glad to say that there has been considerable interest in the the subject matter of the three parts of the Bill and equally widespread support for the principles they contain, which shows that the Government were right to bring forward this legislation now. The result is, indeed, a much clearer Bill than the one we started with three months ago.

Part I has been generally welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but there have been a number of areas of concern which I think we have gone a long way to resolve during its passage. However, we must remember to keep these concerns in perspective. The powers provided by part I would be used only in exceptional circumstances to ensure the safety of food following an escape or release of harmful substances. To give some idea of the exceptional circumstances, we can envisage only one or two occasions in the past 30 years when they might have been activated.

In part II there are now two major additions to the area controlled by the Dumping at Sea Act 1974 — marine incineration and deposits under the seabed. The Bill substantially broadens the range of factors which Ministers must take into account when licensing deposits and places a specific duty on them to consider the availability of other methods of disposal. It provides for recovery of the cost of monitoring and enforcement work and for consultation with those who will be paying the new fees. It also re-enacts a provision on procedures for the enforcement of the international dumping conventions, whose original omission led, entirely innocently, to some misunderstanding, which has now been removed.

There is one very important general point which arose at our previous sitting on which I must set the record straight. This is the assertion that the United Kingdom is the greatest contributor to pollution of the North sea. The facts are quite otherwise, and I would recommend the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) to take a closer look at the Royal Commission on environmental pollution's 10th report, which he quoted the other day. This report examined the whole range of pollution issues and included a substantial section on the North sea. It naturally reviewed United Kingdom policy and practice on dumping at sea and I must emphasise that it did not recommend any change in our controls.

What the report did was to review the scientific evidence. It showed that the main sources of contaminants were the atmosphere and rivers, of which the Elbe, the Rhine and the Meuse were the major contributors. It showed that disposal of sewage sludge and dumping of other wastes accounted for only a tiny percentage — about 3 per cent. — of the heavy metals. The report noted that the effects of contaminants were most pronounced in estuaries and coastal waters. It quoted the Thames as the most notable example of recent improvement and the Wadden sea as an area of particular concern.

The Royal Commission concluded that there was no substantial threat to the North sea, although more research was needed, and recommended that the United Kingdom should respond positively to international initiatives. That is exactly what we have done. It is quite clear from the Royal Commission report that the United Kingdom is not the major polluter of the North sea; indeed this country has a good record which, on the state of rivers in particular, contrasts favourably with that of some of our neighbours.

Part III of the Bill has occupied a good deal of our time. We are fortunate in having had the pesticides safety precautions scheme as a stepping stone to part III. That non-statutory scheme has evolved over the years into an effective screening system for the safety of pesticides coming on to the United Kingdom market. But I have no doubt that it was right to seek to replace it with a statute. It was not simply that the restrictive agreement necessary to prevent unlicensed imports was attracting the attention of Brussels — much more fundamentally, with the current priority that is given to health and environmental questions in public debate, the absence of statutory powers left the scheme without the necessary muscle to impose the controls required.

In our debates we have been able to explain in some detail the good work already done under the PSPS, the working party on pesticide residues, BASIS, the wildlife incident investigation scheme, and so forth, and we have given assurances that that will continue and develop. We have also been able to explain our ideas on how the Bill should be implemented. Finally, but certainly not least, we have been able to hear the views of the House.

But it has also been equally important for us to hear the views of hon. Members on the future detailed controls to be laid down in regulations. We have taken very careful note of all these views and will take account of them in our consultation paper on the implementation of part III. We shall send a copy of the paper to all right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken in the debates and to any others who request it, as well as to all interested organisations, and we shall allow ample time for comment before we prepare the regulations.

Finally, I should like to emphasise the extent of my Department's commitment to conservation of the countryside and other environmental matters, as witnessed by our concrete achievements. Through ADAS, for example, we advise farmers on how they can build conservation into their farming practices. Under our capital grant schemes, we give particular emphasis to environmentally sympathetic farming operations by paying premium rates. In co-operation with the Countryside Commission, we are operating an experimental scheme designed to help safeguard the unique landscape of the grazing marshes in the broads. And, following the successful efforts of my right hon. Friend to persuade his colleagues in Brussels to include a suitable provision in the agricultural structures regulation, we are now preparing a special scheme to promote environmentally sympathetic farming practices in designated sensitive areas. I commend the improvements to environmental protection in this Bill, to take a worthy place in that list of achievements.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I join the Minister in welcoming the Bill in principle. It is much improved on the Bill that entered the other place many months ago. It spent a long time in Committee, but I do not think that anyone who served on that Committee would deny that it was anything but workmanlike. We graciously acknowledge that the Government were prepared to accept a number of points argued by the Opposition. In a sense, the Bill marks the end of an era. Parliament has recognised the feeling in the country that something should be done about pesticides, and we commend the Government's approach.

The whole basis of the Bill, especially part III, will be the regulations. We appreciate the Minister's offer that Members of Parliament and others will be consulted about the regulations. As they cannot be amended, it is vital that there is maximum consultation with interested parties. It is by the regulations that the Government's intent will be judged.

A number of markers about the regulations should be put down immediately. The first arises out of the Minister's television appearance on 11 June. I hope that when the Bill is implemented the EEC will confirm that the regulations about residues will be adhered to. We understand that to be the Government's position and hope that that will be enacted in the Bill.

We are especially concerned about 2,4,5-T. I do not want to labour the point, but I hope that the Minister will take the Egan incident into account. That case was reported in the Daily Mirror on 13 June and, tragically, involved the termination of a pregnancy. In the mind of the gynaecologist, that was linked with 2,4,5-T.

Thirdly, the regulations must take into account the pesticides and chemicals that are regarded as not suitable for use, but are nevertheless sold. I am especially thinking of DDT. We must acknowledge the point made by hon. Members on both sides of the House that the Friends of the Earth has done a great deal of work in that respect. It has brought out examples which, perhaps, have surprised bureaucracy and surprised us, but we are all the better for knowing about them. I hope that the Government will give an assurance that, under the regulations, it will be illegal to sell pesticides that have been withdrawn.

I wish to mention also Dieldrin and heron deaths in the river Avon area. We are receiving a great deal of information that pesticides that have been withdrawn are still being sold. We expect the Government to take steps to prevent that. Therefore, we await the regulations with a great deal of interest.

We do not wish to disagree to any great extent with the Minister about part II, but my reading of the Royal Commission report is considerably different from hers. Part II replaces the Dumping at Sea Act 1974. It tightens the licensing system. We hope and look for Government action on that aspect.

It may be right that, overall, atmospheric and river pollution adds greatly to the pollution within the oceans, but it is in localities and where the concentrations are greatest that the greatest damage is caused. I sent a document to the Minister's hon. Friend earlier this week which has been compiled by the fishermen of Cullercoats and South Shields. It shows that the dumping that takes place between five and 12 miles off the river Tyne has reduced the catches of fishermen in my constituency by 90 per cent. in 15 years. It is their view that that is due to the fact that chemicals are dumped from Teesport off the river Tyne, and we cannot accept that. I give that merely as an example of the Government action that we expect under Part II to deal with concentrations of dumping.

We hope that we have converted the Government and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on environmental matters. It is a pity that we could not convert them several weeks ago when we were discussing the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill. We very much welcome the Government's efforts on Halvergate marshes. I wonder whether they will give us the same commitment with Swaveney fens, which are about to be drained with the help of almost £500,000 of Government grant. Many of us do not regard it as satisfactory only to protect small isolated parts of the countryside. We are not happy with having only isolated SSSIs. We want to keep the living rural environment, not just a sterile cereal area. I would welcome a Government statement on that—if not today, in the near future.

However, I do not wish to end my speech on that note because we have debated a constructive and worthwhile Bill. The key factor is the regulations, and we shall be watching the Government's actions on them with great interest. In principle, we welcome the Bill.

7.10 pm

Sir John Farr: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on piloting the Bill through Committee and the two and a half days on Report.

It is a unique Bill in many respects. It replaces the pesticides safety protection scheme, and I hope that the new scheme will work half as well as the old one did. An exceptional feature of the Bill are the many statutory instruments that will be brought before the House for debate. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will await those instruments anxiously. We may even have a chance to debate a draft statutory instrument before the final statutory instrument is laid before the House. The Bill is unique because so much of it has yet to be decided.

I hope that there will be a statutory instrument relating to part I, to set up a compensation fund for any destruction of crops or produce that may be ordered, whether or not there has been pollution. The flaw in the Bill is that it is desperately unfair that small producers, small merchants and small growers should suffer from an order to destroy their crops even when no pollution has occurred. I hope that the Government will introduce a statutory instrument to correct that anomaly. Apart from that flaw, I warmly welcome the Bill.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I too, welcome the Bill. It is the lot of Opposition spokesmen to welcome legislation when the country is better off with that legislation than without it, but it is also their lot to say that the Government should have done more. I shall attempt to strike that balance.

The Liberal party has called for legislation on this subject since 1967. It has taken 18 years to get a response. That is slow, but it is never too late to protect our environment and food from hazards. I hope that the Bill is not a token gesture or an outline, which will not be followed by regulations. We shall watch carefully what the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food does during the next 12 months. The hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said that regulations will be laid before the House. I hope that that will be sooner rather than later and that they will supply the teeth that the Bill needs.

It worries me that insufficient powers and resources have been allocated to make the Bill effective. If the Government are to honour their commitment, they will have to produce more manpower and resources to ensure that the pollution dangers are overcome. We do not want a repeat of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which did not have sufficient enforcement resources. We watched as, remorselessly, year after year, more of our countryside and wildlife was destroyed. However, we were not powerless to act. The Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is welcome and respected, and will enable us to do something about the problems. Let us not make the same mistakes again.

It is clear that research is proceeding apace. As the results of research into the effects on health of spraying pesticides become available and researchers have produced more evidence, Parliament may have to respond again, either specifically and quickly or more generally. With increased knowledge of those processes, the Government must be prepared to introduce legislation. I hope that we shall review and debate the matter on a regular basis.

Some of us are unhappy with the presumption in favour of freedom of information that the Government selected for the Bill. I and many others believe that they have not gone far enough. We should go as far as other countries have, and I hope that the Government will soon realise that they have nothing to fear by allowing people to know what is happening. Only Governments who are afraid, in countries which are not normally democracies, close their doors, batten down the hatches and prevent the widest public participation. I hope that there will be no veto by commerce, bureaucrats or Ministers on the information that everyone has a right to know relating to pesticides and environmental pollution.

I pay tribute to my colleagues in the other place, especially to my noble Friend Lord Mackie of Benshie, who worked hard on the Bill. I also pay tribute to all those in many parties who have improved the Bill during its passage through the House. The Minister accepts that it has been improved.

However, looking ahead, I hope that we can improve the legislation in another respect. Although we are establishing a framework for protecting food, improving the control of pollution and preventing unlicensed dumping and regulating the supply and use of pesticides in Britain, we have still not taken up our responsibilities for the Third world. Western Europe exports more than 60 per cent. of the pesticides that it produces to the Third world. If we export them without protection, we export pollution and damage to countries that do not have the knowledge that we have, and that look to us to protect them from the mistakes that we have made. I hope that we shall do more in the future to ensure that the highest standards of control of exports are applied and that we never export products that we are unwilling to use ourselves.

With those reservations, I welcome the Bill and look forward to the introduction of regulations soon.

7.17 pm

Mr. John Carlisle: I shall make the shortest speech ever on a Third reading. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for not being here for her opening remarks. I fully support the Bill. The Committee stage was an interesting experience for most of us. The trade has learned from experience, and from the words of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who had altercations with me on various aspects of the Bill. The trade has listened with great interest to what he said and to the anxieties that were expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

[Mr. John Carlisle]

The United Kingdom Agricultural Supply Trade Association is especially delighted by my hon. Friend's appreciation of the BASIS scheme. The trade understands that BASIS is a necessary policing part of the Bill and of the entire industry. We have made some worthwhile contributions on a fairly delicate subject, and agriculture will be the better for the remarks that were made here and in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Northern Ireland Act 1974

7.19 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 4th June, be approved.

I ask the House this evening to renew the provisions by which a number of Governments have administered Northern Ireland for more than a decade. These powers are unusually wide compared with those of other Ministers. I do not mean to rehearse how and why direct rule was imposed because that might be to blow on embers which are perhaps best left to cool. But I need to answer the reasonable question why today for the eleventh time a Secretary of State comes to this Dispatch Box to ask the House that direct rule be continued. It is certainly not because the Government wish to retain the full powers which my colleagues and I now exercise. The record shows otherwise. All my predecessors have tried to find ways of divesting themselves of many of those powers to elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland. Neither they nor I desire to continue to take those decisions, many of which are detailed, which are better taken within the Province about, for example, education, housing and industrial development.

The reason why these almost continuous efforts to devolve power have not so far succeeded are familiar to the House. They are essentially the same reasons for which on other occasions we have asked the House to make special provisions for special efforts to establish the security and maintain the economy of the Province. We are wholly and rightly committed to maintaining the status of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom so long as a majority of the people there so wish. I see no prospect of the majority changing their views on that matter, but the majority community live city by city, town by town, county by county alongside a minority community, and the future of the two communities is inextricably linked. There is no new line to be drawn, and no ingenious new arrangement which could be devised to separate their futures.

In many aspects of life that causes few problems. Recently, I visited a thriving factory in an area which has been deeply troubled. There members of the two communities work side by side in complete harmony, so far as I can see. Any Member of the House who visits Northern Ireland for more than an hour or two with a reasonably open mind will know that that is a commonplace experience. In many aspects of human activity there is no difficulty whatever. No one who saw the people of Belfast welcome Barry McGuigan can doubt that fact. But that harmony does not extend into political life or into the search among politicians for institutions which would enable the two communities to form some kind of partnership in the formation or administration of policy.

In the Northern Ireland Act 1982 Parliament laid down that any system for the devolution of powers must command "widespread acceptance". That was defined in the preceding White Paper as meaning acceptability to both sides of the community. That must be right, and not merely as an expression of political philosophy or idealism. Simple majority rule, as in the past, would leave the minority in perpetual opposition and would not in practice lead to a stable society. A system which did not command such widespread acceptance would simply not survive. Let us make a practical test. If I were to come to the House and propose a new constitutional system for Northern Ireland, and if I then had to add, "By the way, I have to tell the House that this new system will be boycotted or otherwise rejected by the constitutional representatives of one or the other community," I would be laughed out of court, and rightly so. The common sense of hon. Members would lead them to ask, "What on earth is the point of that?" The search for acceptance must continue, and I shall say more about that in a minute. Meanwhile, direct rule must continue.

The Parliament of the United Kingdom cannot shirk its duty to provide good government for Northern Ireland. Direct rule is a firm and fair framework, and in many ways we should be proud of it. However, it is right that hon. Members should have a regular opportunity to reflect their views on the state of affairs in Northern Ireland, which is far from satisfactory, and to suggest how it might be improved. Therefore, I should give the House a brief but wide-ranging account of our stewardship. The House does not have many opportunities to debate Northern Ireland in general terms, and this is an occasion which we should seize.

I make no apology for saying again that for the Government security policy must come first. Certainly there is a link, as I have often been told, between security and politics, but no accommodation is possible with the killers. We must drain the support on which the killers depend, but the terrorist paramilitary organisations must be defeated by a robust security policy. I shall say more about that policy when we debate the renewal of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 later this evening, but the essence is simple. We want people in Northern Ireland to be able to go about their everyday pursuits free from the fear of violence.

The security forces have made substantial progress in recent years in bringing that about. Their skill, patience and bravery call for our gratitude and, more important to them, for our help and co-operation. All of us, especially those of us in public life, have a duty to help in that way. Neither the Government nor the House can be satisfied while terrorists are able to carry out brutal murders such as those of recent years and, indeed, of recent weeks. We must continue to speak out and bring to justice those who have committed these crimes, and to do all that we can to deny them money, weapons, recruits and explosives. That means doing many things, including intensifying co-operation with the Republic of Ireland. No one who knows the facts about security in the Province and who is serious about improving the present position can deny the need for intensified co-operation. The security forces will continue to work impartially within the law to prevent violence. Meanwhile, it is important that a bomb in Newry or in a village in Fermanagh should be regarded by the House as being as important as a bomb in the Rubens hotel because the suffering which can result from it is as great.

Violence flaws Ireland's image abroad. It deters investors whose talents and resources are needed to complement the inventiveness and skilled application of our people in Northern Ireland. Unemployment, as I come across it week by week, is just under 21 per cent. across the Province and much higher in some areas, and it is a tragic problem. We must understand the personal frustration and waste of talent which it causes. But output, investment and the number of people in employment are rising. A record number of new jobs is being created in small businesses as the business climate improves. Shorts, our largest manufacturing employer, has won important orders recently from the Royal Air Force, the United States air force and China. The shipyard Harland and Wolff has a full immediate order book, although much work is needed to improve its finances. There is a battery of special employment training measures for adults and young people. Since 1982 Northern Ireland has had a two-year youth training programme — well ahead of Great Britain.

Regarding the economy, it is necessary, but not enough, to spend money to mitigate our difficulties. It is not in Northern Ireland's interests to become increasingly dependent on public funds any more than it is in the nation's interests as a whole. That dependence today is somewhat too high. We must therefore work to encourage wealth-creating enterprise and industry. I should like to see an expanding private sector in Northern Ireland because I do not believe that Northern Ireland is exempt from the lessons and experiences of other democratic countries. I am sure that an expanding private sector is the best foundation for prosperity.

If Northern Ireland is to improve its security and prosper, it must develop links with our closest neighbours and further afield.

The Republic of Ireland is a member, with us, of the European Community. It is a country with which Northern Ireland shares the same island, and with which it shares many common interests and a common security threat. A significant part of the community in Northern Ireland wishes to see fuller recognition of its Irish identity and to see it reflected in the conduct of relations between the United Kingdom and the Republic. This, as the two Heads of Government agreed at Chequers, must be respected, as must the wish of the majority in Northern Ireland to retain its British identity and to remain a part of the United Kingdom.

We have maintained a dialogue with the Irish Government. Its basis was clearly spelt out in a communiqué issued after the Chequers summit last November. In particular, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach agreed that the identities of the majority and the minority communities in Northern Ireland should be recognised, respected and reflected in the structures and processes of Northern Ireland in ways acceptable to both communities. They reaffirmed that the constitutional position of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom would not be changed without the consent of the majority in Northern Ireland. That was a reaffirmation by both Governments, not just by ours.

There has been speculation recently — I make no complaint about that — about the talks which are going on between the British and Irish Governments. Hon. Members would not expect me to reveal details of discussions which, by their nature, must for the time being remain confidential. The talks are a serious attempt by the two Governments to develop relations within the framework set out in the summit communiqué. The Irish Government have a legitimate interest in what goes on in Northern Ireland, especially in those matters which affect the minority community. We do not know the outcome of the present discussions, or whether they will succeed. If an acceptable basis can be found within the terms of last

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

November's communiqué and within the terms of what was then said by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for deepening our relationship with the Irish Republic, it will benefit both communities in Northern Ireland and relations between the two Governments, but it will not be a substitute for developing a sense of partnership within Northern Ireland or for seeking arrangements, in consultation with our political parties, for the better administration of the province.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I accept that the Government of the Republic have an interest in Northern Ireland, but will my right hon. Friend define what he means by "legitimate"?

Mr. Hurd: It is natural that Ministers in the south should, as they do from time to time, feel and express views about what happens in the north. My predecessors and I have differed from other hon. Members and some elected representatives in the Province on that point. However, I have already stated the conclusions that the Government have reached on it.

I have said that, whatever happens to the discussions between London and Dublin about the external track, it will not be a substitute for the search for political and constitutional progress inside Northern Ireland.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Before the Secretary of State leaves the external track, will he tell us what progress has been made with the United States Administration in recent months, in particular within the context of the treaty arrangements, and to what extent they can contribute to a reduction in threats to security?

Mr. Hurd: They have, and I have no complaints to make about the degree of co-operation that we have from the present United States Administration; the supplementary treaty to which the hon. Gentleman referred is the latest valuable example of that. It is not just a matter for the Administration. It is a matter for those people in the United States who feel an obligation to do something to help in Northern Ireland. They have too often in the past been tempted to discharge what they see as that obligation by making contributions which go into IRA funds.

I hope that we have made some progress—during my visit there a few months ago I tried to urge this forward—towards showing that that is a thoroughly dangerous and wicked way of proceeding, and that there are plenty of legitimate ways in which Americans with ties in Ireland can help the progress of the economies and societies of both parts of the island.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the Secretary of State spell out in detail how he feels the southern Government should make representations on behalf of Northern Ireland citizens who find themselves in a minority in the north of Ireland, on the political, constitutional issue? Does he believe that the Ministers of the Dublin Republican Government should have access to him to represent those people and make representations on their behalf? Have they not political representatives elected to this House and elsewhere to make those representations on their behalf? Why should Ministers of a foreign Government have that opportunity over and above that available to other citizens of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hurd: Those Ministers have that opportunity now. They will continue to have it unless I were to take a line which I believe most people would regard as strange—that neither I, the Foreign Secretary nor the Prime Minister should meet representatives of the Irish Republic. Such meetings occur and we read about one another's remarks in the newspapers. Those opportunities exist and are taken. The question is whether the present system is satisfactory and whether it can be improved. That is what the discussions are about.

I shall now deal with political developments in Northern Ireland. Since taking up office in September last year, I have taken on the task which my predecessor had of trying to determine which form of government would command the widest level of acceptance and respect in Northern Ireland.

I began to explore with the leaders of the main constitutional political parties the more tolerant tone and recognition of the interests of others which was clearly evident in policy documents published earlier last year. I encouraged them to consider among themselves how they might build on these expressions of intent in a practical way. Recognising the difficulties of negotiating in public, I favoured private, informal discussions without commitment. I am grateful for the way in which the party leaders responded to that and for the frankness which they showed. There were some indications, although tentative, I must confess, first from one then another, that they might be prepared to inch forward. Early this year, the prospect of the May district council elections froze even that slight willingness to move.

Before the campaigning started in earnest, I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten), the Under-Secretary, to talk to each of the parties away from the glare of publicity to establish more precisely the extent of any common ground and their differences. The results of his conversations redefined and clarified the positions. I am now better placed to decide how to take matters forward.

In considering how best we can make progress, I have to take account of the results of the district council elections on 15 May and to assess their impact and long-term effect on Northern Ireland's political life. As in previous elections, about 60 per cent. of the electorate voted for parties supporting the Union. They used the free elections system which are traditional in the Province to reaffirm support for the Union without ambiguity.

Within the minority the media have tended to gloss over the steadiness of support for constitutional nationalism shown by the 17·8 per cent. of the electorate which voted for the SDLP. The immediate reaction of commentators emphasised the fact that 11·8 per cent. gave their vote to Sinn Fein—a party which openly supports the use of violence for political ends. Its total vote was lower than in the 1983 general election and in the 1984 European elections. That was partly because our new anti-personation legislation was becoming effective, although many people will not agree with me about that.

It is a sad but not new fact that between 80,000 and 100,000 people in Northern Ireland over the years, when given the chance, have voted and will continue to vote for a republicanism which espouses violence.

I have been urged by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) and others to proscribe Sinn Fein before the elections. I have thought hard about it. I decided not to because such a step would have impaired the freedom of elections in Northern Ireland and the whole basis on which Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom. It is not as a result of some colonial system but through the free choice of the majority of the people who live there, repeatedly asserted in wholly free elections.

If I had proscribed before the elections, Sinn Fein and others would certainly have tried to claim that violence was the only course open to them and that they represented the bulk of nationalist voters. We now know that they do not. The 11·8 per cent. does not form a winning hand, unless opponents play into it.

I repudiate Sinn Fein's undisguised support for the use of violence. As I have said, we shall use every means within the law to distinguish between those in Northern Ireland who believe in and practise constitutional methods to achieve their objectives and those who connive in violence, from whichever part of the community they come. I add that we shall keep under review the effectiveness of the law in these respects.

Before the elections we knew that a large number of Sinn Fein councillors would create problems for the Government and for other elected councillors. The Government have to sort out such difficulties within the law. Likewise, we expect district councils to act lawfully.

I understand that feelings inside and outside councils run particularly high in the wake of attacks which murder and injure. If I did not understand that, it would have been pointed out to me many times since May. Elected representatives have every right, and have a duty, to express the revulsion which all decent people feel. They also have a responsibility to defuse tension and to prevent retaliation. The language and behaviour which have marred some council meetings serve only to damage the democratic process and give welcome publicity to Sinn Fein.

I am surprised at the way in which some opponents of Sinn Fein feel compelled to build up that organisation by their choice of tactics. We should not lose sight of those many councils which have made equitable, sensible arrangements to conduct their business. I read in The Guardian this morning that the presence of Sinn Fein had reduced local government in the Province to a shambles. That is wholly inaccurate. Such a conclusion can be reached only by people who look at the councils in which there has been trouble and ignore the councils in which there has been none. The right way to deal with a repugnant minority within a minority is to outmanoeuvre, outvote and outwit them.

Faced with the facts that I have outlined, we must continue to search for better political arrangements for the government of Northern Ireland. I have explained the basis on which we wish to do that. Ultimately Parliament must determine the arrangements. We could continue to work through direct rule. I am considering closely a number of measures—as the House has been told—which could be used to remove old irritants to the minority community. I am anxious to ensure the effectiveness of arrangements which underpin equality of opportunity, particularly in employment.

I know that the present Order in Council procedures of legislation are criticised, particularly on the Unionist Benches. There is, for example, a case for making adjustments to the transferred category by removing matters such as banking, building societies and financial services, where efficiency points to the desirability of United Kingdom-wide legislation and administration by United Kingdom Departments and where the scope for separate legislation or policy initiative by any future devolved administration would be more apparent than real. I am certainly open to argument on adjustments in that direction.

We should recognise that nearly three quarters of recent Orders in Council cover legislation which, for some reason, is different in substance as between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. On many matters Northern Ireland Members are among the first to stress the need for such differences. One has only to think of the wide range of social legislation to understand that.

Whatever their differences, Northern Ireland politicians —and Northern Ireland Ministers—cannot escape their responsibility to those who vote for them and to this Parliament to see common ground. I am much clearer about the difficulties than I was some months ago. There are always problems of timing. The atmosphere might be right for one party, but another will produce an insurmountable obstacle to dialogue. People may say that it is better to wait until after the district elections, until after the marching season, until after the outcome of the Anglo-Irish talks—and so on and so on.

The Government have been and will continue to be patient because we recognise the difficulties. However, never-ending excuses to avoid reasoning wear thin after a time, particularly when one considers how Northern Ireland could benefit from an agreement, however modest, between the constitutional representatives of the two parts of the community. I do not think that it is in the interests of the people of Northern Ireland, and I am sure that it is not in the interests of the people of the rest of the United Kingdom, that we should be patient for ever. People cannot claim to want political progress if they refuse to co-operate with, or even to talk to, each other.

The Northern Ireland Assembly still has a part to play. The Assembly's scrutiny of proposed legislation and policy changes has helped my ministerial colleagues, myself and the officials who advise us to tune our policies and proposals more accurately to particular local sensitivities.

I hope that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) will accept that that is our experience. I wish that I could say that some of the Assembly's plenary debates have been as constructive as the work by some of its committees. Some of the speeches in the plenary Assembly, if read outside the Province, would confirm the worst fears of Northern Ireland's friends.

This was not the role which Parliament intended. The Assembly was established primarily as a framework in which acceptable arrangements for the return of greater responsibility to locally elected representatives could be developed by those representatives. So far, the Assembly has not met Parliament's intentions, despite the useful work which it has done. We shall have to decide—not now, but early next year—in the light of what happens whether fresh Assembly elections should be held in the autumn of 1986.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Does the Secretary of State agree that the experience of the Assembly confirms the view of the SDLP—the only party which has had the integrity to take that view publicly—that the Assembly could not provide a framework for agreement? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that that view is based on hard experience, not only of what has happened in Northern Ireland but of what the political parties have said in statements, that in no circumstances do they wish to share responsibility with SDLP representatives? That experience has been confirmed and reconfirmed by the attitudes that have been adopted in local councils since the elections. There is no way in which the Assembly will provide a framework for agreement. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that that is the position?

Mr. Hurd: All the constitutional party leaders and many of their supporters have told me from time to time of their hard experience, which convinces them that it is no good entering into dicussion with their colleagues——

Mr. Hume: With Assemblymen.

Mr. Hurd: I am coming to Assemblymen. They say that hard experience has taught them that the other parties are not to be trusted and will not make any real concessions. I have heard this over and over again but I do not believe that that provides an adequate reason for not trying again.

The disappointment which many of us feel at the way that the Assembly has not so far met the main purpose for which it was created should not blind us to the fact that one of the difficulties has been the decision taken by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues not to have any part in it. It would have been very much easier for the Report Committee of the Assembly in making the progress that I and many others would like to see it make if the hon. Gentleman had at least authorised discussions with it, if not joining it. My conclusion is not the same as that which the hon. Gentleman has drawn.

The search for agreement, for mutual accommodations, in Northern Ireland must continue whatever the outcome of the Anglo-Irish talks. I am taking stock with the political leaders at present. The scheme of legislative and executive devolution that is in the Northern Ireland Act 1982 is practical and coherent. I am prepared to consider other forms of devolution if their advocates can show that they meet the criterion of widespread acceptance throughout the community. I could imagine, for example, a scheme in which executive power only was devolved in some areas of policy. If new arrangements are to be stable and to benefit the people of Northern Ireland and of Great Britain, the constitutional political parties which represent both parts of the community must be prepared to work these arrangements together. During the coming months we shall have to encourage the parties to address these matters actively and seriously.

Meanwhile, direct rule must continue. It is often denigrated and receives scant praise. Too little attention is paid to what has been achieved over a decade by successive Governments and the people of Northern Ireland. I pay tribute especially to the public servants. Many tributes are rightly paid to the security forces, but the Northern Ireland civil servants and other civilian public servants of the Province deserve a tribute during the debate. They and the people as a whole have kept cool heads amidst all the tragedy of the terrorism and the hardship in recent years of a severe worldwide economic recession.

This shows in the combined effort that has been made in the form of resources from the United Kingdom as a whole, the understanding of the House and the performance of the people of Northern Ireland. This shows as we go about the cities and the counties. This shows in the roads, schools, leisure centres, health centres, hospitals and the very high standard of new housing. We shall continue to invest in Northern Ireland for the present and in future. We want the people of Northern Ireland to live in greater safety and prosperity. We are prepared to continue the present substantial effort by the whole country to make this possible. We are not satisfied with the results of that effort so far. We shall continue to do all that we can to eradicate terrorism. We shall continue the search for partnership between the communities.

Meanwhile, the government of the Province must be carried on efficiently, firmly and fairly. I therefore invite the House to agree to extend the life of the Northern Ireland Act 1974 for a further 12 months.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): We are discussing the extension of arrangements for the government of Northern Ireland which, as the Secretary of State recognises, no one would have sought as a first option. Like so many aspects of the history of Ireland, they exist, not because anyone wanted them, or planned them but simply as a consequence of what has gone before, each chapter unfolding with the predestined inevitability of a Shakespearian tragedy.

The arrangements entail that the people of Northern Ireland can influence only marginally the electoral fortunes of the party which controls the machinery of government, which formulates the policies, and takes the decisions on which their fortunes depend. That is not a healthy situation. Representative government and the politics of electoral choice do not operate for the people of Northern Ireland.

This morning in Committee the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) observed that the gas industry is the latest example of the casualties which flow from direct rule. It is not the case that the British Government want to run the affairs of Northern Ireland. Those who insist that the Government are clinging to Northern Ireland as a miser clings to his gold are simply wrong. It is not an example of a colonial power reluctant to let go. Indeed, the reverse is true; the British Government do not want to rule Northern Ireland, because it entails finding parliamentary time for matters which they would prefer to be discussed elsewhere. There is no electoral advantage for the Government. Frankly, they do not care about it. Northern Ireland is simply an additional problem, a complicating factor in their work.

Decisions which, if they concerned any other part of the United Kingdom, would take the form of primary legislation—Second Reading, Committee and Report, with amendments and concessions, all the circumstances and safeguards of parliamentary democracy — are replaced for the people of Northern Ireland by non-amendable orders debated for such time as is available, often an hour and a half at some period in the week which has not been pre-empted for more important business. That may be inevitable until we find an alternative which secures a measure of agreement, but we might have hoped that, understanding the situation, the Government would have shown some sensitivity, some sympathy for the needs of the people of Northern Ireland.

We are discussing two orders of great importance to the people of Northern Ireland, involving matters on which feelings run high and which evoke strong emotions. If they related to any other part of the United Kingdom, each would have been accorded at least a full day's debate. The Government believe that in the case of Northern Ireland they can crowd both into the same day. I confess at once that when we, the Opposition, were told of this arrangement, we accepted it. Perhaps that was because we are conditioned to accept that Northern Ireland is not accorded the same priorities as other regions. Having achieved that, the Government decided to push matters further. They decided that not only should the two orders share a day, but that they should not even have a day, and they should be discussed after other business.

The Government gave an undertaking that at least the other business would not proceed beyond 6 o'clock. They said that if it seemed likely to proceed beyond that hour they would report progress. I understand that unforeseen difficulties arise, but the point of a promise is that it is kept even when it is inconvenient.

The Government's business managers do not normally disregard their promises. What I resent is the attitude that promises on Northern Ireland business do not really matter. No issue of comparable importance relating to other regions would have received such insulting treatment. We have a Government whose business managers simply do not care a tinker's cuss for Northern Ireland or its people.

We must draw one of two conclusions. Either the Government are not capable of controlling their business managers and the Whips Office tail wags the policy dog, or the importance that the business managers attach to Northern Ireland reflects the importance attached to it by the Government. I absolve the Secretary of State from that allegation and I do not call on him to comment on his colleagues. I believe that their attitude to Northern Ireland business is a cross that he, too, has to bear.

But two comments have to be made. The business of the House is about the rights of minorities, and part of their sanction is that no party is in a majority for ever. I say to the present Government, as I ventured to say to political leaders on both sides in Northern Ireland, that one good reason for respecting the rights of those with whom we disagree is that those who in one context and at one time are in a majority, in a different situation and a different year are appealing for the rights of minorities. History has a habit of turning every situation on its head. There is no instance in the history books of a dominating group which stayed dominant for ever, and we know that for the Government time is running out.

Secondly, if daily life in Northern Ireland is to improve and there is to be any redress of its real problems—unemployment, financial hardship and bad living conditions, the problems that we were discussing in Committee this morning—something has to be changed. We all hope for a solution to the constitutional questions which beset Northern Ireland. The solution may come about through a process rather than a single event, but that will be next year or the year after, or some other time in the future. It is now that people are despairing—like the people I visited last week, in the Divis flats, whose afflictions the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) was kind enough to discuss with me today, or the people I hope to visit shortly in some districts of east Belfast.

If the people of Northern Ireland are to feel confident in constitutional, democratic politics, and if they are to have any expectation from the ballot box, one of two things must happen. Either the Government's managers must take the affairs of Northern Ireland more seriously, even though their electoral fortunes are not dependent on Northern Ireland electors, or if there is no future in that, we must find a way to return a greater share of executive power to elected bodies in Northern Ireland. I take the point by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) that that has to be on the basis that there is some sharing of power.

We had hoped to hear from the Secretary of State what progress had been made. I appreciate that these things are always difficult, but whatever differences there may be about ultimate objectives, interim solutions or simply the way forward, no one wants to retain the status quo. That is unloved because it is unlovable. It is axiomatic that we all want to find a way forward—however we may differ as to the solution that we favour, no one would choose the status quo as the ideal form of government. No one is enamoured of the economic opportunities lost or the waste of resources following the troubles. So far as I know, there is no one who has not tired of the posturing and the sloganising, and, above all, everyone is sick of the violence and the fear.

We discovered last year that people on both sides of the sectarian political divide, as the Secretary of State said, were prepared to explore ways of walking together in peace. There are groups who are working assiduously and positively to build bridges, although we do not pay tribute often enough to people such as the Corrymeela community, Women Together, the Ulster People's college, or Lagan college. I hope that one day, history will accord them greater recognition than their own generation has done. But they reflect what many people are saying, although sometimes understandably they hesitate to say it aloud in their own community: "Let us try to live together in harmony, even with those from whom we differ. Let the two traditions not only tolerate each other but enrich each other, and let us offer the next generation of children a better inheritance as a result."

We had hoped to hear from the Government about the progress of their conversations with the Government of the Republic. Shortly after the summit last year, when the Government were trying to mend the gaping tear in their fences made by the brick that the Prime Minister had let fall at her press conference, we heard of a possible further summit in February and then heard that it might be in April and then probably in September. We heard that the talks were ranging over some practical issues such as a possible Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier and a possible office for officials from the Republic in Belfast to make representations on behalf of those who wanted to seek their aid, although I understand that that is not necessarily welcome to people such as the hon. Member for Antrim North (Rev. Ian Paisley).

There was talk of a jurisdiction to try terrorist offences on the basis of a common judiciary, and leaks have it that the separation of powers had extended so far that the judiciary was hardly on speaking terms with the Executive. There was talk of a closer liaison between the police, repairing the bridges at the highest level and with a kind of common recruitment policy on a less exalted level, so that, in a phrase I heard the Foreign Minister of the Republic use some months ago, a young Nationalist could join the police without being any the less a Nationalist.

I understand that we cannot ask the Secretary of State to offer details on such questions while discussions on them are proceeding. I wish not to embarrass the Government but rather to encourage them to pursue those talks in detail, in private rather than public, provided that we are given a progress report when the time is opportune.

[Mr. Peter Archer]

So I am grateful for what the Secretary of State has said, but how long is the time scale likely to be? As he said, this cannot be allowed to drag on for ever. I am grateful, too, for what he said about discussions within Northern Ireland between the Government and the political leaders of the various groups, and I agree that a few months ago there was an atmosphere of tolerance that would not have been possible two or three years earlier. But I should be grateful for a little more information as to whether those talks are still proceeding, because that was not clear from what the Secretary of State said, although I understand what he said about their progress being interrupted by the local elections. Can we expect a report in due course?

But there is no prospect of agreement unless people are ready to talk together. There can be no resolution of differences unless political leaders will discuss matters with those whom they differ. And if there is one thing which men of violence are anxious to achieve, it is to ensure that that does not happen.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I repeat what I have said many times before. It may be felt that it does not require repeating, but for the avoidance of misunderstanding, I repeat that we have no sympathy for violence as a means to achieve political ends. Not only do we not believe that the ends justify the means, but we do not believe that worthwhile ends can be achieved by violent means. Murder, and fear and intimidation, cannot give rise to a peaceful and just society. We do not believe that peace and justice can grow in soil that has been soaked with blood.

We would tell that message to men of violence on both sides of the sectarian divide and we, like the Secretary of State, repudiate Sinn Fein's undisguised support for the use of violence. So if there was a plan to spread injury and death indiscriminately in holiday resorts, and if that plan was frustrated by the vigilance of the police, we all share in the rejoicing. But if it leads to the consequence that people refuse to continue talking together, and if it brings political discussion to a standstill, then the men of violence will have achieved their objective after all.

Violence in Northern Ireland feeds on three factors. They have all to be tackled simultaneously, because when they are resolved, the men of violence on both sides will be isolated. Until they are resolved, there will always be a reservoir of potential recruits for the paramilitaries, particularly among the young. First, there are the economic and social conditions in which people are living. Unless they believe that the ballot box can offer some redress for their grievances, we must not be surprised if those who speak of alternatives to the ballot box find someone to listen. Secondly, there is the danger that the methods we use to combat violence may be seen as unfair and oppressive, and they may actually contribute to the problem. I will say no more about that as it will be discussed in the next debate.

In this debate I simply want to make an appeal for a willingness to meet and talk. If that sounds naive, we have no babes or sucklings to say it, and I am convinced that someone has to say it. The Labour party does not believe that meeting people entails agreeing with them, or indicating approval or endorsing their claim to respectability. It means simply what it says, meeting them and listening. If in Northern Ireland I met only those with whom I was already in complete agreement, I would spend a very solitary existence.

I hesitate to endanger our new alliance with the Ulster Unionist parties which was launched so successfully this morning, but I hope that they will receive my comment in the spirit in which it is intended. I believe that we can differ without rancour, and by ventilating our differences we may go some way towards resolving them.

A fortnight ago a working group from the National Executive Committee of the Labour party and of the parliamentary Labour party visited Northern Ireland. We wanted to talk to people from as many different view points as possible. There had to be some criterion of whom we invited to meet us, so we invited every party which had a representative elected to a public body. We did not expect to agree with them all.

In fact, that was impossible because we knew they would be saying inconsistent things, but we believed that if we listened to what they had to say that might help us to understand their point of view and perhaps might even allow us to act as a catalyst in pointing out where the common ground lay. Sinn Fein was within that criterion because it had elected councillors. Sinn Fein agreed to meet us. We did not make it a condition that it modified its views before we met, and Sinn Fein did not impose a condition that we express any sympathy with its position. It was our judgment that we should make no distinction between the parties that fell within our criterion.

The Unionist parties did not agree with our judgment. That is strange because they are so anxious to see nationalists pursuing their objectives by taking part in constitutional democratic politics, fighting elections, representing their constituents and taking their place in committees that when they do, they will not talk to them.

If the nationalist parties are not serious about representing their constituents, and if they do not want to promote the work of the councils, why not call their bluff? Why not offer them the opportunity and see whether they take it?

Rev. Ian Paisley: If terrorists in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency who had murdered people stood for election and were successful, would he talk to them? Would his party enter into talks with such people?

Mr. Archer: If anyone in my constituency was known to have committed murder, I would press the authorities to bring him to justice. The law should take its course. That would be the proper way to deal with such people. If there were people who said they believed in murder, I would disagree with them very strongly and would understand those who felt indignant about it, but I would not say that I was not prepared to talk to them, because something may emerge from such talks. Certainly, if they represented the people who had elected them, I would not expect that support to terminate if they were in a position to say that they were not given the chance to carry out their mandate.

But I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. It is a matter of judgment, and we could have been wrong. We shall have to agree to disagree about it, and in democratic politics there are a number of questions like that. But delegates from the Ulster Unionist party said that they were going further than that. Not only would they not talk to Sinn Fein, they said that they would not talk to anyone who talked to it.

Because they disagreed with our judgment, they would not talk to us either. So they went off in a sulk and would not meet us. I do not know how far they are prepared to extend this. Perhaps they will not talk to anyone who has talked to anyone who has talked to Sinn Fein, and it will end with no one speaking to anyone else. They would not talk to our working group. That was our misfortune, because the purpose of the whole exercise was to hear what everyone had to say. We may have to reach our conclusions as best we can without hearing the views of the Ulster Unionist party and the people they represent.

Happily, they do not seem to speak for the whole of the party, which does not uniformly adopt quite so rigid an attitude. Last week, after Mr. Golden, the comptroller of the New York city pension fund—a fair and open-minded man whom I had the pleasure of meeting—had met representatives of Sinn Fein, the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) did not think it right to refuse to meet him. I applaud the hon. Gentleman. I think he showed greater vision and wisdom than some of his colleagues.

If the Government want to see a resolution of the political differences, they too can set the kind of example on which the Secretary of State touched this evening. I appreciate the difficulties which confront the Government, but they seem to recognise that when members of a political party seek election to public office and are returned as councillors at the polls, it is absurd to say that central Government will not discuss council business with them or listen to them when they wish to speak about environmental health, clean food and the prevention of epidemics. The Government recognise that if we condemn people—and rightly so—for putting their trust in the gun rather then the ballot box, it is inconsistent, when such people use the ballot box, to refuse them access to the machinery of constitutional politics.

But Ministers will not front that operation themselves, although they recognise all that. They leave it to their officials to talk to them. It is neither courageous nor honest to leave officials to do what for any reason they are not prepared to do themselves.

I do not believe that Lord Whitelaw or the Secretary of State, when a junior Minister, were signifying their agreement with Sinn Fein or with anything it said when they met representatives in July 1972, nor were they endorsing Sinn Fein's view on violence. Possibly they were wiser in their generation than some of their successors.

If there is ever to be an end to divisions in Northern Ireland, if people are ever to live in peace with their neighbours, and if there is to be any end of the tribalism, the violence, the waste and the tragedy of it all, there must be some arrangement about how people can live together in one island and manage their business and administer their affairs. There is no hope of that unless they can seek agreement through conversations and constitutional processes with those with whom they do not already agree.

This morning we all urged on the Government the virtues of an open mind. Hon. Members on the Unionist Benches added their voices to ours, and that was greatly appreciated. They did it extremely effectively.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): We will do it here.

Mr. Archer: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. We were grateful, because the Government's record on consultation leaves much to be desired. But in fairness I must accept that if an open mind is a virtue in the Government, it is no less a virtue in the rest of us. So I urge right hon. and hon. Members on other Benches to reflect on a truth of which I must constantly remind myself—that it is not a sign of weakness for any of us to consider it possible that we may be wrong.

I do not propose to expound the Opposition's views on the ultimate solution to the problems of Northern Ireland. I shall even abstain from enlarging on our interim solutions. I have spoken of them in detail on other occasions, and no doubt some of my hon. Friends will wish to speak about them tonight. I simply want to appeal to all those who for various reasons are tempted to practise the politics of abstention to recognise that, if there is to be a stable settelement, they should be part of it, and that one does not achieve a settlement by refusing to talk and listen.

We shall not seek to deny the Government their order tonight. For the moment there is no alternative to direct rule, but that is something we should all be seeking to change. I have avoided saying anything which should divide us substantially or dramatically from the Government, because to do so would not be helpful at this stage, but the Government cannot simply wait on events. It is their responsibility to take the lead in seeking a better way of administering the affairs of Northern Ireland.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) made a plea for talks and appealed to us all to resolve the problems of Northern Ireland by engaging in talks. He seemed to equate that with what we in the House of Commons regard as consultation and co-operation between different parties and groupings of parties. I must tell him that there is really no true parallel.

There is no problem in this House in getting Members and groupings to come together. We who represent parties and constituencies in Northern Ireland wish to come together when we consider it to be in the best interests of our people to do so. However, it is a very different matter to expect us to get together around a table and arrive at some improbable constitutional structure. To do that would be utterly unthinkable in this House, even within the normal context of parliamentary democracy as it is generally understood, not only in Britain but in most of the civilised world—including the bits that were formerly civilised—to which we have bequeathed our system of parliamentary democracy.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West and the Secretary of State should accept that it is rather unfair to expect party leaders to get together and find an alternative to direct rule. We complain about direct rule. Indeed, the Secretary of Sate came near to chiding us for so complaining. But he is generous enough to take account of the fact that we did not bring about direct rule. That was brought about by a former Conservative Government. Admittedly, the Secretary of State was not a member of that Government, but he was not without influence in that Administration, and I say that in the kindest possible way.

When the right hon. Gentleman is reflecting on that period, he might let us into a secret. Perhaps he would tell us what alternatives were considered. Surely no Government in their right mind would abolish a system of devolved government, in Northern Ireland or anywhere else, without having a clear idea of what would be put in its place. I do not believe that at that time they addressed their minds to that. However, shortly afterwards they presented what they knew in their heart of hearts was unworkable. I refer to the 1973 Act and all that flowed from it.

The House of Commons is in danger of making itself look ludicrous, or of permitting the Government to make it look ridiculous, by referring to the words "interim period extension" in the order. That form of words implies that we are dealing with a temporary measure. "Interim" is the sort of word one uses if one's house is being demolished and reconstructed. The occupant may have to live in a caravan as an interim arrangement. The caravan dweller will tolerate such conditions for a month or two. Indeed, he may be able to survive an entire winter under such conditions, as many people are obliged to do.

Thereafter, he would become extremely impatient, and I fear that his patience would snap totally if, towards the end of the first year, the clerk of works in charge of the building tapped on the aluminium door of the caravan and said, "Sorry, old chap, but we shall have to defer everything for another 12 months." That, incidentally, is the type of well-worn phrase that has been used annually, in June, by successive Secretaries of State of Governments of various complexions in this House in the context of tonight's order.

One Oxford dictionary defines "interim" as "meanwhile" and gives, as a secondary interpretation,

"during the time that comes between."

We are entitled to ask, between what? Is it between one Stormont Government and another? As a description, I suppose that was reasonably accurate from 1972 to 1973 and from 1974 to 1975. However, the phrase was wearing more than a little thin by 1982, which was a watershed year for Northern Ireland. In 1982—10 years after the abolition of Stormont—the Government made the word "interim" inapplicable, for they introduced the 1982 Act, even though the House of Commons regarded it as unworkable.

It was an item of legislation which so bewildered the majority of right hon. and hon. Members that they reacted in two different ways. The Opposition could neither speak nor vote, and Government Members excused their support for the measure on the ground—I repeat a comment made to me at the time by many hon. Members—that it would not work anyway. Despite the pleas of those of us who were directed to make it work, the unworkable Act is still with us, and I am afraid that I see no inclination, particularly following the Secretary of State's speech tonight, on the part of the Government to amend it.

The Secretary of State rightly said that so far we have not applied the test which he thought should be applied to any proposal that might come forward within the meaning of the word "proposal" under the 1982 Act. He suggested as a test that for any structure to be acceptable it would need—I refer to the proposal for the formation of a Government—widespread acceptance. In other words, whether it had widespread acceptance would be the test.

I am afraid that if the right hon. Gentleman attempted to apply that test here, he would never have a Government, for there could never be a Government with widespread acceptance in this House. If I am told that Northern Ireland is different and that the same sort of problems do not exist in this part of the kingdom, then I must ask, without becoming involved in monetarist arguments, whether the 3 million-plus unemployed in this island do not warrant an experiment in power-sharing, with a coming together of the leaders of the two main parties. In saying that, I do not entirely exclude the Members on the alliance Bench. Surely the 3 million-plus unemployed are entitled to expect the party leaders in this House to get together to try to work out a solution to the serious problem that affects them all.

Reference is often made to the way in which this island is developing into two nations. What is being done to bridge that gap? Is there not a case for a coalition, or at least an exploration to see how far it is possible to get with the formation of a coalition, to prevent that gulf between the north and south in this island becoming unbridgable?

Meanwhile, the Report Committee of the Assembly has entered on the second year of its deliberations, frustrated and shackled with a near-impossible task. Nevertheless, the Government insist on the use of the word "interim" —or perhaps they are using it to mean

It is true that Ministers and those who advise them have not been helped by misguided thinking inside and outside the House, because for 15 years there has been a mistaken belief that all political movement has to be designed to placate the terrorists. It is a mistaken belief that terrorism sprang from social, economic or other alleged defects in the democratic system but, in fact, it was the other way round. That is not my opinion; it is proved in an extract from the IRA's manual dated 1968—two years before the IRA was supposed to come into existence as a reaction to majority oppression in Northern Ireland. Who are we to disbelieve the manual, because at least the IRA meant what it said. It stated:

"Our strategy if it is to succeed must be the perfect blending of Politics and violence . . . at the most opportune time and under the most favourable circumstances . . . We will not succeed in winning support for our policy and ideas by mere propaganda publicity. We must at every possible occasion involve ourselves in any agitation or issue that is part of Republican policy, and it should be made known to the public at large that Republicans are involved and helping in the particular cause at issue."

Some time later, when I was elected to the House, I drew attention in my maiden speech on 15 February 1971 to the real nature and intention of terrorists. My natural modesty prevents me from quoting from the Official Report, but it so happens that afterwards I was furnished with a copy of the Press Association report, giving an indication of what that association made of my remarks. I shall quote a few sentences which sound not so strange in 1985. The report states:

"The first demonstration of urban guerrilla warfare in Western Europe was being seen in Ulster, the Commons were told tonight. 'Our Army is meeting the onslaught with great courage' said Mr. James Molyneaux. But it had been given 'an impossible task and would be engaged on it for many years to come.' The troops endured a 'deluge of abuse' after every incident. The first page of the Anarchist's textbook apparently said charges of brutality should be made after every incident. It would be futile to get the three governments round a table because the IRA and their anarchist friends were utterly opposed to all governments. Nor could direct rule from Westminster make a scrap of difference to 'the gunmen'. Mr. Molyneaux said the questions of reforms were not relevant to the problem. IRA leaders had said they did not want reforms."

Such views were not fashionable in 1971, and they have remained largely unfashionable during the intervening 14 years. That is why successive Governments have wrongly believed that any modification of the interim period arrangements had to be considered with one eye on the terrorists in the hope that the terrorists might give tacit approval or in the hope that the changes and concessions might at least take the heat out of the terrorist campaign and somehow, in a magical way, isolate them from the community from which they sprang.

Today, in 1985, the terrorist mask has been ripped away. What concessions and administrative changes could influence the evil brotherhood of international terrorists? What softening influence would political considerations exert on minds that planned the hijacking of the American airliner, the bomb at Frankfurt airport, the mass murder on the Indian jumbo jet, the explosion in the baggage section at Tokyo airport or, more recently, the planned slaughter of holidaymakers in England's seaside towns?

We need not, after the events of the past two weeks, waste any more time on analysing the so-called causes and motivations of this murderous worldwide league. Other debates will be more appropriate for a consideration of how the civilised world can snuff out the terrorist menace, but in this debate we need only resolve that this democratically elected body—the House of Commons—should not be distracted or diverted by terrorist action or threats which conveniently coincide with occasions when decisions are in the offing. In this case, the IRA clearly intends invervening to turn the screw to force the British Government to deliver what is desired by the IRA and those who share its objective of dismantling the United Kingdom.

How the so-called IRA army council must have cheered when it yesterday heard the leader of the Liberal party unwittingly transmit the signal that it most wanted to hear when he asked the Home Secretary to agree "that this would be a good time for the Government to underline yet again their intention to continue the constructive dialogue with the Government of Ireland".—[Official Report, 25 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 776.]

The idea was that we should attempt to break the impasse. I believe that those words originated in Paul Johnson's article in The Guardian the day before when he said that blatant efforts were being made to breathe some form of life into the negotiations between London and Dublin. He referred to breaking the "impasse". It is not the impasse in negotiations about many of those worthy items of co-operation to which the Secretary of State and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West referred. It is not the impasse in negotiations about co-operation on fishing rights, animal health, tourism and all the matters that one would normally expect to be dealt with between two neighbouring friendly nations. It is very different—it is an impasse in the negotiations about starting the process of ending Northern Ireland's existence as part of the United Kingdom. It is that process which the IRA seeks to hasten. That is why the IRA considers this to be a good time for it to underline, in its rather indelicate way, the need for the British negotiators to be given another kick.

The Secretary of State conceded earlier that in his view the Government of the Irish Republic had a legitimate interest in the affairs of the minority community in Northern Ireland. One would assume that that claim was based in turn on that Government's claim that the minority in Northern Ireland—for all I know, all the citizens in Northern Ireland—are Irish subjects. If so, why do not Dublin Ministers make representations to the Secretary of State or his Cabinet colleagues about the plight of Irish citizens who reside in England, living under the same Government and having to endure the decisions made by the Cabinet of which the right hon. Gentleman is a member? Why is there such a difference in the treatment of—to be blunt about it—Irish Roman Catholics who reside in Belfast and Irish Roman Catholics who reside in Birmingham? I have addressed that question indirectly to members of the Dublin Government and there has been no answer. But as the Secretary of State attaches such great importance to the right to interfere, the right to advise and the right for the Government to concern themselves, perhaps he would attempt to seek clarification and say whether perhaps there ought to be a Minister for Irish affairs sitting in the British Cabinet because that would seem to be logical.

Coming back to the central point that all of them in Birmingham and Belfast are governed by one and the same Government, it is important to emphasise that in Northern Ireland they are being governed not by a coalition of Unionist parties but by a Government elected by the people of the United Kingdom and a Government who in the final analysis are accountable and responsible for all their actions, be it in Great Britain or Northern Ireland, to the House of Commons. The Dublin Government, before they continue to reassert that claim, must substantiate that claim and they must tell us and the Secretary of State why they seek to interfere, intervene and interest themselves in only one part of the United Kingdom.

I want to make a point about the discussions going on between London and Dublin which have caused a great deal of suspicion, I think quite unnecessarily, because there should be no problem in Her Majesty's Government taking the House of Commons into their confidence and telling them what it is all about. Because of all this suspicion, because of all the kite-flying and because of all the projections, all the rumour-mongering and all the deliberate leaks, they can hardly blame Loyalists for being a bit suspicious and, if it comes to that, they can hardly blame the IRA for imagining that, if it gets in on the act, it will expedite affairs along the road that it would wish to choose.

Hundreds of men, women and children with their buckets and spades will die because of the IRA's intention to break the impasse to which I referred earlier. Now that the eyes of all have at least been opened, let us here in this House of Commons, where we have consultation and co-operation and where we can talk to each other, devote our energies to making democracy work. After 13 years in the political trenches, do not expect that all can be put right in a single day. But today at least we can give an indication of our intention to start dismantling the colonial apparatus of direct rule.

Let no one be deterred by the mistaken notion that our efforts will be resented or resisted by anyone in Northern Ireland who believes in democracy. Who in Northern Ireland would be prepared to defend insensitive legislation by Order in Council and ministerial decree? Who in Northern Ireland can condone a regime which contemplates the passage of legislation for Great Britain only with absolutely identical legislation for Northern Ireland following on anything up to two years later?

The Secretary of State referred to the high percentage of Orders in Council which come before the House dealing especially with Northern Ireland because of Northern Ireland's special legislative background, but I think that he knows that it would not be too difficult to adapt Great Britain's legislation as it comes forward to suit the needs of Northern Ireland and to fit in with Northern Ireland's existing legislative background. Perhaps he would be good enough to enter into consultations with those who have given a great deal of thought to this process. That process is designed to make direct rule more sensitive, more acceptable, and more efficient, and to operate in the best interests of all the people of Northern Ireland, given that the present Government and the present House of Commons, in positive ways and sometimes in negative ways, have put on the statute book the Northern Ireland Act 1982 which prevents the restoration of devolved government as long as it remains unamended. We are saying that no time should be lost in making direct rule more acceptable and more efficient in all its workings.

I hope that the Government and the House will now conclude that 13 years of interim temporary arrangements have been at least 10 years too long and that within the next 12 months we will have introduced arrangements more in line with British democracy as it is understood and admired the world over.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): It has already been said that for the 13th year we are discussing direct rule in Northern Ireland, and we do so with a depleted attendance in the Chamber. We in Northern Ireland have been told repeatedly how British we are. We have been told by no less a person than the Prime Minister that we are as British as Finchley. I would venture to suggest that if what is happening on the streets of Northern Ireland were happening in Finchley, if 2,500 people had lost their lives in political violence, 20,000 had been maimed and there were unemployment of 20 per cent. concentrated in the areas from which the violence was emanating, there might be one or two more Members of Parliament present to discuss the matter this evening. It is difficult for me to take seriously the political parties in this island when they tell me that they think we are as British as they are and when there is this sort of attendance in the Chamber to debate what is the most serious human problem facing the peoples of these islands.

It is difficult for me also, therefore, to take seriously the views expressed by the Government this evening when it is quite clear that the party that supports them does not have any great concern, interest or, indeed, care — I think that is a fair charge to make — about what is happening in Northern Ireland. There are 12 Members representing Britain and present in the Chamber. Five of them have to be present. I think that is a sufficient commentary on their attitude towards and concern for the problems that we face.

The Secretary of State's remarks tended to repeat what we have heard so often. The more things change the more they remain the same. The Secretary of State indicated that successive Governments have tried repeatedly to put forward proposals for a solution to the problems of Northern Ireland, again with the implication that they are the harassed arbiters between the warring factions that inhabit the north of Ireland. There was no sign of what I feel would be necessary after 13 years of failure to provide peace and stability. There was no sign of a radical reassessment of attitudes or of approaches.

The forces that make political progress almost impossible in Northern Ireland today have not changed. They have not changed throughout the 13 years; they have not changed throughout this century; they are identical. The democratic process was interrupted in Ireland, as I have often said in the House, in 1912 when the House, which opposed the rule of law—a rule of law based on the sovereignty of this Parliament — surrendered to threats of Ulster Unionists against the decision to grant home rule to the island of Ireland. Unionists learned from that and they have never forgotten, and they have been repeating in the past week to the Secretary of State that, if one threatens a British Government with the dire consequences of their action, the British Government will back off. Others too learned that if one succeeds by democratic methods the name of the game is changed and physical force is the only answer to our problems.

Those two forces — those who threaten force and those who use force—had their positions reinforced by the experience of 1974 which still dominates much of the thinking in Northern Ireland today. Those two forces are still the forces that prevent the development of the political and democratic process in Northern Ireland. They feed off one another. In a recent election we witnessed them feeding off one another. We had the spectacle of Members opposite holding an election press conference with sledgehammers over their shoulders saying, "We will smash Sinn Fein." One does not need two political thoughts to rub together in one's head to realise that that kind of approach breeds support for the people that one alleges will be smashed. Extremism breeds extremism. The killing by the Provisional IRA, which is part of Sinn Fein, feeds the fears and the centre tends to fall apart.

After the elections we found that the same extremists were breeding the same extremism. The recent local government elections results were not unusual. They demonstrated that nothing ever changes in Northern Ireland elections. The election results in my city were identical with the election results in 1933. In 1981 the local government election results showed that 21 per cent. of the people in Northern Ireland voted for candidates who were described as "others" and that 17·5 per cent. voted for SDLP candidates. In 1985, 11·8 per cent. of the people voted for Sinn Fein and 9·2 per cent voted for others. The total is exactly 21 per cent. A total of 17·8 per cent. of the people voted for my party. The Sinn Fein vote was slightly less than in recent elections. There is nothing new about the results; have reached the ceiling and we know what it is. It is good to know exactly where one stands.

The reaction was a propaganda victory. It appeared that Sinn Fein had won the election. Those people say that they speak and act in the name of the people of Ireland, but 11 per cent. of the vote does not give one the right to speak and act in the name of the people of Ireland. And 3 per cent. of the vote this week in the Republic does not give them the right to speak and act in the name of the people of Ireland, particularly when they kill fellow Irishmen in Northern Ireland. Every democrat should stand up and say that, instead of behaving at local council meetings in a way that gives credibility to and provides propaganda for those one claims one wants to smash.

What do councillors say at local council meetings? They say that they will not recognise the presence of Sinn Fein councillors. There is nothing new about that. Everybody thinks that they say that just because it is Sinn Fein, but they have been saying that to the representatives of the SDLP for years. The Unionists in Northern Ireland have conceded not one iota to SDLP representatives. The deputy leader of my party has been a member of Armagh council for 12 years. During that period he has not even been nominated for membership of a committee; nor has any SDLP councillor held senior office in any council in which the Unionists have a major say. That has to be contrasted with the performance of my party when it had a majority on the council. Not a single committee place on Belfast city council has been given to any representative of the non-Unionist community. Craigavon decided that it would give complete council powers to a council committee. The membership of that committee excludes everybody who is not a Unionist. Talk about democracy!

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that many of these instances followed in the wake of council meetings in other districts where a genuine effort was made to bring the SDLP into the work of the council by giving senior posts to them? Will he acknowledge that when the SDLP was told that it would be given the vice-chairmanship of my council it declined to nominate anybody? Does he also acknowledge that we said that one of two posts on a council committee would be filled by the SDLP? The SDLP nominated somebody but when Sinn Fein nominated somebody else the SDLP withdrew, in an effort to force a Sinn Fein nomination upon us. Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that because of decisions like that by the SDLP, as happened when it decided not to fight Fermanagh and South Tyrone, other councils behave in what appears to be an irresponsible manner?

Mr. Hume: I intend to deal with the position of the SDLP on all these councils. I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's chronology, but I shall deal with that later. Cookstown council acts in the same way as Craigavon council, except that it does it more legally; it delegates its powers to different committees but makes sure that nobody serves on the committees who disagrees with the Unionists. Lisburn council made a mistake. It allowed one member of the SDLP to serve on a committee. Later its leader apologised to the electorate for having allowed an SDLP member to serve on the committee.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will ensure that the imbalance on area education boards is corrected. Not a single representative of the minority communities has been nominated to serve on the area education boards of Armagh, Dungannon, Cookstown and Craigavon councils.

The SDLP approach was set out before, during and after the election. We fought all comers. In particular, we fought the men of violence. It did not go unnoticed by anybody observing the political scene in Northern Ireland that the party most targeted by the political wing of the IRA was the party that I lead. Mine is the party that it wants to destroy. We fought the political wing of the IRA in every part of Northern Ireland. We fought their violence and their violent actions. We also fought the bigotry that lies at the heart of most of our divisions. We said that because we fight elections under the system of proportional representation we would do as we had done before: once the election was over we would try to ensure that, in every area where we had a major say, proportionality, in terms of membership of committees, would be the order of the day. We carried out that policy. In Northern Ireland, the SDLP has five chairmanships and Sinn Fein two. That is almost identical with their proportional vote. Furthermore, in those areas where we have a major say we have offered positions to representatives of other parties.

Before somebody tells me that the fact that one supports somebody from a party that one opposes and does not like for the chairmanship of a council or a committee where there is not an overall majority means that one supports what that party stands for, let me say that in that case no local government would work. We put into office in Newry as chairman Mr. Graham. The Secretary of State no doubt recognises the name because yesterday he refused to talk to Mr. Graham.

Rev. Paisley: He had lunch with him.

Mr. Hume: Hold on a minute; I am talking about what we do as a political party. We supported for office a member of the party of the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) in an area where we had an overwhelming majority, in pursuit of our policy of partnership, to try to break down the barriers between us —a man whom the Secretary of State will not talk to because he makes his views clear about the sort of violence he would use to achieve his political objectives.

I do not like what Sinn Fein stands for, any more than I like what the parties that differ from me in the House stand for. I particularly dislike the fact that it decides that the way to unite my country is to kill fellow citizens with whom it disagrees. I do not think that it requires great political intelligence to recognise that that only causes far deeper bitterness and division.

The nub of the question — this is where the Government come in—is that if we agree that a political poarty has a legal right to stand for election, and that election takes place, we must treat everybody elected in exactly the same way, whether we like them or not.

Rev. Ian Paisley: That is completely contrary to what happens in this House. This House passed legislation, because Bobby Sands was elected, that ensured that never again would it permit that. So the House took a decision on that issue and the Labour party voted for it.

Mr. Hume: If people want to engage in undemocratic practices in the House or anywhere else, it is no good asking me to defend them. The Government have said and the House has said that it is perfectly legal for members of this political party to stand and—whether one likes it or not, and most people do not—if they are elected they are entitled to be treated exactly the same as everybody else, because if they are not treated the same as everybody else they are given propaganda victories right, left and centre. That is giving one's own definition of democracy, by excluding people who are elected by the people. That is far more dangerous because the erosion of democracy is what gives justification to men of violence.

The Government have said that they will not talk to these people. How many times in a year is it likely that a deputation from a council that includes members of Sinn Fein would want to talk to a Minster? It would certainly not be very many. What has happened because of all this hullabaloo is that Sinn Fein has been let off the hook of its own contradictions. It is pretending to be working for the welfare of people, jobs and better living conditions, while its military wing is blowing up factories. Everything that intelligent politicians who want to oppose it are trying to do is thwarted by people trying to make political martyrs out of Sinn Fein by refusing to talk to its members. The Government will not talk to Sinn Fein, but their agents will talk to an IRA man or a UVF man who has been guilty of serious offences and they will bribe him to uphold the legal system. It is a policy designed to give propaganda victories to the people whom they claim to want to smash.

The marching season is upon us again—a time when in Northern Ireland the temperature always seems to rise. If people in Northern Ireland want to keep marching back towards 1690, I do not have any great quarrel with them. They are entitled to march when and where they like provided that their marching is not triumphalist and is not designed to give offence and to go through areas where it gives positive offence. There are some areas in Northern Ireland where the marching is a simple coat-trailing exercise, which is likely to lead to violence. I have raised these matters with the Secretary of State and the Minister and some indications have recently been given that a more common-sense approach to the routes of these marches might be adopted in order to prevent community conflict and to avoid giving the opportunity for men of violence to take advantage of tense situation.

We hear Opposition Members saying that they will resist with every means at their disposal any decision to re-route, for example, a march at Portadown where the other routes on offer are more direct to their ultimate destination than the coat-trailing one, which goes through a small Catholic area.

I have gone on at length about recent events, but what is the lesson that we draw from all this? This is very clear to anybody who thinks about it. The political parties in Northern Ireland cannot and will not agree in the context of Northern Ireland. That is the lesson. Nothing has changed electorally during the past 60 years. They cannot possibly agree in that context because the problem is not about relations within Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State referred to the fact that my party does not sit in the Northern Ireland Assembly. We have given reasons for that time and time again. Recent events have underlined the integrity of my party's position. This House, through the Government, indicated that it wanted, yet again, to pursue devolution based on cross-community agreement — understood by most people to mean the sharing of power and responsibility between the two communities. My party has never had any objection to that as a form of government. We believe that working together is the only way to break down barriers between people who are deeply divided. The experience of working together for the common good is the only long-term, slow process that will break down the barriers. We have said that repeatedly.

However, as we know from our experience and the experience of local councils and the Assembly, the two parties in this House which are supposed to share power with us have repeatedly said publicly, honestly, forthrightly and without equivocation that there are no circumstances in which they will share responsibility with us.

My minute intelligence draws a conclusion from that —that I should be wasting my time and a great deal of public money in the Northern Ireland Assembly trying to prove that those parties do not mean what they say. If they want to tell me now—and I will happily give way—that they will share power with the SDLP, I would welcome that; but they will not. Therefore, the conclusion can be only that the Northern Ireland Assembly will not reach agreement. It is costing a great deal of taxpayers' money to keep the Assembly in being. My party could do a smash-and-grab raid tomorrow. It could pop into the Assembly, sign on, collect £750,000 in salaries and allowances and then give it to charity. We do not do that.

We have said from the beginning that there have been a series of attempts to solve the Irish problem, but they have all been British initiatives. We have had majority rule. If I had been the leader of a party that ruled a piece of earth for 60 years, and ended up in the mess in which Northern Ireland is today, I would not be standing in this House giving anybody advice on how to rule it in future. There have been power-sharing attempts, and the House has heard my comments on that. There has also been direct rule. They have all been British initiatives, and none of them has provided peace and stability in Northern Ireland.

When we said that the Northern Ireland Assembly would not work, we asked why. Our answer—I invite anyone to challenge it — is that the relationship of conflict is not a relationship between people in an artificial entity called Northern Ireland; it is a relationship of conflict between the people of Ireland and between the people of both islands. It is only in the framework of the problem that we can provide a solution. It involves interlocking relationships.

Britain and Ireland have failed to sort out their relationships. They pushed them into a corner called Northern Ireland and left them to fester. We are now facing the consequences of that. Until we go back into the wider framework and get fresh air into the situation we will not break down the barriers and build the structures that will allow us to grow together at our own speed.

The New Ireland Forum was an attempt by one of the parties to reassess its attitude [Laughter.] I say to the laughing hon. Member for Antrim, North that the position in Northern Ireland today obtains because our attitudes have brought us here—his, mine, the IRA's, the British Government's, the Irish Government's and everyone else's. If we do not have the good sense to ask ourselves what in our attitudes has brought us here, and be prepared to reassess those attitudes, we are going nowhere other than to total conflict.

The hon. Gentleman may sneer at the efforts of the New Ireland Forum, but at least it was an effort by the representatives of 80 per cent. of the people of Ireland. It was the first Irish initiative since partition and it laid on the table our analysis of the problem. We invited people round the table to discuss that analysis with us, but we are still waiting for them to accept. We welcome the fact that the Government took up the offer of the Irish Government to discuss that document. The discussions are continuing. I wish them success, and I believe that that wish would be shared by the vast majority of the people of both Islands. I hear many pessimistic noises these days, but I wish to end with one thought: a series of British initiatives has failed to solve the Irish problem. It is about time that we listened to an Irish initiative.

9.10 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I comment first on the New Irish Forum, which was so eulogised by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). Unionists and Protestants had every right to examine the report. It told us of the magnanimity of southern Irish Governments to the Protestant population there, and said how well Protestants were treated in the south of Ireland. But where are they? At partition, 10 per cent. of the population was Protestant, but that figure has fallen to less than 3 per cent. In contrast, the Roman Catholic population in the north of Ireland is increasing all the time. There is a great difference between the two forms of rule that were suggested in the New Ireland Forum report.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) accused the Government of going back on the Prime Minister's "Out, out out" statement. He said that the damage caused by the brick that she had thrown was now being repaired by the Government. That is not what the Secretary of State told me and the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) only a few days ago. He said that the Government stand by the Prime Minister's "Out, out out" speech. The story told to the right hon. and learned Gentleman is different from the one told to the Unionist representatives who meet the Secretary of State. I hope that when the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) replies, he will comment on the matter, because such mistakes do not help confidence in Northen Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman cannot have listened to what I said this evening. I made it clear for the umpteenth time that our discussions with the Irish Government are held within the framework of the Chequers communiqué and what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said afterwards.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Secretary of State has clarified the matter. I do not know what is said behind the Chair, or what little whispers the hon. Member for Foyle has heard, but I know what is said to me. I am expected to believe that and to convey it to my people, but when I come to the House I hear a different story. No wonder there is little confidence in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archer: The hon. Gentleman is obviously trying to tempt me to my feet. I said that the Prime Minister had dropped a brick. I do not resile from that statement, because it is important to consider not only what is said but the timing and the manner in which it is said. It is difficult to imagine anything having been said less graciously than that.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I shall leave it to the two Front Benches to sort that out. I know what the people of Northern Ireland think, and how the statements from the two Front Benches will be interpreted by them.

From listening to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) one would think that the SDLP is characterised by a sweet reasonableness. It is strange that in his city his party excluded every Democratic Unionist member from every committee when it first took office in the Londonderry city council. [Interruption.] I am talking not about the present position, but about the position when Democratic Unionists were first elected to that city council. They were excluded by the SDLP from every office in their first term.

The hon. Gentleman tells us that we should all be talking. The Secretary of State glided or, perhaps, skated over why the talks between the Unionists and the SDLP did not come about. It was a careful bit of scheming. He talked about the elections to come, but it has nothing to do with that. Let me put the record straight. For nine months the Democratic Unionists asked the SDLP to talk. The Official Unionists and the Alliance party asked the SDLP to talk. What happened? We were put off and told that the matter would have to be decided at an executive meeting. We were told this, that and the other. Then, strangely, on a radio interview the hon. Gentleman said that he would like to speak to the IRA army council. He knew perfectly well that if he spoke to it, the people whom I and the Official Unionists represent would not expect us to speak to him.

I told the hon. Gentleman face to face on Ulster television that if he spoke to the IRA army council, he would close the door to the Unionists. Yet the hon. Gentleman was happy about that. He was glad to close the door, slot the bolt, put on the chains and padlock them because he did not want to talk to the Unionists. Now the hon. Gentleman says that we should all be talking and that we should re-assess the position. He read a homily to me that I should reassess my position.

The hon. Gentleman was invited to send representatives to the Report Committee. Did he go? If he is invited to Dublin, he can go immediately. If he gets an invitation from the IRA army council, he can make himself conspicuously low key. He can disappear, get some man to drive up in a car, take him here, change cars and so on, and he can tell the Government that if they question him, they will get no information from him about where the army council men are. Yet he could not come to the Report Committee. Nor could Bishop Daley. He makes wonderful statements about us all re-assessing our position. He was invited to the Report Committee but not even he could come to put his point of view. Therefore, for the hon. Gentleman to hold forth in the House and to condemn Unionist representatives for not talking is a fraud and a deceit. We have said that we will talk, and we have asked for talks, but the door has been closed.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West that the Government's attitude is ambivalent on this issue. If Ministers refuse to talk to Sinn Fein, their officials should not be asked to do the dirty work. I want to make that clear in the House. But what has happened? The Government will not talk to Sinn Fein, but we are asked—the Loyalist people of Northern Ireland—to talk to Sinn Fein. I find it strange to hear the hon. Member for Foyle talk about targeting. I do not know of any SDLP councillors who have been shot dead by the IRA. I do not know where the list is. It is the Unionist people who are targeted by the IRA. They are shot dead, but what do we find? We find that the Government refuse to accept the recommendation of the Baker report or to ban Sinn Fein, which is the IRA.

The idea that the members of Sinn Fein are different from members of the IRA is an atrocious lie. They are one and the same. What is more, the godfathers are now identified. The IRA leaders are now councillors. We know who they are, and what they stand for. They have come out into the open. They have the cheek to say to us, "Recognise us. We are democrats. We want to do the decent thing." Those people have records of crime. They have been engaged in activities against the kith and kin of Unionist Members. We are forced to sit with such people. They are out to plan more murders.

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

I was in the House when the Birmingham bombing took place. I know what the strong Left-wing Labour Members said. It was all right while the IRA was killing Protestants in Ulster. That did not matter. When they came home and started to kill their kith and kin here, those hon. Members denounced them strongly. They realised what they were.

The House has asked us to sit down with those people and treat them as councillors, enter into negotiations with them and to sit with them on committees. My party will not do that. What is more, an Act passed by this House gives us the opportunity to set up a committee. If it wants to exclude someone from that committee the council has the right, under the legislation, so to do. Does the hon. Member for Foyle think that we are fools and that we shall not take advantage of the legislation when those murderers are pushed down our throat by a Government who will not talk to them? If he thinks that the Unionist people will have them pushed down our throats he has another think coming. We shall not co-operate with them and we are doing what we can within the law passed by this House to exclude them, and we shall continue to do so.

Mr Hume: The hon. Gentleman is the best friend that they have.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I have never listened to such utter nonsense. If one reads the newspapers one will see that the attack now is upon the Democratic Unionist party and upon me. Sinn Fein's best friends are the people who voted it into office — the SDLP men in Enniskillen and Omagh. The hon. Gentleman's party has entered into an agreement with Sinn Fein to put it into office. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. W. McCrea) will be able to explain to the House what has happened in Magherafelt.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Is it not strange that the only councils where the SDLP and Sinn Fein did not enter into an agreement about high office was in the two councils in the constituency of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume)? That was in case Sinn Fein demanded his seat in the next election. Any other part of the country could go to Sinn Fein.

Rev. Ian Paisley: My hon. Friend knows all about it. He is targeted. He has to sit on a council with the men who are planning his destruction and who have told him publicly in the council, 'We will get you." The Opposition Front Bench say that we must tolerate that and talk to those people. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) was not part of the Labour party deputation which met Sinn Fein and which was asked whether it rebuked Sinn Fein and denounced its violence. Its answer was that it did not have time to talk about that.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I presume that the hon. Gentleman saw the story on the front page of the Belfast Telegraph which said that I had not met Sinn Fein but that if I had I should have told it to put aside the Armalite and concentrate on the ballot box, and that violence did no service to any of the people of Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am not suggesting that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough was the person interviewed after the meeting with Sinn Fein. If the person who was interviewed wants to withdraw, I should be happy.

Northern Ireland is in a very serious state. Some people say that they are always hearing that. If anyone is so blinkered as to think that Northern Ireland is not in a serious state he knows nothing about what is happening. The House had better realise the seriousness of the situation.

I shall dwell in a moment on the seriousness of the state of morale in the Royal Ulster Constabulary. That is an important issue and the House had better consider it. Why is the situation so serious? The Secretary of State does not like the plenary sessions in the Assembly. He seemed to give the impression that he would like to gag the Assembly. I wonder why, because some matters of great import are revealed in that Assembly.

The House is saying to us tonight "You should all talk. The Protestants should all be happy. Everything is well". Some might say that the Democratic Unionists are bigoted. I find it strange that the Secretary of State could have a meal yesterday with a person to whom he said he would not talk. I find that amusing. I shall return to that and defend Mr. George Graham. The statement in The Irish News had to be withdrawn and The Irish News had to apologise. Perhaps we shall now have the proper statement.

Mr. Raymond Ferguson is not known to be on the extreme Right wing of the Official Unionist party. He spelt out in the Assembly why there was such a problem among the Protestants of Fermanagh. He said that people thought that Fermanagh had an overwhelming Republican community, but that it had not because the community there is split almost 50:50. At the election the Republican groups gained their majority by only 4 per cent.

What has happened? In the last 15 years, 74 murders have been committed in County Fermanagh. That is what Mr. Raymond Ferguson told the Assembly. He said:

"Seven of those murders were carried out by Loyalist organisations"—

one was carried out by a member of the British Army—

"and of five out of seven of those seven murders, the culprits have been punished by the courts and are now in gaol. Of the other 67 some people have been apprehended . . . for minor offences such as conspiracy or involvement at some insignificant level. But I am not aware of one case in which any of the perpetrators of those 67 murders have been brought before the courts, sentenced, and put in gaol for their crimes."

That was said by a person representing the area. What can he say? I ask hon. Members what, if they represented that area, they would say when a person in their constituency was murdered. Everyone says "Keep calm. Don't do anything. Don't say anything." A constituent who is a member of my party has some strong words to say about Sinn Fein and the IRA but the Secretary of State has said that he can not meet him. Next week he will have to meet him as a member of the Home Affairs and Security Committee of the Assembly. I find that interesting.

I do not shed any tears when an IRA man is given his just desserts. I shed tears for the people he murdered, for the orphans and the widows. I shed no tears for IRA murderers. Evidently that is a crime. It seems that we are not supposed to say that. I advise hon. Members to read in the Library the report of what the Rev. Ivan Foster said in the Assembly and then to decide whether the Secretary of State should take such a stand.

I represent Fermanagh in another forum. What do I say to the people of Fermanagh when I visit them? Do I tell them that everything is all right and that the security forces are taking care of everything? What do they say to me?

They draw my attention to the murders of Protestants and tell me that no one has been arrested for committing them. They ask, "Are we to sit peacefully by and allow ourselves to be murdered?" That is one issue that is causing serious concern among the people of the border areas and the House needs to think about it and to meditate upon it. If the murderers are not being captured and are not being brought to court, there is no hope for the people living in the border areas. Indeed, a deep hopelessness has set in.

Three outrageous atrocities have taken place in Mr. Graham's constituency of Newry. What are we to say to the people of Newry? Are we to tell them, "Everything is all right. Everything is wonderful. It is better than it ever was before."? It would be extremely difficult to enter the homes which I have visited to spell out that message. The Secretary of State and his Ministers do not go to the homes of the families who have suffered as a result of the atrocities. They do not face these people. They might send a letter to them, but that is all. They do not hear the message that we receive from them. The hard-pressed Protestants of Northern Ireland are facing atrocities day in and day out.

I was present when the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) spoke in a debate on Northern Ireland about having an inquiry into what happened at Killeen. It is time that an inquiry was put in train by the Secretary of State. I have had conversations with police officers and they feel that the Killeen incident could have been prevented. They have told me that such events were happening regularly and that there should have been a proper Army cover and presence. We are talking about police officers who went to their deaths. That is the factor that is troubling and worrying the people of Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Foyle said that people should be allowed to walk when and where they like. Having said that, he expressed certain considerations. He should remember that it is councillors and Assembly Members of his party who are saying that people will not walk when and where they like. There are Roman Catholic traditional parades in North Antrim and they include areas that are predominantly Protestant. The parades have taken place for years and no one says anything to those who participate in them. The paraders have always walked through these predominantly Protestant areas and they will continue to do so. That will happen because it has always been the recognised and accepted practice. They walk through Portglenone and other areas in North Antrim that are predominantly Protestant. That is true of the Hibernian parades on 15 August and nothing is said about them. The hon. Member for Foyle spoke about the parade in the Tunnel area. Does he know the Tunnel area? Does he know how many houses are in that area? There are 70 houses in the road that faces the Tunnel area and 26 of them are boarded up. Does he know that? Is he aware that that is an area that Orangemen have processed along for over 100 years?

Mr. Hume: Why?

Rev. Ian Paisley: Because they have walked along that road. That is why. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that they must be stopped after 100 years of processing along that road? Is that his message to the House? Why are they to be stopped? However loud and powerful is the hon. Gentleman's voice, it is not his voice to which members of the Government Front Bench will listen. Instead they will listen to the voice of Peter Barry, who has been highly exalted by the Government and has the right to speak on behalf of the minority and to make representations on its behalf. I wonder what part of the minority Peter Barry has the right to speak for. He is not speaking for the people of Sinn Fein because they will have nothing to do with him. They would like to bring down his Government as quickly as they would like to bring down this Government. He is putting on the pressure with this procedure.

The hon. Member for Foyle tells us that the New Irish Forum would give us all peace in Ireland, but the influence in Dublin wants to stop an Orange parade that has been going on for years. I have a straight question to put to the Government: are they going to stop traditional Loyalist parades? If they are, they must stop traditional national and Republican parades. Will they do that? No, they do not want to hear about it. Some of them do not even know that there is such a thing. They think that we are so bigoted in Ulster that we would not allow such a parade to happen.

What has happened in the areas where there is so much confrontation and talk? Houses have been built and Republicans and Roman Catholics have been housed there. Immediately they get into those areas they say that they will change what happens there. Therefore, Unionist public representatives know that if these people are housed in these areas they will want to change the procedures there. The hon. Member for Foyle must know that that puts public representatives into an impossible position. They must take a stand on this issue.

There is no need for any talk about re-routing this parade. There is no need to cancel the parade at the Tunnel. There was no need to cancel the parade in Castlewellan. It was cancelled because a Roman Catholic mass was to be held on Saturday night because the Pope had said that the mass could be held then so that they could have a free Sunday. The hon. Member for Foyle should know more about this than I do. As a result, more people were going to mass on Saturday.

What would have happened if the parade had gone on Friday instead? The people were just told not to go at all. Now they have said that they want to go because it is a traditional parade ground and they have always gone this way. Will the Government listen to Peter Barry or say that they will let the traditional parade go through because they must acknowledge that there are traditional parades in other areas and they must do what is fair for all traditional parades? That is the important issue, and the hon. Member for Foyle must realise how the Loyalists feel about this.

Mr. Hume: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that any parade in any part of Northern Ireland that is a coat-trailing exercise and gives offence to the people in the area through which it goes should be re-routed?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can say that people going to their church service is a coat-trailing exercise. I do not understand his mentality. He mentioned the Tunnel, which is a parade that goes to a local church every year. The hon. Gentleman is saying that it cannot go the way that it has gone for a 100 years, and must be banned.

I have told the Secretary of State that he cannot do this to traditional parades. I am talking not about protest parades or instantaneous parades to deal with some matter but about a parade that has gone on for 100 years. The parade in Castlewellan is a traditional one, and we should leave well alone.

We are told that the police will have difficulties, which is true. However, they have more difficulties when parades are banned. Far more police were brought into Castlewellan when the parade was banned—three times the usual number—than when it was carried out. I must speak up for the police of Northern Ireland. The police cannot live in the areas in which the voters of the hon. Member for Foyle are predominant. They can live only in Protestant and Unionist areas. In fact, at Rasharkin, in my own constituency, they have been driven out by the IRA.

Every policeman has been driven out of that area and must live among Protestants, yet how can those men live at peace among Protestant people when by a foolish Government act, dictated by Peter Barry, they get involved in confrontation with people who want to walk in traditional parades? This House had better take note of that message, because members of every section of the Northern Ireland community depend upon the police—in fact, they send for them—to protect them.

The police are being placed in an impossible position. That is unfair, and the Government should have second thoughts about this. It is not as easy as they may think. Traditional parades must be allowed to use the same routes as they have always done. Those who say that they will stop a traditional parade by force must be dealt with. If the Protestants said that they intended to stop the Hibernian march, the police would be sent to deal with them. Let us be fair and even-handed. That is all I ask, and the police deserve it.

I shall not go into detail about the state of some of the police stations on the border. They are a disgrace. A police representative told me, "We take young men and women from the best homes of Ulster who have volunteered to do the most difficult job that an Ulsterman can do, and we put them into pigsties." It is time that the Government did something about the state of border stations. They should get rid of the portakabins, and should give the policemen something to go home to after a hard day defending the people of Northern Ireland.

We have not had much joy from the Secretary of State. He told us that there will be no accommodation with killers, yet some of them are sitting in the council chambers of the Province. When we do something about it, he says that he believes that eventually "we will all act normally." One would be abnormal if one sat in a council chamber with a known murderer who says, "I want to kill you."

The hon. Member for Foyle said that Sinn Fein had a council chairman in Omagh. The Opposition Front Bench tell us that we should talk to that person, yet he said that if any Omagh council employee was shot by the IRA for wearing a police or UDR uniform such an employee was a legitimate target for IRA assassination. Am I being told that I or my party members must sit with that person, work with him in council committees and look up to him as chairman of that council? This House had better get the message — we shall never do it. If we cannot do it lawfully, as I believe we can, it will be up to the Government to take their own action, because the councils will become unworkable.

I smiled when the Secretary of State told us about councils working normally. Those councils are predominantly controlled by constitutionalists. That is why they are working normally. They are working normally in Ballymena, Ballymoney, Ards, Castlereagh and elsewhere. I support what was done by the Cookstown council. The matter cannot be discussed now as it is in the courts, but we shall see what the court decision is. Let all the councils be taken to court and let the law be tested. Let us see how strong the law is. If we fail, it will be up to the Government either to change the law or to put in commissioners if the councils become unworkable.

They have been dilly-dallying about that in Londonderry. It is surprising how people can be hoist by their own petard. When the Unionists walked out of Londonderry, Ministers told us that everything was working normally and that we did not need any commissioners. Then, when there was a rumpus, with other councillors causing trouble, the cry was, "We must have commissioners."

I am wondering whether the Minister will appoint Sinn Fein members to health boards. After all, he has under the Act a way out, and I hope that when the Minister replies we shall be told whether the Government intend to appoint them to health boards. That question should be answered tonight.

We have heard talk of speculation, but on one aspect there is no speculation. It is clear that the destiny of the people of Northern Ireland has been discussed between Dublin and Northern Ireland. A minority representative in this House knows all about it—because he goes there to be briefed — while the majority of people, including those I represent, know nothing about it. We are left out, yet they expect us, at the end of the day, to accept what they are doing.

I assure the Government that it will not be accepted. Nor need they tell me that they believe in the sovereignty of this House. Sovereignty involves not only legislating but applying laws. When there is a proposal to dilute the courts of Northern Ireland and to put on the bench there a judge appointed by Dublin, that is the beginning of the end of proper sovereignty over Northern Ireland. We shall have to wait and see what the proposals are, and the sooner we see them, the better.

If the talks continue in the way that they have been proceeding, if the speculation continues and the killings go on, and if the Government ban traditional parades, we shall be heading for a very serious crisis indeed. The sooner that this House wakes up to that, the better for all concerned.

9.47 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): When the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) was talking about policemen being driven out of a village in his constituency, I was surprised that he did not attract the attention of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) to the fact that not one policeman now lives in the west bank area of Londonderry city. I believe that the last policeman to live there, Inspector Duddy, was murdered. When the troubles first exploded, there were nearly 100 members of the RUC living on that side of the river. That says a lot about the area which the hon. Member for Foyle represents.

With every passing year, we seem to go through tonight's operation more mechanically, even to the extent of hearing much the same words from the Front Benches. As the leader of my party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) pointed out, we seem to have the impression each year that a massive change will take place in the system of governing Northern Ireland before we reach the same point om a similar date the following year.

We know perfectly well, of course, that we shall return next year because the Northern Ireland Unionist population will not accept the power-sharing that is being assiduously demanded tonight by the hon. Member for Foyle and the Secretary of State, and as has been demanded over the years.

The Secretary of State appears before us tonight as "Honest Hurd" because he, more than any Secretary of State in recent years, has stood up and demanded bluntly that the Unionist population should accept a power-sharing set-up in Ulster. Apparently that is the right hon. Gentleman's conception of what constitutes political and constitutional progress. Indeed, he was "Sunningdale Man" in person. We were surprised to note how clearly he revealed himself, because that attitude was carefully concealed by his predecessors and others for many years and was cloaked around with many fair words. Not that that mattered much, for most of us are used to tearing away the veil of nonsense that so often surrounds reality in this House. We are not surprised that unbending demands are being made again.

The hon. Member for Foyle told us that he wanted political and democratic development. It is a queer concept of democratic development to give a veto to a minority. That is what we are really asked for. No one has yet managed to explain exactly how that development follows any democratic principle. I have puzzled over this matter for many years, and I look forward to the possibility of it being explained to me this evening.

We are always told that if we accepted power-sharing and gave the SDLP a place in government, the IRA would melt away. I think the Secretary of State said that the support would drain away. That is utter nonsense. If a place is given to the SDLP, the IRA will simply say, "We imposed sufficient pressure to extract that measure from the Unionists." That measure will not be extracted from the Unionists by those means. The Unionist population will not have anything extracted from them by murderers or political pressure, because we are not going down that road. The sooner the Secretary of State and the House recognise that, the sooner political progress will become possible.

The Government continue trying to buy off people with titbits. That only whets the appetite and makes the position much worse. The sooner the Government realise the truth —perhaps they already do—and act upon it, the better.

I have always feared giving concessions in the face of violence, because concessions tend to increase the violence and the pressure to strengthen the position of the nationalist population in Ulster. It is not yet generally recognised that the SDLP has managed to get itself into a position where it is driven by the IRA. The hon. Member for Antrim, North drew our attention to what has happened in some councils in Northern Ireland. That certainly should be brought to the attention of hon. Members. The SDLP has simply given a place to Sinn Fein, which has been described not only by itself but by others as the political wing of the IRA—the group that articulates the IRA's political objectives. Sinn Fein has managed to get itself into a position where the SDLP gives support for council posts. The SDLP is so frightened of offending those who support Sinn Fein that it supports the representatives of the gunmen before it supports representatives of democratic, constitutional parties and even before it supports its own SDLP members who, we are told, are members of a constitutional party.

This is an unusual, damaging and dangerous position for any political party. I see no particular need for me to weep if the hon. Member for Foyle and his party wish to clasp the rattlesnake of the IRA to their breasts. If that means the end of them, I would not regret it. I clearly recall their beginnings and their willingness to lead violent mobs in the streets of Londonderry and elsewhere. I hold no brief for them.

The hon. Member for Foyle said that all elected representatives should be treated the same.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): I should like to raise one point before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of the role of the SDLP and its relationship with Sinn Fein, which he has rightly analysed as being the political supporter of the campaign of murder and violence in Northern Ireland. Is my hon. Friend aware that in county Fermanagh the SDLP, whose leader is, of course, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), rather than accept the nomination for chairmanship of that council or the proposal of the British community represented by the Ulster Unionist party, declined that nomination and preferred to commend, propose and then support a Sinn Fein chairman of that council?

Mr. Ross: Yes, of course, and I hoped to return to that point later.

In fact, the Unionists proposed the four members of the SDLP one after the other, and each and every one of them declined to allow his name to go forward and then supported the Sinn Fein — the representative of the murderers—for the post.

The hon. Member for Foyle lamented that members of his party did not get much of a showing, and I will come back to that. One of the reasons perhaps is that most members of the Unionist population in Northern Ireland would find it difficult now to get even a razor blade between the attitude displayed by many of the SDLP council and that of the Sinn Fein councillors who sit beside them.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is it not a fact that recently in a council committee in the city of Londonderry, an SDLP councillor proposed and an SDLP councillor seconded a motion that the tenancy for the Royal Ulster Constabulary in its premises in the Waterside should be brought to an end, and when Sinn Fein came out of the council meeting, it said, "This is our policy, the SDLP is going our way and this is the way it is going to go"?

Mr. Ross: Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take great interest in Irish debates, and I have come back specially to listen to this one.

Mr. Ross: I apologise again, Mr. Speaker, I am so engrossed in the interruptions that I tend to forget that we are honoured by your presence and that the House is under your control again. I am sorry, Sir, I do go on putting my foot in it.

[Mr. Ross]

We have had explained to us by the hon. Member for Antrim, North the consequences of power-sharing between the SDLP and Sinn Fein, but that should cause us no surprise whatever, because the SDLP has consistently refused to give clear support to members of the security forces in the difficult task that they have.

The hon. Member for Foyle said that all elected representatives should be treated exactly the same. If elected members demand that they be treated the same, they must also be prepared to operate within the same civilised framework that all other constitutional parties accept. We do not support those who murder those with whom they disagree.

The plain truth of the matter is that the IRA and Sinn Fein are not two separate organisations. They are exactly the same organisation. If one of my hon. Friends should catch your eye in this or a later debate, Mr. Speaker, I think that he will give a clear instance which will illustrate the truth of what I have just said. Sinn Fein is the political arm of murder. Therefore, it cannot be seen or treated as a normal political party, because it is not a normal political party at all.

Sinn Fein referred to the cutting edge. Its cutting edge is murder, arson and violence, perpetuated by the IRA not only in Armagh but elsewhere. We are dealing with the renewal of the direct rule legislation for Northern Ireland, a system that has been operating for many years. It has not worked very well. Nobody is willing to say that the Government have made a very good job of it. Let me examine a few of the things that have happened during the last year. I deal first with the legislation governing the attempts to stop personation, carried out primarily by the Sinn Fein electorate at the local government elections and the wonderful claims that have been made since then about its success.

When the Bill was debated one might have thought that about half of the Sinn Fein vote was personation. I remember pointing out that it would be impossible for any party to organise personation on such a large scale as to personate more than 10,000 or 12,000 people at the maximum in Northern Ireland. I still believe that my assessment was correct. It was also pointed out during the debates that, historically, the Sein Fein vote had varied from 70,000 to 155,000 since the end of the last war. Its vote has now settled at around 100,000. If Sinn Fein had fought in all areas during the local government elections, I have no doubt that its vote would have been 15,000 to 20,000 higher than it was. There has been no drop in the Sinn Fein vote and the Government's claim has been proved to be false. My estimate that the Sinn Fein vote amounted to about 100,000 has been proved to be correct.

The matter was made worse by, among other things, insistence upon a medical card. The House will recall the long debate on medical cards. My hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) pointed out that his medical card was about 30 years old and had been signed by a doctor who is now dead. He had also moved house about four times. During the debate he asked whether his medical card was still in order or whether he ought to get a new one. He was told that either would do.

I have read all the letters that have been sent to me on this subject. I have also read everything that has been said in the House. Both the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and the Under-Secretary of State, who piloted the Bill through the House, must have a dictionary that is different from mine. The meaning of many words seems to have changed. I should like to have a copy of that dictionary before the introduction of the next Bill so that we on this Bench will be able to understand what the Government's words mean. We should not like to get it wrong again. We should like to know exactly what the words mean.

During his speech the Secretary of State referred to the meetings between the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and pointed out that they had said that the identities of both communities in Northern Ireland had to be recognised. He also said that it would be necessary to remove some of the problems that irritate the minority. I did not hear him talking about removing irritants to the Protestant majority. Perhaps if he had said that, he could also have been called even-handed in the debate this evening.

The debate has already attracted some comment on the banning of various Orange parades in Northern Ireland. Of course, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) will be perfectly well aware that the net was originally cast very much wider than Castle Wellan and the Tunnel. A number of other places were looked at, but wiser counsels have prevailed in the vast majority of cases, because 99 per cent. of the parades, by both factions, that take place every year in Northern Ireland pass without incident and in most of the cases where there are incidents they are created by a very small number of people.

It is equally true, as has already been said, that it is far more difficult to stop a traditonal parade than it is to keep it moving through the area. I have had some experience of controversial processions and parades over the years and I think that I know rather more about such things as far as Northern Ireland is concerned than any hon. Member on the Government Front Bench. My advice is similar to that of the hon. Member for Antrim, North—that a traditional parade should not be stopped. It should be brought together in as orderly and disciplined a fashion as possible and taken as quickly as possible through the area in question. Occasionally there are jams, but they do not happen very often, and it is very much easier to recognise people's right to continue to do what they have been doing for many years than to cause confrontation, which is desire by no one but which will almost certainly result in certain areas.

I can recall very clearly some difficulties in my own constituency last year. There was a problem, but it was largely overcome by the police keeping things moving in difficult circumstances. I do not believe that even that parade, which does not enjoy a high reputation, could easily be stopped. It is better in the long run to get these things over and done with and everyone away home as soon as possible.

I read with interest the comments of the Home Secretary yesterday, when he told the House that he was going to get the police to brief hon. Members on the difficulties in their constituencies as a result of IRA activities. I have been a member of the House since 1974 and I do not recall the Home Secretary or the Secretary of State ever asking me and my hon. Friends to come along and be given a detailed brief on the terrorist situation in our constituencies. Of course, I have my own means of finding these things out when I want to, but we have to do our own digging. Perhaps we could be told what is so peculiar about the present situation caused by the IRA bombing campaign in England that makes it necessary that all hon. Members who might possible have an involvement should be given a detailed briefing when it has not been found necessary to do this, in far more difficult circumstances, in Northern Ireland.

Mr. John David Taylor: I certainly agree with the comparison that the hon. Member draws. It is especially relevant to the opening speech by the Secretary of State, when he emphasised that a terrorist bomb in a village in Northern Ireland is as important as a bomb in the Rubens hotel in London or a hotel in Brighton or elsewhere.

Of course, that is not so, as is emphasised by the point being brought out by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East, (Mr. Ross), because the minute we have a bomb, defused as it was, in the Rubens hotel in London the Secretary of State brings in hon. Members for consultations. That has never happened with regard to Northern Ireland after 15 years of bombing. That shows that there is a difference of approach by the Government to terrorist bombs in Northern Ireland compared with their approach to bombs here in Great Britain. None the less, one can understand that, perhaps, the principle that has applied in Northern Ireland would be the better one to apply here in Great Britain because, after all, there are hon. Members, including Front Bench Opposition Members, who enter into private discussions with the political representatives of the terrorists.

Mr. Ross: I wonder where the Government obtain their advice. They are certainly not taking advice from hon. Members on these Benches. The advice that they took on electoral law has proved to be wrong. It did not achieve the results that the Government wanted. They are leaving themselves open to pressure from the SDLP, the IRA and Dublin. Instead of listening to advice from those quarters, they should listen to advice from these Benches—they might then find that they have better legislation.

If we are to improve the governance of Northern Ireland, what advice can we give the Government? They should stop trying to buy off the IRA by giving it concessions. They should stop trying to buy off Dublin. They should stop trying to buy off the SDLP. At the end of the day, they all want the same political and constitutional things. What is given, regardless of reason, will be claimed by each and every one of them for his own purposes.

The only way to undermine any claims is to ensure that there is no victory to claim. The Government and the Opposition talked at the beginning of the debate—as they have done for many years—as though the people and the politicians in Northern Ireland did not know what each other wanted. The truth is that we do know. On the fundamental points we are poles apart.

The Government are trying to drive us together and have a power-sharing set-up in Northern Ireland, which simply could not work, and that is leading us into difficulty. If only the Government would realise that we do not have to sit holding hands all the time trying to find out what each other thinks because we already know, we might then get somewhere rather than waste our time in endless jaw-jaw and no action.

The time is long overdue for Governments of both parties to begin returning power to the people of Northern Ireland. We formerly enjoyed three levels of government —local councils, county councils and Stormont. None of them remain, but a large part could be recreated, without any difficulty and to the great advantage of everyone in Northern Ireland, in a relatively short time.

If we are to get anywhere, if we are to start down the road that will lead back to control by the people over their own affairs, we should start now—indeed, we should have started long ago. The Secretary of State said that there must be power-sharing. He is trying to get the Assembly to go on talking until there is a power-sharing structure. He will be disappointed because it will not happen. He has said that the Assembly will continue at least until the end of the year, and will probably let it run out its life in October 1986 and not have another election.

The Secretary of State has managed to keep the Assembly going for two and a half years but, in that time, it has not done the job that it was set up to do—to produce a power-sharing executive. It will clearly not do so, and as long as it remains, he can use it as an excuse for doing nothing. On the evidence that has been presented to us by the events of the past two and a half years, and the words of the Secretary of State tonight, it appears that the sooner he winds it up, the better. Then he can start to make proper decisions. There is no point in continuing the Assembly if he knows that it will not produce the goods that he wants it to produce. Indeed, it will produce the one thing that he says he will not accept.

The Secretary of State talked about excuses. Although he is not present now, I must say that his excuses for reducing democracy and tougher security have worn right through. The sooner he forgets about making excuses and starts doing something about the problems, the better it will be for all of us.

10.15 pm

Mr. Richard Needham (Wiltshire, North): The job of parliamentary private secretary to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland—I can say this because the present PPS is not in his seat—is rather like playing the part of the fool in Shakespeare's "King Lear". One must do one's best to keep the Secretary of State happy while the complexities, problems and vagaries of Ireland slowly drive him mad. However, a PPS has one unrivalled advantage over Ministers in Northern Ireland, in that he has the opportunity to get to know the parties and their supporters without being surrounded by security.

As well as making many friends during my time in Northern Ireland, I was left with two certainties. The first was that the Unionist people will not give up their link with the United Kingdom without a fight. I cannot believe that coercion from Britain, the pressure of world opinion, and least of all the terror perpetrated by the IRA will alter that fact. In any event, it is impossible to coerce more than 1 million people against their will and, as the Secretary of State said, it is not an option for the foreseeable future.

The second certainty was that the vast majority of the Republican people of the North will not give up their dream of a united Ireland in the foreseeable future, and that no amount of civil rights legislation or arguments about the right of the majority to decide who rules will change their minds. It is surprising that members of the Unionist party, including the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who came to the problem as fresh as I did, do not appear to see the self-evident truth of this determination among the Catholic community.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) made an astonishing speech. He spent most of his time attacking the Government's business managers and the rest of the time explaining that he would not talk about Labour party policy because he had discussed it somewhere else on another occasion. Indeed, he was so effective that neither the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) nor the right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) stayed to hear him. However, it is evident that, whatever the Labour party might be, it is not integrationist. I repeat that the Irish nationalism that exists in the community will not wither or die. As the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) said, it has been there for the past 60 years and it is likely to remain there for the next 60 years unless we can find a way of providing some form of expression of the Irish identity for that community. I also accept that there will be Catholics who will vote for the right hon. Member for South Down. I know some of them. I also accept that there will be Protestants who will vote for the SDLP. But there will not be many in either case, and they will not matter.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Yes, they will. There are several thousand.

Mr. Needham: Although I accept the right hon. Gentleman's point, the fact remains that the vast majority of the Catholic community will stay true to its dream of a united Ireland, whatever the right hon. Gentleman may do in looking after his constituents. I met one of the right hon. Gentleman's constituents only the other day at the Cambridge Union. He was singing the praises of the right hon. Gentleman, but also said that his English student friends did not dare to go into the shops at Warren Point because he could not advise them of their safety. "[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] It is not rubbish.

Mr. John David Taylor: There is a great danger—it often happens in the press and the media in England—of confusing the term "Catholic" with the term "Republican". Thirty eight per cent. of the voters in Northern Ireland adhere to the Catholic religion, but only 30 per cent. are Irish Republicans. I object to the way in which the hon. Gentleman implies that all Catholics are Republicans. The Alliance party has Catholic leadership, a Catholic Chief Whip and many Catholic members. The Ulster Unionists also have Catholic supporters—they are not all Irish Republicans. That must be emphasised time and again.

Mr. Needham: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that 30 per cent. — the vast majority of the nationalist community — are members of the Catholic Church and the Alliance party make up slightly less than 10 per cent. of the total vote. Obviously I accept that some Catholics vote for the Unionist party. However, I repeat that the numbers are incidental. If the hon. Member for Foyle were present, he would tell the House that considerable numbers of people who are not of his faith or background also support him. Whatever the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) may say, that will not alter the basic truth that the nationalist community in the North will remain, as the right hon. Gentleman well knows.

My point is that Northern Ireland is one of those situations, not entirely unique but nearly unique, in which it is perfectly possible for both sides to argue their legitimacy and to say that God and justice are at their backs. But, as Dean Swift remarked 300 years ago,

> "We have just enough religion to make us hate, but not enough to make us love one another."

That has been evident in tonight's debate.

The real question is, is there any way forward, or must Secretary of State after Secretary of State be driven to madness in his quest for a solution? I still believe that there are grounds for at least believing that the position in the Province need not go on endlessly, as it has.

The Forum report was not one of the least biased documents that I have read, in terms of its analysis or description of the problem. However, for the first time a fundamental tenet was accepted on behalf of the constitutional parties of the South which is necessary if there is ever to be a solution: the people of the South and their representatives accepted that without the support of the majority of the people of the North there would be no solution of any sort.

It has surprised me for a long time that the Irish, who are renowned for their charm, wit and powers of seduction, have never made any serious attempt to use those attributes on their northern cousins. Why they believe that the heavy-handed English would be more adept in persuading Unionists to reach agreement with the South is beyond me.

If it is accepted that the constitutional parties of the South are prepared to look towards an agreement through compromise rather than through threat or fear, in the long-term—not in the short-term—there may be some hope. Hon. Members on the Unionist side have accepted through fair employment and civil rights legislation and through that admirable booklet "The Way Forward" that there is, and must be movement towards an agreement.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) asked why there was no coalition in Britain in view of the unemployment here. That is not the parallel. The parallel is to compare the problems of society in Northern Ireland with what happened here during the last war. If one multiplied the number of deaths, murders and the amount of mayhem that exist in Northern Ireland, the position is very different from the one that exists here. All party political leaders would have to consider carefully whether they should join together to find a solution to an unconstitutional party, such as Sinn Fein-IRA, if it threatened to destroy us. I thought that the right hon. Member made a case for the type of discussions that the Secretary of State said were so important.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that recently there was some turmoil in England, Scotland and Wales arising from the miners' strike? There was violence and mayhem, but there was no clear coming together of the Opposition with the Government to try to resolve civil strife. Is it not utterly ludicrous to suggest that when people are killing us we should join hands with them, especially when Sinn Fein now has the open backing of the SDLP, as we thought it had?

Mr. John David Taylor: It should have had Scargill.

Mr. Needham: To draw a parallel between Mr. Scargill and the miners's strike and the number of murders in Northern Ireland is as ridiculous as it is to suggest that the parties should not come together.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The hon. Gentleman must not go too far.

Mr. Needham: I was not trying to go too far. I was saying that the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley cannot compare unemployment here with the problems of Northern Ireland. That is not a fair comparison.

It is clear that, however well direct rule may have worked—I can understand that in some ways it has—it must be the second-best option for the British Government. I should have hoped that all those who represent the people of Northern Ireland in the House would have had their minds concentrated by the threat of the Provisional IRA and would have tried to find methods of working more closely together than they have in the past.

I do not believe that that will happen overnight. This evening's debate has clearly shown the difficulties in achieving that. I would sound a note of caution to the hon. Member for Foyle were he here, and to the Irish Government. There is a great deal of talk in southern Ireland at the moment about the possibility of what I might call a great leap forward—a fast move towards a final solution. The problem with exaggerating leaps forward is that they often end up in the dark.

The hon. Member for Foyle must explain what will happen to the initiative in which he puts so much faith if reasonable men after a reasonable time for good and understandable reasons do not agree that major steps can be taken at the moment which are saleable to both communities. To build up hopes only for them to be shattered plays to the wishes of Sinn Fein as much as have the activities of some councils in the last few weeks. I agree with the hon. Member for Foyle about that.

The chances of working toward better co-operation between the two sides is more likely to be successful with a step-by-step approach than by pinning too many hopes on some great solution from the two Governments.

I hope that agreement can be reached by the two Governments, but an arrangement will stick only if it takes into account the two certainties which I mentioned earlier. Those two self-evident truths are that the Unionists will never break their links, and that Irish nationalism in the North will not disappear.

There is no cross-community support for an agreed solution, but that does not mean that the British Government can fall back on the assumption that direct rule will solve the problem. The Government must continue to do everything that they can to bring about devolution. It is difficult to see how the politicians of the North can exercise power if they are not given responsibility. They do not now have responsibility. It is not possible for British politicians, who are remote from the problems, to appreciate, as Northern Ireland politicians can appreciate, what it is necessary to do.

The British Government must push equal opportunity into every aspect of life in Northern Ireland. The rules on flags and emblems which cover Northern Ireland, and the regulations on street names and all the other paraphernalia, would be laughed at if they applied to Wales. I appreciate the problems for the Province, but changes must be made. I was unconvinced by what the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) said about the need for marches to go down particular roads. Just because something has happened for 100 years does not mean that it must continue for another 100 years. In Britain the routes of marches are decided by the chief constable, taking into account the effects on residents. That should not be impossible in Northern Ireland, particularly amongst people who are proud of their British links.

I firmly believe also that it is important to build on the ties between the Irish and British Parliaments. The hon. Member for Foyle said that the problems were not about relations within Northern Ireland. What are they about if not about relations within Northern Ireland? A million or more Irish people have lived in Britain and have not needed great assistance from Government about what they do. Unfortunately, that is not the case in Northern Ireland. Equally, many English people have made their homes and lived happily in Eire. The problems of the North will not be solved by some great leap, but they can be solved in time if both communities work together. I was much heartened earlier this year to hear a group of Members from all the constitutional parties of Northern Ireland singing "We shall overcome". I am sure that that can happen, but my message to the House, to the Irish Government and to the hon. Member for Foyle is that we should not expect it to happen all at once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The occupants of the Front Benches hope to catch my eye at 11 o'clock. The time is shown by the clock over the Door and not on the digital clocks, which seem to have gone wrong.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I emerge from these debates feeling more depressed than ever. If we are left with the two major groupings in Northern Ireland, it seems that there is no hope. We shall continue discussing the issue endlessly unless the British people intrude at some stage. Speaking from this side of the water, I feel that I am intruding on a recital of private grief. Listening to those who represent the two major groupings in the House is rather like being transported to Ulster. I should love the British people to listen to these debates. There is a sense of hopelessness and the two sides which have struggled this evening seem to feel that the struggle will continue for ever. They do not produce any plans that are designed to solve the problem.

I have considerable respect for the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux). He delivers his speeches with immense moderation, but his grave underestimate of the forces ranged against Unionists emanated from almost his opening sentence. He suggested that events in Northern Ireland reflect a desire on the part of those engaging in shooting and bombing to be wicked. That implies that they have no cause to do so. Those who are using the bomb and the gun are deeply convinced politicos, and to fail to understand that is to fail to understand their motivation. They will continue to fight because the Ulster Unionists want to return to the old Stormont regime.

Hon. Members talk about the past and the marching season. They talk about marching through an area—I do not know whether this is true—in the knowledge that it will be an act of sheer provocation for those against whom they are ranged. The marches continue year in and year out. One can visualise the rolled umbrella and the sash which father wore, which was worn by Willy and so on. They parade up and down with the pipes in the obscenity of the marches, but no solution of any kind is forthcoming from them.

[Mr. Martin Flannery]

When I used to speak to my constituency party it never wished to discuss the Irish problem, but for the past two years the local party has asked for a report on Northern Ireland. The subject has been asked for. The Northern Irish Members talk to us as if we are foreigners and the Ulster tail wags the Westminster dog. It is time that the British people began to intervene or it is clear that no hope is emanating from the Northern Ireland Unionist parties.

The political struggle that takes place seems alien to many, and there are those in this place who want to re-enact it all over again. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley told us that the Unionists had never done anything wrong. He knows that they drew a line around an area of Northern Ireland and proceeded to suppress the minority from whom they had taken land. Yet they contend that they did nothing wrong and that all the trouble came from nothing. Hon. Members laugh, but I ask those who do so to offer a solution to the problem. The barreness and the sterility of their argument means that debates such as this will go on eternally. There is never any admission of error.

If a referendum were held, we would have to come out of Northern Ireland straight away. At least 70 per cent. of the British people would say that it was time that we came out. The British people were ready to intervene, but time has gone on, and a sense of helplessness pervades us.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber, so I shall not give way to him.

No solutions are supplied, and bigotry is triumphant. The attitude to the minority cannot be accepted easily. More and more people are beginning to see this.

Recently, I went to Northern Ireland with an official delegation of my party. We went because we have to talk. A childish attitude is shown by those who say that they will never speak to Sinn Fein. I am not new like the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames). I have been here a long time, and I have heard it all. Endlessly it was said that Sinn Fein would never go to the people because nobody would vote for it. Somebody has voted for Sinn Fein now, but nobody will speak to Sinn Fein members, and they are not to be allowed in the councils, although large numbers of people have voted for them—what childish nonsense that is. In one breath, it is said that nobody will vote for Sinn Fein, and therefore it is encouraged to enter the elections, but with the other, when people have voted for it, it is said that it will not play any role in the councils and its members should go away and not darken their doorsteps again. That is childish, and the British people will not accept such childishness.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the armed wing of the party to which he is referring has murdered a colleague of mine in the House, an Assembly Member colleague of mine, and three elected councillors in my constituency, and that members of that armed wing are in prison for conspiring to murder me and another member of my family? What advantage would there be for me in speaking to these people?

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman, as usual, overlooks the fact that on every occasion on which I have spoken on this subject, I have always admitted that I live here where it is reasonably safe, while the hon. Gentlman and his colleagues live in terrible danger. My heart goes out to them, and I respect them, and anybody else in that position. I know that the killings go in, but terrorists come over here and we know about them. However, we want to end the whole business instead of allowing it to go on for ever more, as it will if it is left to the hon. Members who have been arguing in the debate tonight.

I do not often quote Churchill, but I am doing so now. He said:

"To jaw-jaw is better than to war-war."

Was the great idol speaking rubbish? What he said will have to happen at some time.

Labour Members have gone across the water and spoken to people there. Unionists Members will not speak to anybody, but at some stage all parties will have to talk to one another because the British people will demand it. There must be a plan that will result in hands reaching across the borders, and the two sides coming nearer together. There is not the slightest sign of that happening, and therefore, our people will try to intervene to see that it does.

Mr. John David Taylor rose——

Mr. Flannery: The right hon. Gentleman has already intervened four times.

Mr. John David Taylor: On that point——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is clear that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has sat down.

10.45 pm

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Many people who have witnessed this debate for several years now feel that this exercise is annual repetition and mere ritual. Yet, on behalf of those who sent me to this House, it is important to remind the Government that many people do not accept that direct rule is an acceptable form of Government for Northern Ireland.

Indeed, this House would do better if it listened to reality rather than to speeches such as that from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman has visited one Loyalist home that has suffered loss, followed one Loyalist coffin or stood at one Loyalist grave, as I have done. Since I last spoke in this House, I have stood beside the coffin of a man from my district council area. He was simply a part-time member of the RUC—a sound, solid, honest, hard-working farmer who in the evenings sought to help his country in Her Majesty's forces.

As Willis Agnew was sitting in his car last weekend dropping off his intended wife at her home, the IRA shot him in the chest. Not satisfied with that his head was then battered in, and although he was dead, the trigger was pulled again. That gunman is the type of person with whom the hon. Member for Hillsborough wants us to enter a courtship.

On behalf of my constituents and the Loyalists of Ulster, I must tell the hon. Gentleman, "Whatever you demand, the Loyalists of Ulster will never soil the memory of those who have stood between us and the enemy by parleying with that enemy." The British Government faced Hitler and defeated those who stood against freedom. Until the day I die, I shall make no apology for fighting Sinn Fein and the murderers of my people on every corner. I shall never betray the trust of those people, whether or not it is demanded by the hon. Member for Hillsborough.

The hon. Gentleman can parley with Sinn Fein if he wishes—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has clearly demonstrated that his sympathy for those hon. Members who face the IRA is nothing more than crocodile tears. He would do far better if he kept his thoughts to himself instead of soiling this House with such hypocritical statements.

As a representative of this House, which believes in democracy, it is my right to defend those who believe in the right to live, and I defend that right whether my constituents are Roman Catholic or Protestant. I remind the House that many Roman Catholics joined the Protestants of Ulster and went over the top to defend the right of a free people. They faced Hitler and all those who challenged freedom.

Hon. Members should not speak as though every Roman Catholic is a Republican. Many Catholics in Northern Ireland are committed Ulster British sons and daughters, are proud of their British heritage and have stood shoulder to shoulder with Britain in time of war. The history as described by the hon. Member for Hillsborough was the biggest load of rubbish that I have ever heard. Instead of coming out with Republican propaganda, he should see the reality and tell the true story of the situation in our Province.

Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) is not now in his place. He spoke of two discoveries that he had made on visiting Northern Ireland. The first was that the Loyalists would not give up their British identity. I am delighted that he learned that, even though he thought the knowledge might result in him losing his head, so to speak.

The hon. Gentleman said, secondly, that the Republicans in Northern Ireland had a dream. I wish to make it clear that nobody is suggesting that a person in Northern Ireland cannot have a dream. But nobody who dreams of a united Ireland has the right to turn the country into a nightmare and make everybody else go through the nightmare of one coffin after another. Such a Republican dream for the future is not shared by the vast majority of the people of Northern Ireland.

I have found it strange that it should seem a sin to claim to be British when making speeches in this House. It seems a crime that I should say that I am a British Ulsterman. Crime or not, I am one. I was born into a strong Unionist family, a staunch British home, and I make no apology to anyone, here or across the water, for my Unionism or British standards and principles.

We are told by the hon. Member for Hillsborough that the people who commit murder are political folk. They are not. They are psychopathic killers. They are whole-hearted murderers with murder in their hearts. They wish to destroy not only Protestants, because the sacrifice made recently in Newry — including one person from my constituency who happened to be in the station when the bombs went off — included several honourable and decent Roman Catholics who had joined the RUC to do their bit to defend the people of Northern Ireland. Let us not have statements that have no foundation.

I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), whose every word seemed to be swallowed by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), who appeared to glance at the hon. Gentleman several times during his speech, as though hoping for an indication of approval. Let us be clear that the SDLP's hand is far from white in the troubles of Northern Ireland.

I wish that the hon. Member for Foyle was still in his place, because he misled the House. He said that wherever the SDLP was in control in local government, positions were given to members of all the other parties. The SDLP joined Sinn Fein in taking control of Magherafelt, and not one position—not even one of the simplest positions—was given to a Unionist.

The Unionists offered the SDLP the position of chairman and vice-chairman of the council, but the offer was not accepted. The SDLP had made an agreement with the friends of murderers and would-be murderers and was only too happy to give the vice-chairmanship to a Sinn Feiner who has clearly shown his colours since then. The chairman of Omagh council said that council workmen were legitimate targets. The vice-chairman of Magherafelt district council is on record as having said in the Chamber that he would back to the hilt the IRA when it declared certain people to be legitimate targets for murder.

The SDLP put the Sinn Fein member into power and joined with Sinn Fein for all other appointments. The only two councils in the Province where the SDLP did not join Sinn Fein were in the constituency of the hon. Member for Foyle. He knows as well as anyone that he wants to keep his seat safe and ensure the dominance of the SDLP in Foyle. It does not matter what happens in the rest of the Province — let Sinn Fein take the lead. The SDLP's hands are soiled.

A motion was tabled condemning the vice-chairman of the council for stating that council workers who donned the Queen's uniform were legitimate targets for murder, but the SDLP abstained. It would not condemn its Sinn Fein partners. One can easily prove from the council's records that SDLP members abstained from a vote condemning the murderous intent of the Sinn Feiners on that council.

SDLP members join the murderers when it suits them, but when it does not, they stand aside. They were offered the position of chairman and vice-chairman on the Fermanagh council, but they would not take those positions because they had entered into an agreement with their Sinn Fein partners.

The people whom I represent are sick and tired of Ministers trying to paint the SDLP members as constitutionalists. Left, right and centre we are told that the SDLP is a constitutional party. The SDLP's hand is far from clean in these troubles. As the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) said, it was the SDLP that led the parades and the civil unrest at the beginning of the troubles.

The people of Northern Ireland will not sell their birthright to anyone. We are British and British we shall remain. The hon. Member for Hillsborough said that he would threaten us with a referendum if the rest of the people of the United Kingdom said that they did not want this measure. That does not stop me from being British. By the grace of God, I shall be British until the day I die.

My constituents want to live in peace and in a place that provides prosperity for their children and to everyone, irrespective of who he is. They do not want to live with the murdering thugs who destroyed their kith and kin. I have carried to the grave two coffins bearing members of my own family circle—a 16-year-old lad, who was not a member of any organisation, and a 21-year-old lassie, who was blown to bits by the IRA. As I said in my maiden speech, I assure the House that I shall never soil their memory or that of any other innocent victim of the troubles by putting my hand to any deal that will be detrimental to our position in the United Kingdom. Direct rule must end. The Northern Ireland people must be given devolved government. The British Government owe it to the long-suffering, patient people of the Province to stop dillydallying and to give properly devolved government to the Northern Ireland people.

11 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I listen always with great interest to the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea), as I listen to all hon. Members.

We are drawing to a close a stimulating and long debate on a subject which does not take up a great deal of time in the House, yet repeats a familiar pattern, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) said.

In a speech which he made in an identical debate on the matter last year, my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) accepted the need for this continuing legislation, and described direct rule as everyone's second favourite option. The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster has indicated his favourite option, which is full devolution. Earlier this evening, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) described it as not everyone's first option. He also used the words "a Shakespearean tragedy". Of course, there are many tragic aspects to life in Northern Ireland, and it is with that that all politicians in the House and elsewhere seek to cope in a very genuine fashion.

We on this side of the House have noted—and I think that the Secretary of State also referred to this—the work of the Assembly in Northern Ireland and the degree of accountability to that Assembly. The Secretary of State said earlier that the Northern Ireland Assembly still has a role to play in the affairs of Northern Ireland. He also said that its deliberations had helped him and his ministerial colleagues. I have read most of the reports on the Northern Ireland Assembly that have come to the House, and the various Committees have shown some diligence in their treatment of a number of complex issues, including those dealing with wildlife and historic churches—not perhaps esoteric subjects, but ones which have been duly analysed and pronounced upon.

I was saddened, therefore, to note the rather pusillanimous approach that the Assembly took to a proposed draft Gas (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 which came before the Northern Ireland Committee of the House today. That Committee, I am glad to say, took a more robust stance, if I may borrow a phrase of the Secretary of State which he uses in another connection, on the town gas industry of Northern Ireland: the failure of the Government properly to consult; the failure of the Government to involve employers and employees alike in what is after all a participatory democracy; the failure to exercise vision into the future of a gas industry when there is natural gas round these islands and natural gas available from the Republic; and the failure to rise above the nonsense of a monetarist policy and, for a paltry £12 million a year, to retain the gas industry. It is the withdrawal of that £12 million subsidy which will lead to the loss of 1,000 jobs.

These matters were brought up at the Economic Development Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly, but in effect, notwithstanding an interesting cross-examination by members of the Committee of the Minister of State, they came to the conclusion,

"The Committee, having considered the arguments and discussed them with the Minister, is forced to accept that the Government's decision on the matter of closure is irrevocable."

Nothing is irrevocable in this life except perhaps death and taxes, and certainly not the closure of the town gas industry in Northern Ireland.

I sincerely hope that the Minister of State, who is not present tonight, for I know that he is in Northern Ireland, will wish to consider carefully the decision of the Northern Ireland Committee not to put the motion on the proposed closure to the House.

Mr. John David Taylor: The Minister might resign.

Mr. Bell: The right hon. Gentleman says that the Minister might resign. I am not going to offer that invitation to the Minister of State. I wish simply that he would reconsider the proposal and keep alive the gas industry and the 1,000 jobs in Northern Ireland.

Last year's debate immediately followed the debate on the All Ireland Forum report, to which the hon. Members for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) have referred. During the past few months we have not heard a great deal about the All Ireland Forum report. In one sense, this was the result of the press conference that followed the Chequers summit when the Prime Minister made swift and sweeping remarks about the various proposals. But a certain amount of obfuscation surrounds the recommendations of the All Ireland Forum report, because talks have since been held with the Dublin Government. We are not privy to those talks. We are not sure whether they are talks about talks, or substantive talks, or talks about security, or talks about joint authority—or simply talks.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West said earlier, we were promised a further summit meeting in February 1985 but it was postponed. We had expected a summit conference in June between the Irish Taoiseach and the Prime Minister, but it has not taken place. I do not now believe that there will be a summit until November when the party conference season is over. There are to be talks between the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach at the European summit meeting in Milan, but that is not the same as substantive talks with the Republic of Ireland.

In last year's debate, the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), categorised the positive aspects of the report. He described them as a serious examination of nationalist aspiration; emphasis on the importance of consent; unequivocal condemnation of violence; an attempt to understand the Unionist identity; and openness to discuss other views. It was also clear from the former Secretary of State's speech that there had to be firmness in the recognition of the Unionist cause; firmness in the acceptance of minority sensibilities; and firmness in the view that the road to terrorism or the rejection of law and order were no way forward.

It is in the light of these comments—one year on, so to speak—that we wonder out loud about further cross-border co-operation in the battle against terrorism. We wonder out loud about the creation of a security commission with the aim of enhancing co-operation between the two Governments in their mutual fight against terrorism. We wonder out loud about a British-Irish Parliamentary Council to be established by way of agreement or treaty between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic. We wonder out loud why there should not be an increase in the secretariat to be provided for the Anglo-Irish Council.

It is conceivable that all these measures are on the table in the discussions between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic. It may be that we shall not have long to wait to find out, but it is right that this House should tell the Government — and the official Opposition certainly tell the Government — not to slumber on these issues, not to sleep away an opportunity to reach accommodations with the Government of the Republic of Ireland, a Government who are reaching out in order to make substantive settlements to longstanding problems.

[Mr. Bell]

I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North. He asked what would be the policy of the official Opposition. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West has enunciated on several occasions what our policy would be. If it would interest the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North and the House, I shall briefly repeat it. We believe that it must be in the national interest to have on our western flank an Ireland that is united in peace and prosperity but, like the Republic of Ireland, we also accept that without the support of the majority of the north there can be no unity. The question is, how does one achieve this support? What is the strategy that clothes the policy? How does one resolve what the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North has described as two self-evident truths; that Unionism never breaks its links with this country and that nationalism in the north will not disappear?

We believe, however, that a positive approach, closeness to the Dublin Government — which was acknowledged earlier this evening by the Secretary of State—with time, patience, care and understanding will help to bring the communities together and achieve that peace and prosperity that we all wish to have in that part of our country and of the British Isles.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough, who came in for a great deal of undue, unthought-out criticism from the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster, has played a long part in the debates in the House. He has consistently and realistically spoken not only to the country through this House but to party conference and has taken a very sensible approach to the problem of Northern Ireland. He referred briefly tonight to the awakening of conscience within the Labour party and to barrenness and sterility in dealing with the issues that confront us all. He gets from me and from the Opposition the homage that he deserves for facing fully and without fear the issues that are before us.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Since the hon. Member is speaking for the official Opposition, will he make clear to the House the views of his party on two specific matters? First, does he share the view of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) that we should get out of Northern Ireland? Is that the view of the Labour party? Secondly, does he believe that the Government. Should negotiate with the political representatives of the IRA?

Mr. Bell: I thought that I had answered fully the first part of the first question, and I answered the second part earlier when I said that we believe that it is in the national interest to have on our western flank a nation that is at peace with itself, prosperous and a friend of our country, and that we should seek to achieve that unity through consultation with all the people in Ireland.

In relation to the second question, on negotiating with representatives of the IRA, I made the statement earlier that I had been on the front page of the Belfast Telegraph saying that we would talk with Sinn Fein, and talks mean talks. Talks, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough said, mean full and frank discussion. Had I been at those talks, my full and frank discussion would have involved telling them to set aside the Armalite and concentrate on the ballot box and the ballot paper.

I reiterate to the House, as we shall continue to do, notwithstanding barbs and asides, our total abhorrence of terrorism and all its works. To be sure, as the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley said earlier, we have seen the brotherhood of international terrorism recently in various events throughout the world. But terrorism is anathema to the very concepts of democracy in which we believe. Terrorism leaves widows and orphans, but does not find political solutions. It is very right and proper that in the debate that is to follow we shall draw proper attention to that. It must be stated very clearly that no members of the Opposition have accepted or accept violence.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North mentioned earlier 74 murders in County Fermanagh in 15 years. That situation is to be deplored whoever was the cause or the source of the murder.

The Opposition supports fully the continuation of direct rule. We accept that direct rule is the only option that we have before us tonight. It is essential for the governance of Northern Ireland. But direct rule cannot, nor should it be, used as a constitutional measure through which to discuss all matters which concern the citizens of the north and equally concern the citizens of the south.

I should like to end with a few lines of poetry:

"And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright."

We hope to see the day when the lands to the west of us are indeed bright—bright in prosperity, with peace in the hearts of the people who live there; we hope that that peace will bring about prosperity and the partnership between the communities to which the Secretary of State referred earlier.

11.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The debate has been wide ranging in subject and, at times, in decibel levels, but neither of those matters should be thought to be a ground for complaint. Any part of the United Kingdom that has suffered as grievously as Northern Ireland in recent years, whose system of government we are discussing today, is bound to arouse strong passions, and it is right that they should be expressed in this forum.

I have listened carefully to virtually the whole of the debate. After nearly four years as what I might call a creature of direct rule, I am as aware as most of the strengths and weaknesses of the system of direct rule. I believe that, with all the limitations that that system imposes on Ministers, Governments of both parties have sought to ensure that direct rule is as fair, even-handed and efficient as possible in the way that it has sought to bring about improvements in the technical machinery of government over those years.

Since 1982, as has been mentioned during the debate on more than one occasion, those Ministers who have been part of the system of direct rule have had the benefit of an Assembly in Northern Ireland of locally elected representatives of the people of the Province. They have been able to consult that Assembly on legislation and receive directly the views of the locally elected representatives. That may have made direct rule rather less comfortable than it was before, but it has made it more efficient and responsive to the views of the people of the Province.

Yet I am aware that, however hard Ministers may have tried, however much the Assembly may have contributed to improving the system of direct rule, it is flawed. That people from this side of the water should be moved across to Northern Ireland and asked to take on responsibility for many of the matters affecting the day-to-day lives of the men, women and children of Northern Ireland is far from the ideal position. As the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said, no one has it as his first choice; but many people — perhaps virtually everyone in Northern Ireland—have it as their second choice. Until it is possible to arrive at a position in which the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland can agree on a first choice that is acceptable, I am afraid that we are lumbered with direct rule. What we must seek is to make that system work in the meantime, while looking all the time for a way of devolving responsibility for day-to-day matters to a locally elected Government in Northern Ireland.

In asking the House to renew direct rule in this order tonight, I am also committing the Government to search for a better way of governing Northern Ireland — something that will restore to the political representatives of the people of the Province responsibility for those day-to-day decisions that affect the lives of people. That is not hedged around necessarily in total by the 1982 Act, about which I shall say a word or two in a moment. There is only one principle that is immutable—that there should be widespread acceptance of whatever alternative is undertaken. That is not something that is being stubbornly insisted upon by the British Government in any sense from pride of authorship; it is the only basis upon which any stable Government of Northern Ireland can be created.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman raised a number of points. The first one that I should like to nail is the suggestion that the Government are uncaring and give too low a priority to social programmes in Northern Ireland. Anyone who has seen the progress in housing in Northern Ireland in recent years, and seen the quality and number of houses being built, will recognise that that is one of the major features in Northern Ireland today.

In education, the expenditure per pupil has been steadily rising in recent years. We introduced the youth training programme a year ahead of its introduction in Great Britain.

Employment is increasing in Northern Ireland, although, alas, for demographic reasons, unemployment is also increasing. We must run very fast just to stand still. But there is no lack of effort in seeking to overcome the problems of unemployment that bedevil so many towns and cities in Northern Ireland. There is certainly no lack of will and commitment to social programmes. I wish only that the security position would improve to such an extent that some of the resources which, for the time being, must be devoted to the battle against terrorism could be devoted to those social programmes. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) demonstrated the hypocrisy of the men of violence and their supporters, who condemn social deprivation when, to a large extent, their activities are responsible for that deprivation.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about the status of the talks between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the political parties in Northern Ireland. Those talks were pursued first by my right hon. Friend and then by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. They were interrupted by the council elections. Recently my right hon. Friend had a stock-taking round of talks with each of the parties in Northern Ireland, and is now considering how best to take the matter forward in the months ahead. However, as I said earlier, we are determined to keep up the momentum in our search for an internal political solution that commands widespread acceptance in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) asked the Government not to stumble in their pursuit of that aim or of an agreement between the sovereign Governments of London and Dublin. Our first priority in Northern Ireland is the eradication—I emphasise that word—of terrorism. In pursuing our talks with the Government of the Republic, a priority is to ensure that the border between the two parts of Ireland is not a help to the men of terror. We shall be pursuing those talks vigorously to bring about that result in the immediate future.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) said that the 1982 Act is unworkable. The reason why it is unworkable is that people in Northern Ireland are not prepared to work it. He accused the Government of being unwilling to amend the Act. That is not true. If it became clear from the talks with the parties in Northern Ireland that amendments to the 1982 Act were necessary to provide Northern Ireland with a system of internal, devolved Government, there would be no bar to that as long as the principle of widespread acceptance across the community was an inherent part of that agreed way forward.

The right hon. Gentleman tried to use the analogy of the House of Commons and Government here, but the fact is that the nature of politics in Northern Ireland makes a change of the party in power almost impossible. That is the difference between the system of parliamentary democracy that we enjoy in this House and any system that could endure in Northern Ireland. A system of devolved government that can obtain widespread acceptance is the only stable alternative to direct rule, and the Government will continue to pursue that objective.

The right hon. Gentleman implied, if I understood him correctly, that the search for social and political progress in Northern Ireland was being undertaken to placate the IRA and its political supporters and advocates. That is a perversion of the truth. The people of Northern Ireland deserve those programmes in their own right. We know that the motive of the IRA is to destroy democracy in the North of Ireland and then to do the same in the Republic. We shall not falter in our determination to defeat those aims. We shall not weary of the task of defeating the IRA, and we must co-operate with our neighbours in the South in achieving our aims.

The right hon. Gentleman picked out the remarks of the leader of the Liberal party after the Home Secretary's statement about the arrests in Great Britain. Again, I must say that the right hon. Gentleman turns truth on its head. In pursuing the talks for either an internal settlement or agreement between the sovereign Governments in London and Dublin, we are not doing the work of the IRA. Every time there has been a chance of progress, either internally or internationally, the IRA has sought to prevent it and to destroy it. We are not doing their work but seeking to destroy and prevent them from doing their work.

Mr. Molyneaux: I hope that my later points will be dealt with in the next debate. I am sure that the Minister will accept that what I said about social and economic problems was the sort of thing that was said 10 years ago, which was that the IRA were in being simply because of economic and social conditions. With regard to the present, I was saying that Governments should not keep one eye on the IRA so that they relate political progress to the IRA's efforts.

Mr. Scott: We are certainly determined not to do that. The whole thrust of our policies is to defeat the IRA's aims and to eradicate terrorism from Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Foyle criticised the Government for our policy towards Sinn Fein. I freely accept that this is a matter for political judgment. It would be possible to move from the Government's present position in one of two directions: either towards the prescription of Sinn Fein, which is urged upon us by some people in Northern Ireland, or to give Sinn Fein equality of treatment as elected representatives. For the moment we believe that the policy enunciated by my right hon. Friend—that within the law we seek to draw as firm a distinction as possible between those who advocate constitutional politics and those who advocate violence—is the best way forward. However, I freely accept that it is a matter for political judgment, and that judgment could change from time to time according to the circumstances that prevail.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) raised a number of points. My right hon. Friend will address himself to the question of parades and marches in his opening speech on the next order. If there are any outstanding points, I shall deal with them when I reply to that debate.

Mr. Porter: Will my hon. Friend clarify what I understood to be a statement of policy? Did he say that it was possible that the Government would be prepared to speak to Sinn Fein regardless of whether it renounced violence?

Mr. Scott: It is utterly clear that Ministers will have no dealings with Sinn Fein unless and until it renounces violence. The present balance is obviously kept under review; it is a matter which could change as circumstances change. Certainly it is rock firm that so long as Sinn Fein advocates violence Ministers will have no dealings with it.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North spoke about police stations. I know that the position in many of the small police stations by the border is unsatisfactory, but it is unfair of him to castigate the police authority or the Government for not giving a firm commitment to improving those conditions as rapidly as possible. The size of the RUC has trebled during the past 10 years. It would be surprising if that had not created some accommodation problems, but we are determined to provide the resources in coming years to ensure that in all the police stations we have both the right living accommodation and the proper protection for the policemen who must work there.

As I said at the beginning, direct rule has brought many advances to Northern Ireland. In many ways, as a result of direct rule, Northern Ireland is more efficient, stable and fair now than when direct rule was introduced. Successive Governments have sought to be even-handed and to serve the whole community, despite some of the strictures uttered by the hon. Member for Foyle. However, there is still more to do if we are to live up to our target to ensure that the people of both traditions see that their tradition is fully respected. Direct rule is a fallback situation. We cannot be complacent, and we shall certainly continue to be committed in our search for a better way.

We shall seek to persuade the parties in Northern Ireland to put aside the old ways and to seek to co-operate together. There is potentially a new situation in Northern Ireland. There are new opportunities there for internal progress. I urge local parties to take them.

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978

11.42 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move,

That the draft Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 2) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 3rd June, be approved.

I make clear the Government's central commitment to firm, effective and measured security policies. I commend to the House the steady and determined professionalism of our security forces. I want to say something about the security situation, because that is the background against which we ask the House to renew the powers. I shall also set out the Government's response to the late Sir George Baker's valuable review of the operation of the Emergency Provisions Act.

Our debate earlier today recognised the wider political context in which the security situation has to be discussed. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and I have made clear, we shall go on working for political and economic improvements. But the House should not persuade itself that positive developments in either the economic or the political life of Northern Ireland will deflect the terrorist. I agree with what the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) said about that in the previous debate, although I did not recognise the account that he then gave of Government policy on that score.

Whatever other developments there may be, security will remain our first priority. It is the first requirement in any democracy, and it is by far the most important public service. So, with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding it is my job to continue to work out measures which put the terrorists under intense pressure, and bring their campaign of violence to an end. Security policy is not static, but continually changing. We would be stupid to advertise the changes, and that sometimes makes it difficult to deal with criticisms. I sometimes feel that the terrorists have a clearer idea of the efficiency and success of the security forces than some of those whom the security forces protect, but perhaps that is inevitable.

I understand fully the strength of feeling about old and recent tragedies in Northern Ireland. I am informed of each and every death whenever it occurs, and I know the effect of such news. One feels the sorrow and anger—and the weight of responsibility too. We must and shall do all within our power to bring terrorism in Northern Ireland to an end. But I want to make another thing clear. No one helps a difficult situation by acting outside the law or by wild talk encouraging such acts. There is no such thing as security outside the law.

I have to hand the latest figures for violence. Such figures are, and should be, regularly given to the House. They show that so far, violence in 1985 is roughly comparable with violence in 1984, which saw less violence than any year since 1970. I report the figures to the House every month, but I shall not repeat them now in case I should be accused of being complacent about them, for I recognise that such figures can never give a true picture of the human tragedy which they represent. Each entry in the statistics is a new misery, and each entry should harden our resolve to continue to find ways of overcoming terrorism.

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

The RUC has borne the brunt in recent weeks. Total casualty figures have not increased, but the proportion of them borne by the RUC has increased. Since January, 19 police officers have been murdered by terrorists. As I would expect, the RUC has responded with calmness, with high professionalism and cool determination. The Chief Constable and all his officers have earned, deserved, and received, our greatest respect and appreciation. The RUC has relied on, and been given, the support of the regular Army and the UDR. In both cases, that support will remain essential.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): My right hon. Friend will know that an investigation is still going on into the Newry and Killeen incidents. When he has had an opportunity to study those reports will he take into account, in particular, the concern about whether adequate Army protection is available to the relatively much more vulnerable and targeted police?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I shall do that. It is my experience that the co-operation between the Army and the RUC is extremely close and confident. Where there is a request for support from the RUC, the Army are quick and willing to give it.

The essence of our policy is simple. It is that the security forces should operate within the law to bring those guilty of terrorism crimes to justice before the courts. The Government will not allow themselves or the security forces to be drawn on to any other ground. Any other approach would be wrong in principle and counter-productive in practice.

This policy can provide the community with the service they need only if the security forces can be sure of the support of all those within the community who obey the law. Indeed, this is true of all parts of the criminal justice system, from the policeman on the beat to the highest court in the land. We must continue to look for ways of winning the confidence and securing the support of the whole community. Many opportunities already exist. They extend from local police liaison groups, formal and informal, through encouraging recruitment from all parts of the community to my proposals for a more independent element in the way complaints against the police are examined. They include keeping the operation of the criminal justice system under close review to ensure that it is fair and effective and that it strikes the right balance between the rights of the individual and the needs of society to be protected from violence and crime. This effort cannot be one-sided. It is not just a matter for the Government or the police. It is up to the whole law-abiding community and its political leaders to show that they hold to the basic principles that underlie our system of law and order and that they are prepared to support and sustain those who duty is to protect us all.

Of course there is room for improvement. Criticisms should be voiced and proposals made. Only a stupid Government close their ears to the suggestions of their fellow citizens, but those suggestions need to be judged against whether they sustain or undermine the true interests of security on which our freedom depends.

I should like to say something about a matter that was raised in the earlier debate, because it is an area where an immediate and practical contribution can be made to help the police during a difficult period. I am referring to the control and routeing of parades and marches, which several hon. Members in different parts of the House have already mentioned.

I endorse what the Chief Constable said about provocative parades and marches in the foreword to his annual report last year. These can lead to disorder and retaliation, and they require the deployment of considerable police resources that could be put to much better use in countering the terrorist threat. I suggest that limitations to the traditional routes are not a restriction on individual liberties and that a responsibility rests on the organisers of all parades—traditional or non-traditional — from both communities to show a greater understanding of the difficulties that the police face. They should show more flexibility than has sometimes been shown in the past over the choice of routes.

The Chief Constable has said that he will be ready to impose conditions on a march if necessary, but that should be a last resort. We are not talking about a general or inflexible policy but about local discussions between the police and the organisers and decisions taken one by one by the Chief Constable in the light of local circumstances.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): As the right hon. Gentleman quite properly states, the routeing of parades is a matter for the Chief Constable and not the Executive. That being so — and as the right hon. Gentleman in a written reply to me after St. Patrick's day confirmed that the Irish Republic Government had made representations about the routeing of parades in Northern Ireland — will he reject the right of the Dublin Government to influence the routes of parades when the Executive of our own country does not interfere with police decisions?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman knows the legal position. If there is a suggestion that a parade should be banned — [Interruption.] I am trying to complete the picture, because the picture given by the right hon. Gentleman was incomplete. If there is a proposal that any parade should be banned, that requires my approval. If it is a suggestion that a parade should be re-routed, as the right hon. Gentleman correctly said, that is a matter within the operational responsibility of the Chief Constable. These are not matters for outside intervention. They need to be decided in the light of a careful assessment of each local situation and the priority which I hope all hon. Members, leaders of constitutional parties and those concerned with the security of the Province, would give to the maintenance of public order.

There is a case in the future for looking at our public order legislation as it bears on the control of parades and demonstrations, especially in the light of the Home Secretary's recently published paper on this subject. That is a matter which I shall be examining carefully.

As we know, terrorists are at present active, particularly in border areas. Hon. Members who represent constituencies in those areas know that better than anyone else. Only the most determined and sustained effort in those areas will deal with the threat. In this task, our security forces in Northern Ireland depend crucially, as many incidents have exposed, on the co-operation that they receive from the Irish Republic. Nobody who wants to be taken seriously in discussing security can ignore that fact.

The efforts that the Garda already make have saved lives. But I would like to see, as I am sure the whole House would like to see, more intense co-operation at all levels to help counter the threat along and across the border. The Irish Government are, of course, well aware of our views. They have made no secret of their abhorrence of terrorism. The defeat of terrorism is as much in their interest as it is in ours.

I hope that the Garda and the RUC will find more ways of working more closely together and that, in the natural course, meetings will be held at all levels, including at the most senior. We all have much to gain — and the terrorist has most to fear—from better co-operation and a close understanding with the Irish on security matters. That is why Sinn Fein and the IRA are so strongly opposed to our present discussions with the Irish Government. They know what they have to fear from more effective security co-operation. They do not want to be throttled or deprived of the border as an operational asset. Therefore, they hope and work for the breakdown of discussions between the British and Irish Governments.

Some concern has been expressed recently, in the House and elsewhere, about the resources available to the RUC, now that the RUC has primacy in conducting the security policy. We shall continue to provide the necessary level of support, and such support is the first claim on my budget. Expenditure on the police service has quadrupled in real terms in the last 12 years. To a large extent, this reflects the growth in the size of the RUC in recent years.

There have been three increases in the authorised establishment of the force in the past four years, raising the ceiling of the regular RUC and the full-time reserve to a total of 11,000. When we have filled the few hundred remaining vacancies in the next few months, the overall strength of the force will have doubled in little more than nine years. The number of civilians working in direct support of the RUC has increased over the same period from 860 to almost 2,000, thus releasing police officers from administrative to operational duties.

The net result is that the total man hours worked by full-time officers of the force during 1984-85—which is the most reliable indicator of the police effort—rose to its highest ever annual level of 23·1 million. It is right that such a large commitment of resources should be carefully managed to ensure that it is directed to the sharp end of policing and to our main priority, the defeat of terrorism. I therefore welcome the work of the police authority and the Chief Constable on the efficient management of these resources.

I do not suppose that anywhere in the world — certainly anywhere in the western world — there has been such a rapid expansion of a police force to deal with a particular threat in so short a time. Of course, it creates problems—as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) will know from experience — some of which we have heard about, such as accommodation. Those are problems that we must tackle with as much speed and effectiveness as the build-up of the force. The build-up of the force and its spirit and professionalism after such a rapid increase is a notable achievement, not principally by Government but by the RUC and the community from which its members are drawn.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain to me and to many people in my constituency who are puzzled about this why house searches have beeen carried out by masked men in civilian clothes supported by members of the police force? Does the right hon. Gentleman support this practice? What is the reason for it?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has not raised this matter with me before. If he will give me details of time and place, I shall of course look into what he says.

I should like to turn to our discussion of the recommendations made by the late Sir George Baker in his valuable review of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978. The Act gives the security forces and the courts additional powers to counter the terrorist threat. Sir George concluded that there was little scope for fundamental changes to the Act but considered that in some areas it could be adjusted and that some powers could be given up. I have already made it clear that we accept the broad thrust of the review, and I should now like to set out briefly our main conclusions, which will be incorporated in a Bill to be brought before the House when the parliamentary timetable permits.

Sir George recommended that the detention provisions of the Act, which remain on the statute book although not in force, should be repealed. As I said in December, I cannot foresee these powers being used in anything other than a short-term crisis of major proportions. Obviously, we hope that we shall not face such a crisis. After much thought, I have come to the conclusion that if such a crisis were to arise in a recess when we had dropped this reserve power, it could be difficult to offer the Northern Ireland people the protection that they would need. I have thought about this matter carefully, and I have decided that the prudent course is not to accept this recommendation but to retain the detention provisions on the statute book.

I have carefully considered the recommendations in the report about the types of offences that would be brought before non-jury, or Diplock, courts. I think that we all want a restoration of jury trial for all offences in Northern Ireland. I am sure that Sir George was right in concluding that restoration of jury trial is not possible in present conditions. I therefore propose that, in accordance with Sir George's recommendations, schedule 4 to the Act should be amended to increase the Attorney-General's discretion to certify cases out of the scheduled mode of trial. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General considers that it is right to retain this discretion for himself, although Sir George recommended that it should be delegated to the Director of Public Prosecutions. We shall frame our proposals in the light of my right hon. and learned Friend's decision. The list of cases to which such discretion will be extended is not precisely that proposed by Sir George, but in substance I accept his recommendations and they will be included in the Bill.

I have decided not to accept the recommendation that a judge should have discretion to dismiss the jury in a jury trial and continue in the schedule mode, that is without a jury. We believe that, in those circumstances, retrial of the case is the better course.

Sir George made a number of recommendations about police arrest powers, which, broadly, would have had the effect of duplicating the police arrest powers contained in section 12 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act (Temporary Provisions) 1984. We propose to meet the spirit of these recommendations by repealing the arrest powers in section 11 of the Act, leaving the RUC to rely on those contained in section 12 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act. That will be a considerable simplification for all concerned. Persons arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism Act must be charged or released within 48 hours, rather than the 72 hours allowed under section 11 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act, although the former period may be extended by a period or periods not exceeding five days. Extensions beyond 48 hours require specific authority from the Executive and thus remain under close ministerial control. The change that I am suggesting will mean that the initial period of arrest without ministerial involvement will, in all cases, be 48 hours, and the maximum period will be seven days. So far as the Army's arrest power is concerned, no final decision has been taken on the need for or form of any modifications to section 14, but I intend that a power of Army arrest should be retained.

Like Sir George, the Government endorse the present practice of the courts in bail applications. I suggested in December that, as the practice seems satisfactory, there might be no need to amend the law. But, having thought about it again, I think that it would be right to change the law. I therefore propose that section 2(2) of the Act should be recast to move the onus in bail applications towards the prosecution. That would be in line with the present practice of the courts. Section 2(4) should be repealed, as Sir George recommended, and section 2(5) widened to include members of the RUC and RUC reserve.

The practice of the courts in respect of the admissibility of confessions was endorsed by Sir George Baker.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Does the Minister have it in mind to accept the overall period of 12 months?

Mr. Hurd: I am coming to that shortly. I had passed to the admissibility of confessions. The present practice was endorsed by Sir George Baker. I feel inclined to reflect in section 8 of the Act the principles that the judges now apply.

The last of the major changes recommended by Sir George Baker was that the temporary provisions of the Act should be reviewed annually by Parliament, and should have a maximum life of five years without re-enactment. In this, Sir George follows the pattern that Parliament has already adopted in respect of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. His recommendation is a welcome restatement of the clear responsibility of Parliament and of the Government to consider afresh whether any emergency provisions should continue and, if so, in what form, and I accept his recommendation.

I should like to touch on another set of recommendations contained in the review. I have studied carefully those recommendations that bear, or could bear, upon the problem of delays in the judicial system, including his recommendation of a time limit of 12 months on the period between committal and trial. I am considering this and other possible ways of reducing the length of time between first remand and trial because I accept that this is a vulnerable aspect of the present judicial system. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has decided, as the House knows, to mount field trials in England and Wales on a system of statutory time limits. I am not sure that all the same considerations and all the same possibilities exist in Northern Ireland, but I am in touch with my right hon. and learned Friend, and I will watch progress with the trials with interest to see whether there is scope for doing something similar in the different circumstances of Northern Ireland.

I am also giving thought to the proposal by Sir George Baker that some way should be found to increase the maximum remand period in scheduled cases to 28 or 30 days. The current situation is unsatisfactory, as hon. Members with direct experience will know. At present, all such persons have to be produced before a magistrate once a week, but the magistrate has no power to grant bail and can only remand the accused persons for a further period. Thus the process is largely, in Sir George Baker's words, "meaningless" and "a waste of time, money and resources".

Following the precedent in England and Wales, we are already considering separate legislation that would extend from 14 to 28 days the maximum period for which, if he agrees, an accused person may be remanded in custody. There would be attractions in amending the emergency provisions Act 1978 so as to remove in respect of scheduled cases the requirement for a person to give his consent. Taken together, these changes would give magistrates the discretion to remand persons accused of scheduled offences for up to 28 days. This would save a good deal of unnecessary court time and other resources —resources that could be better used in minimising the length of time between first remand and trial. Defendants who did not make weekly remand appearances would still have regular access to their solicitors and other visitors, and could make bail applications in open court at short notice. I recognise that the arguments are not all one way, and that is why I have laid both sides of the argument before the House, but I believe that the balance of the argument points to an amendment along the lines that I have described. When the time comes, the House will have ample opportunity to look in detail at the proposals because they will require changes in the law.

I have been unable, in the short space of time available, to do full justice to each of Sir George's recommendations, but I hope what I have said illustrates the broad thrust of our response. The Government will put legislation before the House when they can, certainly during the lifetime of this Parliament.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): The Secretary of State has studiously avoided referring to Sinn Fein, yet the Baker report is shot through, from the first paragraph to the end, with Sir George Baker's astonishment that this organisation is allowed to exist. He states that be believes that IRA murderers could be proved to be the agents of Gerry Adams and his Sinn Fein associates. A few months ago the Secretary of State assured me that he would address himself to the Baker recommendations, yet he has ignored doing so tonight. Will he please say something about those recommendations?

Mr. Hurd: I looked carefully for the hon. Gentleman and referred in reasonably complimentary terms to him in his absence during my first speech, when I dealt at some length with the Government's attitude towards Sinn Fein. Further examination is required of Sir George Baker's recommendations. I am not enamoured of his particular proposal, but if the hon. Gentleman will read in Hansard what I said earlier about Sinn Fein he will see what the Government are doing about it.

I believe that the modifications I have mentioned will represent steps towards restoring normality to Northern Ireland. They are small steps, perhaps, but they are worth taking. Because our security policy is not static I shall continue to keep a careful watch upon it, and also upon its legislative basis. Our policy cannot be inflexible and unimaginative. If it is to succeed, it must be capable of responding quickly to changing circumstances.

As for the motion before the House this evening, I do not believe that it could possibly be argued by any realistic person that the security forces and the courts do not need the powers granted by the emergency provisions Act to enable them to combat terrorism. I should be amazed if, in their hearts, those on the Opposition Front Bench, who now have the same length of experience of these matters as I have, had come to the conclusion that these powers are unnecessary. I shall be interested to hear their views on this subject.

We have seen a number of appalling terrorist outrages around the world in recent weeks, including in Northern Ireland, and many Governments are urgently reviewing the steps that can be taken to meet the terrorist threat. Northern Ireland continues to face a vicious terrorist campaign that has resulted in an intolerable loss of life. Some improvement has been achieved, but we are emphatically not in a position to relinquish measures that undoubtedly save lives, for without them the men of violence would be able to operate with greater freedom and to even greater deadly effect. Therefore, I confidently invite the House to agree to extend the life of the 1978 Act by a further six months.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The time available for this debate is relatively brief. That is a consequence of the manner in which the Government have tabled their business, so I assume that that is what they intended. One consequence, which may not greatly trouble the Government, is that my contribution to this debate must be brief. That is made easier because on successive occasions over the past two years I have had the opportunity to expound in some detail the Opposition's views on the emergency provisions Act, and anything I say on the subject tonight will be in the nature of repetition.

It was kind of the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) to regret that in an earlier debate I did not repeat in detail what I had said on previous occasions. I do not propose to do so in this debate either. If he was not in attendance on any of the occasions when I said it, I can direct his attention to the Official Report. This will not be an extended contribution, but since the Opposition propose to divide the House on the motion I owe it to hon. Members to offer a brief statement on our position.

In an earlier debate today I spent some time repeating what I have said on many occasions and what perhaps hardly required saying—that there is no issue between any of the parties in the House, certainly not between the Government and the official Opposition, on our attitude to violence. We all wholly condemn the unlawful use of violence in the pursuit of any political objective, whether in 1920 or in 1985. The question is how people can most effectively be protected from that violence.

In an earlier debate I referred in passing to two questions: how can we remove the economic and social grievances which provide a recruiting ground, particularly among the young, for paramilitaries of either persuasion; and how can we resolve the political issues that give rise to such a sick and distorted sense of mission and isolate the men of violence?

In this debate I want to pose a third question. How can we ensure that the measures that we take to safeguard law and order are effective and not counterproductive?

Our anxieties about the emergency provisions Act are on three matters and I shall do no more than refer to them because I have developed them all on previous occasions.

The first question in our minds is whether the powers are necessary to enable those who have to enforce the law to do their job. The right hon. Gentleman said in somewhat sweeping terms that he would be amazed if anyone could doubt the proposition. I have ventured in the past to doubt the proposition and I have given my reasons in detail. I only say tonight that we recognise, as we have always done, that we charge those who have to enforce the law with a difficult and frequently dangerous duty, and we owe them support in the discharge of that duty. But to offer them powers which are not necessary is not an effective way of giving them that support. It is quite the reverse. To do so is to create unnecessary problems, for reasons to which I shall refer in a moment.

I noticed yesterday that the Home Secretary was anxious to emphasise that in discovering the recent plot the police availed themselves of certain powers in the Prevention of Terrorism Act. We may be told more about that at a later date. But he never suggested that the powers in the emergency provisions Act assisted them in any way, and it is difficult to see how they could have done.

The very name of the Act that we are considering today emphasises that these are powers which were taken because the authorities were facing an emergency. They recognised—quite rightly—that it was not be regarded as a normal way of conducting our affairs. I hope we all agree that we ought not to let ourselves be coerced by men of violence into departing more than is essential from our normal way of life, or they will have achieved their objective.

In the course of the debate on the Baker report on 20 December 1984, the right hon. Gentleman said, and he said it again today, that he had considered section 12 of the Act, which permits detention without trial. That provision has not been used since 1975, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) announced that he would no longer avail himself of it. The Secretary of State had been asked—and he has obviously directed his mind to it again tonight—why, if it was never used, it was allowed to remain on the statute book. His answer, as I understand it, is that a situation might occur, perhaps when Parliament was in recess, when he might feel a need to use it.

I do not believe that that is a proper approach to emergency powers in a free community, when we have these powers not because they have been shown to be necessary but lest they might become necessary at some hypothetical time in the future. I could go through the powers one by one, as I have done in the past, and show that there are other powers available to the authorities to do what they may wish to do. I cannot do that tonight, for obvious reasons.

Our second anxiety about the Act is that it is literally counterproductive. The Secretary of State quite rightly emphasised that the law can be upheld only by lawful methods. The most effective way to combat crime of any sort is to ensure that the community believes that the legal system and those who enforce it are not only lawful but manifestly fair and that they protect the legitimate interests of all law-abiding sections of the community. Then, indeed, they will support the police, provide information, offer themselves as witnesses and express their disapproval of those who break the law.

That is not the case in Northern Ireland at the present time. An opinion poll published in the Belfast Telegraph on 6 February showed that nearly two thirds of the Catholic community believed that the legal system was unfair. Of course, some things are perceived as unfair because they manifestly are unfair. That is true of some practices associated with what have come to be called the supergrass trials. But again, I have elaborated on that in the past and in this limited debate it would not be fair to others who wish to speak if I repeated it.

I wish to emphasise only two things. It makes no contribution to dealing with paramilitaries to convict the wrong people. Not only illegality but unfairness in any system which depends upon public co-operation is counterproductive. Those who invoke Satan to cast out Satan are to be condemned not only for moral reasons but because it simply does not work.

Our final reason for opposing the order is that after 15 months the Government have still not implemented even the limited amendments to the law which Sir George Baker recommended as necessary. In the debate on the renewal order on 5 July last year, I sketched the history of the anxieties that had been expressed about the Act, the somewhat belated announcement of the inquiry and the further delayed appointment of Sir George Baker. Sir George worked with commendable energy and expedition to report in March 1984. His recommendations were not so radical as some of us might have hoped, but his report seems to have shared the fate of so many reports. It was welcomed, tributes were paid to Sir George, but there was a certain lack of urgency in implementing his recommendations. Of course, I welcome the fact that today the right hon. Gentleman has offered us his reactions, but I am bound to say that what he said hardly allayed our anxieties. It will require more than that to change our view. This is not the occasion to react in detail to what he said, but today we are considering the Act in its unamended form.

I have no doubt that I shall be taken to task by those holding a whole spectrum of various views because I have made no mention of matters which they believe to be important. Silence does not imply a lack of concern; I am simply conscious that there are hon. Members in the Chamber who were not able to contribute to the earlier debate, and this debate has only limited time. I have given this explanation only lest our reasons be misrepresented; lest it be suggested that the Opposition are insufficiently concerned with law enforcement. Any lack of concern is not ours. Those who have demonstrated a lack of concern are those who have reacted so tardily to the Baker report and those who have denied us adequate time to debate this motion tonight.

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): I shall be very brief, but I must comment on what I regard as a deplorable speech from the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). He knows as well as anyone else in the House that the Provisional IRA and all other terrorist organisations are evil and ruthless. So far as one can judge, they want only one thing: to overthrow the existing order and replace it with themselves. No doubt if they achieve that, they would keep order with the same methods as they used to get it. As we know, they will do anything to achieve their objectives. They will murder —Airey Neave, for example. They will murder British soldiers, Irish soldiers, and innocent citizens in Northern Ireland. They will resort to the weapon of blackmail by using the hunger strike, which happened when I was Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. They will murder indiscriminately innocent people on the mainland.

Terrorists will use any method to achieve their ends, yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman maintains that they should be dealt with as though they were people who had broken the speed limit in Sussex. I cannot believe that Labour Back-Bench Members will support him. I hope that they will not. I beg them not to support him, because the emergency powers that we are being invited to renew tonight are a weapon which we would much rather not use if we had the opportunity, but which we have used and which the people whom we hire to work on our behalf —the security forces—wish to continue to use. They believe that they are to our advantage.

Mr. Archer: The right hon. Gentleman has recounted many facts, none of which is in issue in the debate, as I thought I had made clear. Is he disagreeing with the statement of the present Secretary of State that we should deal with those people by due process of law, as we would deal with someone who broke the speed limit, or is he suggesting that there is something to be gained by unlawful methods of dealing with them?

Sir Humphrey Atkins: Perhaps I could remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that this House and the other place make the law. We are being invited to continue a law that we have made. If we pass it, it is lawful.

The point that I am trying to make is that we are dealing with evil men. The security forces, whether they be the British Army or the Royal Ulster Constabulary, which we hire to defend innocent citizens, believe that they need the powers in the Act. Yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman says that they should not have them. If he and Labour Back-Bench Members vote against the order, they will deprive the security forces upon which we rely of a power that they believe they need. I beg Labour Members not to vote against the order.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): I believe that the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the emergency provisions played a part in this week's dramatic good news about police operations. I wish to place on record my thanks to and praise of those Scotland Yard and special branch officers who, through diligence, patience and skill, frustrated the IRA's planned carnage at our seaside resorts. There is no doubt that police intelligence and skill, backed by our anti-terrorist legislation, has saved hundreds of lives.

If we are to combat those evil men, we must maintain the full legal armoury that Parliament has decreed should be available. There is no doubt that if our security forces had not been equipped with those legal powers, once again we would be mourning the deaths of scores of innocent British and American tourists in London. But there are many examples of terrorists slipping through the emergency provisions net. Even the present legislative controls do not stop them.

I am also pleased at the appointment of Sir Kenneth Newman, who has been given the supreme task of overseeing the hunt for other terrorists, for bomb workshops, and of eliminating the worrying possibility of one or more bombs having been placed in hotels with delayed timing devices. There is no man better equipped for that job. I know from working with him that he has the intelligence, the experience and the steel to pursue that task with the vigour that it deserves.

The Provisional IRA and the Irish National Liberation Army visit Britain in their various guises, observed at the Irish exits under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Acts. They visit friends and relatives, mingle in the groups of football spectators to the west coast matches, attend boxing in London, and occasionally divert en route to leave a message in a covert drop, to awaken a sleeper here and there, to assemble an active service unit, to collect and store bomb-making equipment, to establish safe houses and so on. All the time in our midst some terrorist activity is taking place by the Irish terrorist groups and their friends in Great Britain. Therefore, constant surveillance is absolutely necessary. The maintenance of these emergency provisions is an arm of the law which must be continued.

Our security and intelligence officers, manning the air and sea ports of Northern Ireland, need the right, and thus the backing of Parliament, to watch faces, track their movements, and recognise the mug shots of wanted men, especially those who managed to remain free after the mass escape from the Maze prison — that college of higher learning in Irish nationalism, military discipline and terrorist activity. Yet, even some of those men have escaped the emergency provisions net. Therefore, when we hear or read of some outcry at a port in Northern Ireland or Great Britain concerning one or more persons being held and protesting their innocence—they may well be innocent — we must recognise that the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and the emergency provisions in operation will cause some nuisance and inconvenience.

Some do-gooders will rise in anger at this intrusion into our peaceful, democratic way of life. I do not complain when they say that our civil liberties have been breached again. But what if, in that batch the special branch has collared, there are a couple, whom it has held under suspicion, who were wanting to effect a post drop, to awaken a sleeper, or to activate an active service unit? In the time that they can be held under the emergency provisions legislation in Northern Ireland or the prevention of terrorism legislation in Great Britain, it will be a failed mission. If there is no evidence against them, their return home is being frustrated, but their mission will have failed.

No doubt that has happened time and time again. There is no telling how many lives have been saved as a result. Some completely innocent people may have been held with them, perhaps even as a shroud when one in a group of travellers is a suspect. That is the price that we have to pay when terrorism and terrorists abound within our shores.

It is also important to understand that the emergency provisions and the extension of arrest time legislation give the police the time to check the forensic evidence that they have available regarding prints on guns and bomb-making equipment, and to match that evidence in the time available. I ask my parliamentary colleagues not to relax these laws. They are more important now than at any time since their inception. There may be fewer terrorists in total, but there are proportionately more hard-line callous men. The INLA wanted to prove that its way of getting rid of the British was the best. It decided, therefore, to ignore the giving of warnings to the security forces and to deal out damage and death on a massive scale, adopt a higher profile and be not concerned about the propaganda backlash. The hawks in the Provisional IRA are now bent on the same path—one evil group trying to outdo the other. It is like a competition in mass assassinations. Now, it is not just public buildings with HMG stamped upon them or hotels, with evacuation warnings given, that are attacked, but carnage on any scale and affecting anyone. That is the major change.

A great deal of that carnage coincided with and flows from the Maze break-out — 17 hard-bitten killers and mass murderers on the run who have no qualms about blasting bodies to pieces and, what is more, schooled from their Maze prison experience better than their counterparts. No doubt a steely bitterness is in their veins. The Brighton bombing was an example of that, as was last week's planned wholesale carnage.

In the light of all that, I ask my colleagues not to parley with Provisional Sinn Fein. I believe that that organisation, the councillors in particular, is the political agent of those Provo terrorists.

I have noticed that some of my colleagues have met Gerry Adams, one of the godfathers of terrorism. I remember that, shortly after that meeting in the 1983 recess, we had the Maze break-out. Adams would have known about the planned break-out at the time of that meeting. He must have been inwardly smirking at the thought of meeting true democrats on the eve of that planned murderous break-out.

I am aware that further meetings have taken place. Many Provisional Sinn Fein councillors are former Maze men. They are not ordinary criminals as we understand them, having served the sentence and wiped the slate clean. They have been retrained, rested, and refurbished, but they are more political, and let us not be kidded by the political activity with which they attempt to cloak their terrorism.

It is not just ballot box and bullet now, frightening as that is; it is ballot box and mass slaughter. Since the intervention of PSF in the local political scene, the militant element has clearly been given a free rein. One of the reasons for that is that no more elections are pending for a while. It is not unduly worried about public opinion.

I am of the opinion that those PSF councillors should also be banned from entering this parliamentary building. It is an extraordinary measure, but it should be taken against those known supporters of terrorism. They should be banned because their memories will be long and their feelings bitter and I believe that they will use any political contact for entry into the United Kingdom's most revered democratic institution.

The emergency provisions legislation can be used for that purpose. Those men are known. When they leave Northern Ireland for Great Britain our parliamentary security teams should be informed, provided with their mug shots and should bar them from entering the precincts of the Palace of Westminster. Their main purpose will not be to make political contact with known friends, or even to take advantage of appearing politically respectable. Instead, they will minutely scrutinise the security screens, the checking-in methods, the layout of rooms, the Ministers' sectors and where Members of Parliament, former Ministers and Ministers tend to congregate. Some of those men will have been trained for just that purpose. I say do not give them a chance. After Mountbatten, Brighton, Harrods, the penetration of these precincts on two occasions and the horrifying latest scare, we must make sure that those Provisional Sinn Fein agents of Provo terrorism are banned from this building. It will be a prime target, especially if they are seeking revenge.

In the light of what I have said, for the sake of all our peoples, and so that my party is not misunderstood, I urge my colleagues not to vote against the order tonight.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I wish to use the opportunity given by this debate to refute a common assumption which has serious consequences for security in Northern Ireland and has been one of the causes of the perversion of Government policy in dealing with it. It featured in the speech with which the Secretary of State opened the debate. I refer to the assumption that for the successful combating of the Provisional IRA the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic is a sine qua non.

I understand how this might appear to be reasonable and even axiomatic to those who are unacquainted with the circumstances in Northern Ireland. People might well say that it is not attractive, that the explosives used in Northern Ireland predominantly come from the territory of the Republic, that those who perpetrate murders increasingly in the areas adjacent to the frontier have been training, waiting, planning in the territory of the Irish Republic. They might ask whether it is true that the territory of the Irish Republic affords them a ready and nearby refuge after their deeds have been carried out. How then—such a person might inquire — can one dispute that it is essential for combating the provisional IRA to gain the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic? There are two distinct and separate reasons.

The first is that there is no such thing as co-operation by the Government of the Irish Republic in combating the Provisional IRA. No Government of the Irish Republic could, for political reasons, be seen to be or be perceived to co-operate successfully in the extinction of the Provisional IRA.

We are told that the IRA is as much the enemy of the Irish Government as it is of Her Majesty's Government. I have no doubt that the IRA is distasteful to the Government of the Irish Republic. I have no doubt that they fear the IRA for historic as well as for contemporary reasons, but there is no contradiction. There is no contradiction between that mutual hostility between conventional politics in the Irish Republic and the fact that no conventional politician dare to be seen, or would expect to survive being seen, as having co-operated with the British in putting down a Provisional IRA campaign. It is not available. They cannot deliver.

The other reason is that the Provisional IRA, and its operations, is a weapon — perhaps the most effective weapon—for securing the political purposes pursued by the Government of the Irish Republic. At this stage, lest I be misheard or misunderstood, I want to say that at no time have I spoken in terms of hostility, contempt or disrespect of either the people or the Government of that sovereign, independent state, the Irish Republic. Nor am I saying that the members of the Government of that state are consciously, knowingly or avoidably in league in murderous activity with the members of the Provisional IRA. I am saying that the activities of the Provisional IRA have been and still are the means whereby the Irish Republic and its politicians have made in the past 15 years inroads into the constitutional status of Northern Ireland such as they could not have imagined making in the absence of the IRA campaign.

The premier of the Irish Republic, against whom I have no complaint and no criticism, cannot be so unobservant as not to have perceived that it was successive acts of terrorism which opened the way to the successive stages by which the Government have been drawn into courses of action which visibly were intended first to prejudice and then to dispense with the status of Northern Ireland as a part of the United Kingdom. Most signally, in 1979 it was the call for co-operation from the Irish Republic following the murder of Lord Mountbatten which led to the meeting of 5 October 1979, when the plans for the political operation that has since been carried out were laid down. That led to the first of the series of meetings between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the premier of the Irish Republic, which stage by stage have erected the structure which was designed to be the means of cozening Northern Ireland out of the United Kingdom into the embrace of an all-Ireland state.

At each stage Ministers were told—no doubt by their advisers, civil servants and members of the security forces —"You must get the co-operation of the Irish Republic. That is the only key to combating the terrorism of the Provisional IRA. You must ascertain on what terms you will be able to obtain that co-operation." We have explored that in successive terms. We have been building a tower of Babylon in the past four years out of the terms which were successively exacted or sought by the Government of the Irish Republic in return for affording that which they could not deliver and that which was providing them at that very moment with the means of making what, in the terminology of this affair, is described as political progress.

Without the Provisional IRA there would have been no possibility of bringing things to such a pass. Even now the Government are discussing with the Government of the Irish Republic steps and provisions every one of which is a direct and visible derogation of the status of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom.

It will perhaps be asked, "In the absence of the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic, how are we to defeat the Provisional IRA?" It will be noticed that at each stage of my remarks I have emphasised the words "the Government of the Irish Republic". I am not referring to the Garda itself, though the Garda is a political police force in a sense of which we have no comprehension in Great Britain of such a force. The relationship of that force with the politicians in the Government of the Irish Republic is one that we would not for a moment tolerate existing in Great Britain between the Government and politicians and the police forces. However, I accept that between policemen there is comradeship and that a certain degree, so far as it is permissible within what at the time happens to be the intentions of the political management in Dublin, of useful information is made available by the RUC to the Garda and by the Garda to the RUC. Nothing will prevent that—it is the very nature of the adjacent forces seeking success in their operations, often against the same people. When we talk about securing the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic, we are talking about something quite different. We are talking about something to which has been attached a fatal price tag—a price tag that has been paid in practice by the lives and property of citizens in both Northern Ireland and Great Britain.

Consider, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if it is not too severe an imposition upon the imagination, what would be your outlook if you were a member of the Provisional IRA, watching the relationships between Her Majesty's Government and the Irish Republic, as our Government go about the attempt to secure the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic. You would say, as the IRA says, "Ah, we understand very well what is happening. They are going the same way as we intend to go. Let them go on along that course because, before they reach that ultimate role, we shall take over from them and we shall be in the saddle."

It has been a continuing encouragement to the IRA, and a continuing discouragement to their victims, to have been able to read all too clearly in the past five years the price that we have paid for that unattainable article—the co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic in putting down the Provisional IRA.

From the fact that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will support this motion, it is sometimes wrongly supposed that we like the emergency provisions, that we like provisions of law in our part of the United Kingdom that are different from the corresponding provisions in the rest of the United Kingdom. We do not. We desire before others to see the law in our part of the United Kingdom in line with the law in the rest of the United Kingdom, but we know that that can come about only if the Government lay aside the illusion that has caused them relations with the Government of the Irish Republic — I am not considering other factors and motives that have entered into that—that are all too manifestly an encouragement and a sign of success for the terrorist, and a discouragement and abasement for those who oppose it.

The shortest way to end the campaign of terrorism is for it to be seen that the Government have no political intentions, propositions, negotiations or undertakings with other Governments that would be incompatible with the maintenance of the present status of Northern Ireland. Strike down that vision which, if it is not clear to us is clear to the rest of the world, and the Government will have taken the most decisive step towards defeating the IRA and being able to take this Act off our statute book.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I remind the House that the debate must finish at 12 minutes past one o'clock. The wind-up speeches are expected shortly after one o'clock, so I appeal for short contributions.

12.53 am

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): I feel sorry for the right hon and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). He cannot enjoy the role that he is playing, nor the speech that he made, brief though it was. He is a distinguished and able lawyer, but he does not know Northern Ireland as the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) knows Northern Ireland. The right hon. Member is deeply respected in Northern Ireland, and in the House.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): By whom? Not by the minority.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West has refused, because of the influences within his party, to recognise what is recognised by all reasonable people — that to defeat terrorism it is sometimes necessary to forgo some of the elements of individual freedom and liberal conventions.

The House and the country must honestly recognise that some sacrifice of liberal convention and individual freedom is unavoidable. It was extraordinary to witness the Leader of the Opposition praising the police for their achievement without announcing that the Labour party had seen reason and would support the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act.

The Labour party has gone further tonight. We are told that it will oppose the renewal of these emergency powers. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows in his heart that those powers are necessary, because those who know the province better than he — such as his right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central — will have told him so. These powers are regrettably necessary. If they had any sense of decency, those who claim to be an alternative Government, who wish to take office at some future time and to administer the Province of Northern Ireland, would refuse to vote against the renewal of these necessary powers.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): In the few minutes at my disposal, I wish to deal specifically with internment which, happily, the Secretary of State has decided not to exclude from the revised Act.

As a legacy of Bennett, Ulster now has no proper way in which to deal with a suspect. When a suspect terrorist is taken in for interrogation, he simply sits without speaking, co-operating or justifying himself. He merely waits for two days—or if necessary seven days—until he is released. The effect on our police force is demoralising. What is the point of a policeman trying to exact a confession or explanation from a terrorist when he knows that in the final analysis he is likely to be complained about, as a result of which police time will be wasted investigating false allegations?

It is not that we do not know who the terrorists are in Ulster. The Secretary of State will no doubt confirm that on 29 November last year I asked him if he was "aware that one Peter Sherry, who stood as a Sinn Fein candidate in a local government by-election, recently used his manifesto to forecast which people would be murdered, and three of those murders have already been carried out?"—[Official Report, 29 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 1075.]

I later explained that Peter Sherry was walking free around the streets of the town in which I live planning further murders. The police knew it, yet when they brought him in for questioning they were unable within the seven days to get a word out of him and he was released.

Will the right hon. Gentleman now confirm that what I said last November has been proved to be true? Is Peter Sherry one of the terrorists who, with guns in his possession, was captured in the recent round-up? He brought his terrorism from the streets of my town to this country. That is what the police have to put up with.

That is why I want the Secretary of State to take a long, hard look at the provision on internment. Safeguards already exist, such as the provision of advisers, and other safeguards may be necessary. I regret that time does not permit me to develop the point, but if it is decided that a person should remain in detention, that person should come before the courts and prove his innocence. Let us put the onus of proof fairly and squarely on the person detained. Let him prove his innocence.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): This has been a short but cogent debate, with speeches by the Secretary of State and two former Secretaries of State. The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) contributed, as did the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who has followed these issues closely.

We discuss this issue in the context of the emergency provisions legislation and the Diplock courts. The hon. Member for Epping Forest referred to yesterday's remarks by the Leader of the Opposition. My right hon. Friend stated clearly to the House the satisfaction of Labour Members at the remarkable success of the police against the IRA, and he was right to say that the whole nation has cause to be grateful.

The debate tonight, however, is not about police work but about the renewal of the Act, the legislative framework of which provides for the Diplock courts. The Act abolishes jury trials for scheduled offences. The Secretary of State tonight expressed his concern about such issues and it is clear that we are not far apart on them. He said that the ultimate aim must be the restoration of jury trials for all types of offences, though he accepts that it is not possible to achieve that in present conditions.

The right hon. Gentleman accepts many other recommendations in the Baker report, and my hon. Friends and I have consistently pressed him on those matters because among the provisions of the Act that particularly concern us is section 8, which deals with the admissibility of confessions, confessions which would not be admissible in courts in Great Britain. The right hon. Gentleman took on board the criticisms that we have been making — and which the Baker report made — about section 11 of the Act, which deals with the holding of a suspect for 72 hours without charge. The right hon. Gentleman said that that would be repealed.

It is clear, as I say, that there is not a great divide between my hon. Friends and the right hon. Gentleman on the issue of terrorism—the need to protect the people from terrorists and to combat terrorism wherever it may occur. However, we have consistently shown our concern about the Diplock courts situation, linked as it is to a supergrass system of evidence. Such a situation is abhorrent to lawyers and jurists in Britain and elsewhere, and it is right that we should constantly draw attention to the threat to civil liberties and civil rights in Northern Ireland. Opposition Members are not prepared to see the erosion of those liberties and rights beyond what is necessary and justified.

The Secretary of State mentioned the field trials in England and Wales into the practicability and effectiveness of time limits. He said the same thing to the House six months ago on 21 December. We have not advanced on that issue. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have been told by the Home Secretary how the field trials were progressing and that he would share the conclusions with the House. He has not done that.

The Secretary of State has said that he wishes to bring forward the necessary legislation that will modify the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act. We welcome that decision, but again he has given no date. He has simply said that he will do so within the lifetime of the present Parliament. Meanwhile, we are afraid that innocent people will be the victims of such tardiness. We are dealing not with convicted terrorists but with those whose civil rights have been taken from them.

The Secretary of State mentioned section 2(2) of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act on bail applications and said that it would be recast. He said that section 2(4) of the Act would be repealed. We welcome his decision. We welcome also his thoughts on those parts of the Baker report that he is prepared to accept. We want to examine that report carefully and to ascertain whether he can go further. We want to debate that issue and to have it put into context. We have consistently stated to the House and to the country generally that we oppose terrorism wherever we find it.

1.6 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I have time to deal with only a few contributions. I must say to the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) that it is not my responsibility or that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to say who may at present be detained and charged as a result of the recent arrests on this side of the water. That is a responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and, in due course, the information that the hon. Gentleman seeks will become apparent.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) claimed that there was no co-operation between the Government of the Republic of Ireland and the British Government and, by implication, between the security forces — [Interruption.] Since he described the Garda Siochana as a political police force in a way not understood on this side of the water, the implication was clear.

Without the co-operation of the Government of the Republic of Ireland, I do not believe that we would have had the interception of the Marita Ann bringing its cargo of arms to slaughter men and women in Northern Ireland, the discovery in the north of Dublin of a bomb factory which manufactured timers for bombs, the finds in recent months of explosives on the other side of the border, the identification of command wires running across the border and the establishment of the vehicle check points that have been frequently set up to assist the security forces operating in Northern Ireland. Far from getting no co-operation from the Government of the Republic, we have had excellent co-operation in recent months and years.

I go on to the assertion of the right hon. Member for South Down that the Government of the Republic of Ireland and the IRA have a common aim. I believe that few statements could be further from the truth, for the Government of the Republic see clearly that their democracy is as much at risk from the operation of the terrorists now operating in Northern Ireland as is democracy in Northern Ireland itself. Divisions between the Republic and this Government could only help, not hinder, terrorist activity in Ireland. I have no intention of following the right hon. Member for South Down in his perverse interpretation of recent Anglo-Irish relations, save only to say that his interpretation certainly does not accord with mine.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) should cast his mind back to 1957 to the plea that Aneurin Bevan made to the Labour party conference about not being sent naked into the conference chamber by being deprived of the nuclear deterrent. If ever, alas, the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his colleagues became responsible for security in Northern Ireland, they would find that within a week they would need these powers in order to conduct the battle against terrorism. They will be not in a conference chamber but in a real conflict in which liberal democracy is under attack from vicious terrorism in which the lives of innocent people are at stake.

The success that we have had in Great Britain was unequivocally stated by the Home Secretary to be due to the powers of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act is relevant not to Great Britain but only to Northern Ireland. Those powers are essential, as I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as a founder member of the British Institute of Human Rights. I have become convinced of the necessity of those powers in the job that we seek to do in Northern Ireland.

A vote against those powers now will be a blow at those in the security forces who need those powers to do their job. As I have said, if ever the right hon. and learned Gentleman became responsible for these matters, he would quickly find out that he, too, needed them.

In conclusion, I repeat that the primary objective of the Government's policy in Northern Ireland remains the eradication of terrorism. The Government do not accept that there is a halfway house. The emergency provisions Act plays a major part in enabling the security forces and the courts to deal effectively with that terrorism.

The House will have an opportunity in due course to deal in detail with the changes which may be made in that Act when the Government introduce a Bill incorporating the revisions which have been outlined. Meanwhile, I have no doubt that we need these provisions, and I commend the order to the House.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

That the draft Weights and Measures Act 1963 (Various Foods) (Amendments) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 14th June, be approved.—[Mr. Major.]

Question agreed to.

Miss Hilda Murrell

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

1.23 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I raised the case of Hilda Murrell under the Consolidated Fund at 4 am on 20 December, 1984.

Owing to parliamentary good fortune, which so often smiles on just causes, I am able to raise the topic again at 1.20 am on the day after assistant chief constable Peter Smith gave a press conference on the report.

Why did the assistant chief constable of Northumbria, Mr. Peter Smith, hold a press conference yesterday, Wednesday, to answer questions about the murder of Miss Hilda Murrell without publishing the full report of his review of how the West Mercia constabulary had conducted its inquiries? Will the Minister place a copy of Mr. Smith's report in the House of Commons Library?

Whose decision is it not to publish the report? Is it that of the chief constable of West Mercia, of Mr. Smith, or of the Home Office? If Ministers wish to convince an increasingly interested and sceptical public, would it not be in their own interest to publish?

If the report were published, some light might be thrown on the many questions raised first of all by the Cecil Woolf book "The Death of a Rose Grower", by Graham Smith, and then by the New English Library's "Who Killed Hilda Murrell?", by Judith Cook, as well as by the excellent television programmes by Harlech by "World in Action" and the BBC "Crime Watch".

Why are the police so convinced that this is an "ordinary burglary gone wrong" when they have not succeeded after 15 months in finding the person or persons responsible and there are so many extraordinary aspects to this case, particularly the abduction of Miss Murrell in her own car?

A secret report on activities that are shrouded in secrecy cannot dispel fear and mistrust. Some of the questions that I had hoped the inquiry report would answer raise issues of public concern.

Was there an inquiry into leaks concerning GCHQ Cheltenham and the Belgrano, commissioned by Sir Robert Armstrong, Secretary of the Cabinet at the end of 1983? Was intelligence told to identify the origin of leaks of information about the Belgrano? Was Commander Robert Green on the list of possible suspects? Was the home of his aunt checked for information? Has Mr. Smith approached Sir Robert Armstrong?

What is the nature of the relationship between the official security services and unofficial private detective agencies? Is it true that Sir Robert Armstrong has close connections with a director of Zeus Security Consultants, as reported in the Daily Star of 13 June 1985? Has any Government Department ever employed, directly or indirectly, either Zeus Security Consultants or the Sapphire Investigation Bureau?

Was Miss Murrell under surveillance at any time? Specifically, was her telephone tapped? Was she on the files of the special branch, locally or nationally? Has Mr. Smith looked into the records of the Shrewsbury special branch?

Has the burglary at Commander Hurst's home been investigated for a possible connection with the Belgrano? How do the police account for the fact that no valuables were taken and that only Commander Hurst's flat, not those on the top or ground floors, was burgled? Has the coincidence of the time—a few hours after my speech at 4 am on 20 December, but before any newspaper reports of that speech—been investigated and explained?

In relation to Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Norris and Mr. Peachman, were any of the aforementioned questioned by police concerning either the Sizewell inquiry or the murder of Miss Murrell, and with what outcome? Did any of them work on commission, directly or indirectly, for a government department? At whose request and on whose authority? If they denied involvement with burglaries connected with the Sizewell inquiry, what further steps were taken to establish whether these denials were true? Who did commission each of the above to work on Sizewell concerns?

Why was the way in which Miss Murrell's car was left regarded as suspicious by members of the community but apparently not by the police? Why did it take so long to find the body? Why did the police officer who visited Miss Murrell's house on Friday night not notice anything wrong, when her neighbours on the following day noticed scattered contents of her handbag and three days' post at the front door? Did the police officer enter the house or not? Did he seek to make contact with Miss Murrell? If he did not enter the house, why did he go away before discussing the abandoned car with her?

Has the red Ford Escort, to which much reference has been made, been found? I refer to pages 66 and 67 of the excellent book by Graham Smith. Have the red Ford Escorts, variously reported near her home and near the site where the body was found, been located and their owners interviewed? Do the reports refer to the same car?

Are the police looking for one or more than one suspect? In view of the differences between the photofit pictures and the accounts of the grey-suited running man and the man in the dark anorak, has the possibility of a team operation been fully investigated, and with what results? Has any possible connection with the red Escort been ruled out?

The two boys who supposedly stole and later burned the tax disc from Miss Murrell's car claimed that there were papers in the car. Is that true? Were they recovered? Are the boys lying?

How can the evidence of Mr. Ian Scott be accounted for? He maintained that no body was in the copse on Thursday 22 March. How do the police evaluate this evidence and the possibility that the body was moved? Has any progress been made on reports of a large dark car near the site where the body was found or on reports of lights in the wood on Thursday 22 March? I refer to pages 37 and 80 of Graham Smith's excellent book.

How was the telephone at Miss Murrell's Shrewsbury home disconnected? Were the wires ripped out, or were they disconnected in a more sophisticated manner? Her neighbour, Mr. Brian George, told me that the telephone wires had been disconnected in a professional way. As to the phone at Llanymynech, if it was damaged by lightning, why is there no record of lightning at the time in question? When did the fault develop, and when was it reported? The Home Secretary's answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was extremely unconvincing.

Are the details of the report by Steve Doughty in The Standard of 2 February 1985 accurate in relation to the telephones? If they are accurate, the scene of the crime, which was videod, must have been fixed. If they are inaccurate, we should be told.

When was Miss Murrell's car reported missing and its details checked? By whom? What information was given or received at each stage? What was Commander Green told about the reason for the delay in locating the owner of the car? If the police quickly established that the car belonged to Miss Murrell, an elderly local dignitary, why did they not contact her home immediately, and why, when an officer went to her home, did he leave before ensuring that she was safe and well?

What questions were put to Mr. Gary Murray, a private detective, when he was questioned by officers of the West Mercia special branch in April? Were the officers told of Mr. Murray's belief that Hilda Murrell would have been under surveillance from other private detectives? Why did West Mercia detectives go on a so-called "fishing expedition" for information about peace campaigners when they questioned Miss Murrell's friends about her murder, as reported in Graham Smith's book at pages 34 and 35?

Are the police looking for a local man as chief suspect? Would a local man drive past the police station or through the town, rather than head for open country? If the chief suspect is a local man, why has he not been located? All this effort, yet one recalls the sight on Harlech television of a local burglar saying that, had it been a local Shrewsbury burglar, they would all have known each other and he would have been reported to the police immediately. Are there any other known cases of a burglar being disturbed and abducting a house owner in his or her own car? Are there any similar cases in the area?

Is the account in the New Statesman of 25 January true? It states:

> "A man who is an accredited counsellor to people with sexual problems was visited by police before Miss Murrell's body was discovered and asked if he knew of anyone fitting the description of a loner who might break into women's bedrooms and be violent."

That is at page 33 of Mr. Smith's book.

In summary, the main areas of concern for many people are as follows. First, who was responsible for the death of Hilda Murrell? Why, 15 months after the murder, has it proved impossible to find those responsible? Secondly, why have the official accounts given of the murder revealed unexplained delays in following important lines of inquiry and conflicting accounts of factual evidence? Thirdly, why have British citizens who have not engaged in illegal activities been subjected to surveillance, burglaries and other forms of harassment by members of the security services or those working for them? Fourthly, is political control of the security services, on which Judith Cook writes powerfully, and those working at their request adequate to protect fully the civil rights of British citizens?

To allay public concern about the murder of Hilda Murrell, the Government should give a full and public account of steps taken so far in the inquiry, and publicly demonstrate, in a way that leaves no reasonable doubt, that there was no involvement in these tragic events by or instigated by the security services. Public confidence can be fully restored only when such authoritative evidence is made known and when all possible steps have been taken to find the murderer of Miss Murrell.

When did the West Mercia special branch begin inquiries into Miss Murrell's murder? Why did the

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Minister say last December that special branch officers had already investigated the possibility of a link between the murder and the Sizewell B public inquiry when the private detectives who were spying on objectors to that inquiry were not questioned until April? What caused the delay?

Several church leaders have followed this case with interest and concern. Although they have not yet made a formal approach to the Home Office or any public statement, we know that they are worried by the failure to find the person or persons responsible for Miss Murrell's death, and the failure to date to provide a clear and convincing account of the murder.

In her remarkable book "Who killed Hilda Murrell?", which has just been published, Judith Cook documents 14 serious discrepancies in the appendix between the official accounts and the independently established accounts.

Finally, if I seem extremely sceptical about Government answers, I can only refer to Clive Ponting's "The Right to Know". On page 133, for example, he states that Sir Clive Whitmore's view was that we were not telling a direct lie. Sir Clive Whitmore argued that it was all right to imply that, so long as we did not explicitly state it as being correct. If Ministers are pained that I do not accept the Government's word, I can only say to them that between 1962 and 1979 I used automatically to accept the word of a Government, of either party. After my experience in court No. 2 at the old Bailey day after day at the Ponting trial I may be forgiven for asking for detail and proof. Let Peter Smith's report be published in full so that it can be scrutinised.

1.35 am

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for agreeing that I should take part in this debate on a tragic subject. The tragic death of Miss Hilda Murrell on Shrewsbury on 24 March 1984 has been turned by the media not merely into a tragic event but into an establishment scandal. Smoke is easy to blow around, but many people in Shrewsbury are reaching the stage when they would like to see a little more body to the accusations that are constantly being levelled at the conduct of the inquiry carried out by the West Mercia police in my area. They allocated more than 100 officers to this serious investigation and even at this late stage 19 officers continue to work on it full time. If there was an establishment cover-up, the West Mercia police would certainly not still be undertaking such a massive investigation.

There was considerable pressure because of the hon. Gentleman's questions, which he was right to raise in the House. As a result of the considerable pressure from the media, Mr. Peter Smith, an assistant chief constable from Northumbria, was appointed to conduct an outside review of the conduct of the case. When my hon. Friend the Minister of State replies, he may well go into the details of that report and, therefore, I shall not take up the time of the House in doing so. It is known that Mr. Smith was asked to carry out an independent review into the conduct of the West Mercia police inquiry and to assess the use of technical and scientific equipment, and the theories and speculation.

There has been no substantiation to the theories and speculation. They make good copy in the newspapers, and might make good reading in a book or two. However, the fact remains that the murderer of Miss Hilda Murrell still goes free. I care not whether the murderer was a by-chance burglar, a secret service agent or whoever. We want to see Miss Murrell's assassin brought to justice. I doubt whether that will be aided by the publication of Mr. Smith's report on the conduct of the inquiry. My hon. Friend may say whether the publication of the report, as requested by the hon. Gentleman, at this stage in the continuing investigation will jeopardise the character and quality of the evidence before it is tested in court. I cannot say because I am not a lawyer. But we know that the full publication of that report would be widely reported in the media and, therefore, could be easily read and assessed by Miss Murrell's murderer.

A considerable amount of effort has been made to link the murder to the secret service and great things have been said of the telephone. I am happy to accept that the hon. Gentleman may have spoken to a neighbour about the telephone, but I have spoken to British Telecom engineers and they tell me that a disconnection may appear a professional job or, as some would like to insinuate, a secret service job, but that need not necessarily be the case. The disconnection of a telephone is not a unique act in the committing of a crime. Apparently, if a telephone wire is yanked from its socket, it is done by means of the sheath, within which are contained the connecting wires. It is not unkown for those British Telecom engineers to see that at a burglary. The sheath is pulled. One wire remains connected and the other does not. An amateur, a neighbour or anyone interested in fuelling speculation about the secret service might like to read into that some James Bond technique, but it is not unique and can be easily and accidentally done.

I can draw no conclusions from that act, which is given a great deal of credence, and it is not proof that anything has been done by the British security agencies. It is without doubt that not all murders are solved, but the solution of many may be hindered. I respect the determination of the hon. Member for Linlithgow to bring before the nation the details of that murder and its inquiry. He has claimed in the House and on the media that he has information which associates the British secret service with the murder. I should not suggest to such a distinguished Member that he put up or shut up. I should never seek to limit free speech, but it is time that the hon. Gentleman put up the information that he has that can bring to justice the murderer of my late constituent Miss Murrell.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The House may be forgiven for wondering in what capacity the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was addressing the House. Was he addressing it in his capacity as a Member of the House, in his capacity as an acting detective sergeant (unpaid) or in relation to the publication of some books?

The hon. Gentleman read out a series of questions which are directly related to an investigation which in his view should long since have been concluded and the matter resolved. Everyone in the House would agree that that should have been the case. This matter has not been concluded. As my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) reminded the House, the investigation is continuing. Despite the fact that the hon. Gentleman has had substantial access to those involved in the investigation and the fact that he has received categoric assurances from me in the House and by letter, he is still raising some of the issues about which there has been a clear exchange of views.

I must seek to answer some of the points that the hon. Gentleman raised. The first was about why the report by Mr. Smith, the assistant chief constable of Northumbria, is not publicly available. The review of the investigation was undertaken by Mr. Smith at the request of the then chief constable of West Mercia, Mr. Cozens. Mr. Smith has reported to the new chief constable, Mr. Mullett.

There are two highly cogent reasons for not making public the detail of the report which the chief constable explained in his statement to the press today. First, the report deals with a continuing investigation and thus contains details of confidential operational information. Secondly, the publication of such details would, in the event of a future arrest, detract from, if not destroy, their evidential value. Those are cogent and important reasons.

The hon. Gentleman asked to whom the report was made. It was made by Mr. Smith to the chief constable of West Mercia and it is for him to determine whether it should be published. Those are his views, and I have no reason to doubt that they are cogent and should be observed in this case.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): When the inquiry is finished, the reasons that the Minister has given for not publishing will no longer exist. Will the hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that, after the inquiry is finished, he will publish the report?

Mr. Shaw: The investigation is in the hands of the local police. The decision whether to publish the report in due course will rest with them. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is on the record.

The second question that the hon. Member for Linlithgow asked was about the security services. He wanted to know whether Mr. Smith had approached Sir Robert Armstrong. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, I gave him a categorical assurance on 28 December that Government intelligence services were not involved in any way.

Mr. Smith had full access to all the information held in the force's incident room and to all persons who may in any way have been able to assist his review. I understand that Mr. Smith has seen all those persons at the highest levels in Government when he wished. I can therefore give the assurance that he has seen Sir Robert Armstrong. Indeed, Sir Robert confirmed to me that all those persons involved at the highest levels of Government have been seen.

The present position is as was stated on 28 December. There is no involvement whatever in any aspect of the security services in this affair. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the investigation continues and 19 officers continue to follow up the lines of inquiry, as my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham reminded the House.

If anyone submits information, each and every bit of it will be examined. The West Mercia police are in the extraordinarily difficult position of being accused of covering up all the evidence that they have, and the evidence which is produced, whether it is from the hon. Member for Linlithgow, or from the recent book by Mrs. Judith Cook which refers to Mr. Otter—who has views on this matter similar to those quoted by the hon. Member for Linlithgow in relation to Mr. Morgan Grenville.

I understand from the chief constable that Mr. Otter's involvement was first drawn to Mr. Smith's attention by the hon. Member for Linlithgow. I am grateful to him for his letter of 23 May. The information was passed to West Mercia police on 28 May and it was followed up immediately. Mr. Otter has now been interviewed three times by West Mercia officers, but nothing that he has said has helped to take the investigation forward. That has been so on a number of issues which the hon. Gentleman raised.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the telephone disconnection and the problem of storm damage. He knows from the letter of 14 January when I described fully that the police confirmed that Miss Murrell's telephone at her home in Shrewsbury had been disconnected, that at first it was believed that this was done by removing the connectors at the junction box, but at no time did the police use the term "sophisticated" about the way in which it was done. In the absence of any further evidential confirmation that this was the means of disconnection, and after checks of the junction box, the police believe that the connecting wires were simply snatched out, perhaps because the connecting screws were loose.

There has been a detailed response to many of the questions which the hon. Member for Linlitgow has put to me. He has put many more questions to me tonight. I shall do my best to write to him about some the detailed points. However, the central issue remains the same. The hon. Gentleman believes that leads about the involvement of the security services or others involved in the private investigation of Sizewell have not been followed up and that allegations should be made. Every allegation and every lead which he has offered, or which anyone else has offered, has been taken seriously and examined from every possible angle by the West Mercia police.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the involvement of private detectives. Before the most recent press speculation about Mr. Peachman's activities as a private investigator, West Mercia police had already investigated the alleged link between the activities of private detectives, the Sizewell B project and Miss Murrell's death. The hon. Gentleman will know from the chief constable's report on Mr. Smith's report that one of Mr. Smith's criticisms was about the way in which certain aspects of the alleged connection were followed up. They have established that inquiries in connection with Sizewell B were undertaken for a private client but that these were concluded over a year before Miss Murrell's death and that she was not the subject of the inquiries.

I understand also from the chief constable that Mr. Peachman was engaged by Zeus Security to undertake inquiries on 21 January 1983 and had completed his engagement by the end of the same month. The conclusions of his inquiries were passed to the client's solicitors and the chief constable has no information about what happened thereafter. Miss Murrell did not correspond with the secretary to the Sizewell inquiry until August 1983 and was therefore not known to the inquiry as an objector at the time of Mr. Peachman's inquiries. It cannot be deduced from the involvement of that private detective agent with the Sizewell objectors that Miss Murrell had any connection with the inquiries that were being made at that time.

[Mr. Shaw]

Much as everyone in the House would like to achieve a resolution of this affair, it has not yet been possible so to do. The hon. Gentleman will know—my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham referred to the fact—that regrettably there are homicides that are never fully solved. I gather that there are about 398 currently without a suspect and with no likelihood of being concluded. Sometimes a case with many and various pieces of evidence attached to it cannot be concluded satisfactorily.

West Mercia police, having had a thorough appraisal of what had been done, which was conducted by a independent and senior police officer from a force without any connection with West Mercia, are still proceeding to try to solve the case. I can assure the hon. Gentleman, my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham and everyone else that that must be a professional and significant undertaking and one which is sometimes not helped by those who raise false points on complicated issues.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes to Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Privatisation

1. Mr. Hardy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the net receipts from the privatisation of public assets during the next two years.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): The 1985 public expenditure White Paper assumed that net receipts from special sales of assets would amount to £4·5 billion over the next two years. Receipts from council house sales would add about a further £4 billion.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Financial Secretary confirm that those substantial sums will be devoted largely to the relief of income tax, providing significent benefit only to a minority of the population and small parts of the country? Does he accept that that destruction of capital assets should best be described as treasonably feckless?

Mr. Moore: As opposed to the hon. Gentleman's comments, he will know that the privatisation programme sees as its main goal an attempt both to improve the efficiency of the economy and to benefit the consumers and the workers in those enterprises from the increased profitability and efficiency of the structures for which they work.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that the privatisation measure that has most dramatically affected more than 750,000 people has been the opportunity to buy one's own home, which has been offered to council house and other tenants by the Government?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right, and I should like to update her on the figures, which are better than she thought. As at March 1985, 850,000 council houses have been sold, and that number of people are happily the owners of their own homes.

Mr. Carter-Jones: When the Minister has sold off the royal ordnance factories, and paid back all the money, owed in pensions, will anything be left for tax relief?

Mr. Moore: What we have instead are enterprises which serve consumers, employees and the nation more efficiently. I wonder what the hon. Gentleman will do at the general election when, I assume, he presents the Labour party's wholesale commitment to the re-nationalisation of all those prime industries, which will be the best imaginable boon for the Conservative party.

Mr. Leigh: Is my hon. Friend aware that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) claims, in an average constituency, such as Brecon and Radnor, no fewer than 3,000 householders will have benefited from the sale of British Telecom shares, 1,000 householders will have benefited from the sale of council homes, and many hundreds from the sale of nationalised industries, which we have brought back to real public control?

Mr. Moore: I am delighted that my hon. Friend, in an electoral sense, brings us back to the realities of Brecon and Radnor. Beyond his specific points, the consumer, the nation and the workers will all benefit from privatisation.

Mr. Blair: Do the Financial Secretary's figures include the money that will be raised by the sale of British Gas? Is it not the case that for the Government to retain the last vestiges of their economic credibility they propose to flog off British Gas as a private monopoly to bump up prices and to fund the tax cuts before the election? Is it not, therefore, right that in the Government's eyes privatisation is no longer a virtue, but a necessity?

Mr. Moore: The figures are precisely as I referred to them — those in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper. I am intrigued that so far the official Opposition have not yet referred in the House to their policy on the re-nationalisation of British Gas. The only reference that I can find is in the overseas service of the British Broadcasting Corporation, when the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) committed the Opposition to re-nationalisation. To the extent that the Opposition seem unwilling to admit their policy, the Government's policy on the issue is clear.

Share Ownership

2. Mr. Favell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effects on share ownership he expects from the phasing out of the state earnings-related pensions scheme.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The emphasis given to wider share ownership in the Government's privatisation programme, coupled with changes in the tax system, have already probably doubled the number of individual shareholders in Britain since we first took office in 1979. The proposals to phase out the state earnings-related pension scheme will encourage the spread of personal pensions and give many more people the opportunity to take a direct interest in the way their pension savings are invested.

Mr. Favell: Do I understand from my right hon. Friend's answer that he considers that the phasing-out of the scheme will help him in his drive to create a property-owning democracy, and that this goes a long way to explaining the Labour party's opposition to it?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. It is all part of the policy which my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary outlined in answer to the previous question, and which I set out at some length in the Maurice Macmillan memorial lecture a few days ago. It is striking to note that all that the Opposition can do is to say that they will grab back all the shares that the employees of the nationalised industries have taken. Moreover, they will do so at a confiscatory price.

Mr. Ashley: Is it not true that the effect on shares of the ending of SERPS is trivial compared with the effect on the real economy? Do the Government intend that pensioners in the next century should have the same share of financial resources, but financed by private funding, in which case it will be unfairly distributed, or will our pensioners have a smaller share of financial resources?

Mr. Lawson: Whichever way pensions are provided, those resources must be provided by the growth of the economy. There is a big difference between people making their own provision over and above the basic state pension and a funded scheme which will guarantee them a pension in the years ahead, and those who rely on the good will of the taxpayers of the day. Contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition appears to believe, SERPS is not a funded scheme.

Sir Anthony Grant: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the attitude of the Opposition to wider share ownership now is rather curious, given that when the scheme of wider share ownership was formed it was supported by Labour Members, especially by Lord Lever, who believed passionately that it was important to turn earners into owners? Why has their attitude changed since his day?

Mr. Lawson: That is a good question. My hon. Friend is right, but the difference goes deeper than on this issue. The Labour party today is very different from the Labour party of Lord Lever's time. It is now the party of extremism and mayhem.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This may be an appropriate moment to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer can answer only for those matters for which he is directly responsible.

Inflation

3. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of inflation.

Mr. Lawson: Over the 12 months to May 1985, the retail prices index increased by 7 per cent.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Chancellor agree that his answer proves that the Government's only claimed achievement is purely ephemeral? Will he admit that his strategy is in jeopardy because of high interest rates and the pressure that they will put upon wage demands this autumn? Will he give a categorical assurance that, given the Government's track record in doctoring figures, he will not take mortgage interest payments out of the retail prices index?

Mr. Lawson: On the latter point, there is no question of the Government taking out mortgage interest payments. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the announcement made to the House more than a year ago by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, who said that he was reconvening the independent Retail Prices Index Advisory Committee to re-examine the treatment of housing costs in the RPI. Obviously, we must await what that independent committee recommends. As it is, only the United Kingdom and Canada retain the mortgage interest rate in their indexes. However, we shall abide by what the independent committee suggests.

As for the figure of 7 per cent., the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Labour Government did not manage in any month during their period of office to get a figure anything like as low as 7 per cent. The average monthly figure was 15½ per cent. Seven per cent. is not satisfactory. We shall be getting it down during the latter part of this year. I see that the independent London Business School forecasts that a year from now inflation will be 4¼ per cent.

Mr. Latham: In the interests of reducing inflation by cutting the mortgage rate, will my right hon. Friend assure us that he will not unduly resist benign market forces if they wish to push interest rates down?

Mr. Lawson: I do not fix mortgage rates. They are fixed by the building societies. My hon. Friend may be assured that I shall not interfere in any way with their decisions. I have said on a number of occasions that the general level of interest rates will be maintained at whatever level is necessary to ensure monetary conditions that will bring inflation down.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: As the Government have been successful in funding their borrowing requirement without recourse to the banks, why is inflation going up again?

Mr. Lawson: Inflation is affected by a number of things, and not least by the sharp rise in the value of the dollar against sterling during the latter part of last year. That has been reflected in prices this year. I am glad to say that since then the dollar exchange rate has improved in sterling's favour. That is why the right hon. Gentleman can be assured that inflation will continue to come down.

Mr. Maples: Is my right hon. Friend worried about the continued high level of personal borrowing and the effect that that might be having on interest rates and inflation?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right to raise that issue. I believe that it lay behind the question by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). Bank lending is, of course, only a part of the total credit conditions in the economy that affect the inflation rate. I am not worried that monetary conditions at present are too lax. I do not believe that they are.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is it the Chancellor's intention as reported in an article by Sam Brittan in the Financial Times today, to keep the pound as high as can be got away with to bring pressure to bear on prices and wages? Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that the last time that that policy was pursued it had disastrous effects on the levels of imports and exports and caused problems for manufacturing industry?

Mr. Lawson: Mr. Speaker pointed out to me a moment ago that I must be careful to answer only on matters for which I am responsible. I am not responsible for the articles of Mr. Samuel Brittan.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the elder statesmen of the Labour party, the right hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) that inflation is the "father and mother of unemployment"? Does he further agree that the pre-condition for controlling inflation is to keep a tight grip on public expenditure and that those who care about unemployment are misguided if they urge him to adopt a more relaxed approach to public expenditure?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend put the point well. That is the central truth. I am sure that he will be as glad as I am to note that during the two years or so since the last general election the number of people in work has risen by about 600,000. That is more than in the whole of the rest of the European Economic Community.

Dr. McDonald: Will the Chancellor impose even higher rates of interest and even more cuts in public spending in an effort to squeeze inflation out of the system? Is he aware that such methods could force unemployment up nationally by 17 per cent., which is the current rate of increase in joblessness in Brecon and Radnor?

Mr. Lawson: I am glad that the hon. Lady was able to mention Brecon and Radnor. I hope that it makes her feel a great deal better. The rest of what she said was absolute nonsense.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the Chancellor realise that his mismanagement of interest rates this year has so greatly increased inflationary expectations that the threatening warnings about higher pay settlements which he addressed to the CBI this week should have been addessed to himself?

Mr. Lawson: I disagree. There has been no rise in inflationary expectations. The forecasts of every independent forecasting institution show that inflation will fall steadily in the second half of this year and into 1986.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

4. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will now publish the Price Waterhouse report on the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers; and if he will make a statement.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on 20 June.

Mr. Skinner: Are the Minister and his friend the Chancellor afraid to publish the truth?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Where was the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Skinner: I was in Brecon and Radnor getting in Labour votes. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the hon. Gentleman ask his question.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that one of the biggest borrowers from Johnson Matthey Bankers is a friend of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? Will he also confirm that that man borrowed more than £15 million and employed the son of one of the directors of Johnson Matthey Bankers? Is that why the Government are not prepared to let people know what is in the Price Waterhouse report? Is it not a fact that, on a day when Lambeth is being covered and crawled over by accountants, there is one law for people prepared to carry out the mandate of the people, but no scrutiny from the Bank of England for a company which has lost £248 million? Is there not one law for the bankers and another for Labour councillors in Lambeth, Edinburgh and Liverpool?

Mr. Stewart: No, Sir.

Mr. Dickens: Why did my hon. Friend not refer the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to the Bank of England annual report now published and lodged in the Vote Office, documents Nos. 104 and 105, giving a blow-by-blow account of the rescue operation and an inter-round summary, the main thrust of which clearly shows that if the rescue operation had not taken place there would probably have been no danger to the United Kingdom bullion and gold market, but that, due to misunderstandings throughout the world, we might have been at risk? Why does my hon. Friend not give the hon. Gentleman the facts?

Mr. Stewart rose——

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Give the Minister a chance.

Mr. Stewart: I could indeed have referred the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to the information contained in that report, but as he asked such a concise question I was anxious to give him a concise reply.

Mr. Sedgemore: If the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service decides to hold an inquiry into the collapse of Johnson Matthey Bankers, may we have an assurance that the Chancellor will appear at the inquiry and that the Price Waterhouse report will be made available, at least on a confidential basis?

Mr. Stewart: I cannot possibly answer questions about hypothetical decisions of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service.

Value Added Tax

5. Mr. Amess asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for an extension of the payment date for value added tax to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

Mr. Ian Stewart: We have no plans to extend the due date for payment of VAT.

Mr. Amess: Does my hon. Friend realise that many small businesses in my constituency of Basildon and throughout the country are under increasing pressure to meet VAT payments, while larger firms seem to be extending their line of credit? Will he assist by introducing a flexible payment system? Does he agree that many of those small firms are the life blood of our country and that it would be a mistake to kill the goose which might possibly lay the golden egg?

Mr. Stewart: I am not sure exactly what my hon. Friend has in mind in terms of a flexible payment system, but I shall certainly bring the point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is responsible for Customs and Excise matters. As for larger companies which are slow in making payments to small businesses in Basildon and many other parts of the country, I hope that those who behave in that way will note my hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Economic Secretary aware of the extra-statutory concession that was introduced in 1981, which was not debated in Parliament, which extended to barristers the right to defer payment of VAT until they had received payment from their clients? Will he examine the amendment that I have tabled for the Report stage of the Finance Bill, which would extend that notable right to 121 further categories of traders? May we have equality in the tax system? Will the Economic Secretary ensure that the Whips instruct his Back Benchers to vote for my amendment if Mr. Speaker wishes to select it?

Mr. Stewart: I shall look at the wording of the amendment that the hon. Gentleman has tabled.

Manufactured Goods (Exports)

6. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the exports of manufactured goods over the past year give evidence of economic recovery.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): Yes. The monthly trade figures for May 1985, published this morning, show that manufacturing exports in the three months to May are up by 13 per cent. on a year earlier.

Mr. Carlisle: I welcome that encouraging performance, but has that success been matched by a growth in manufacturing investment, as is required if we are to maintain this performance in the future?

Mr. Rees: Yes. I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that the figures for 1984 show an increase in manufacturing investment of 14 per cent., which I hope will provide the basis for a sustained improvement in manufacturing exports.

Dr. Bray: Would not the Chief Secretary be more encouraged by the trade figures if they were the result of an increase in exports rather than a fall in imports? Is he not a little concerned about whether the fall in imports means that we have reached an incipient fall-off in the rate of growth, if not a recession?

Mr. Rees: There is no evidence that we are heading for a recession. All the indications are that we are in the fifth year of growth since the trough of the recession.

Mr. Stokes: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that while the performance of British exports is excellent, the real problem facing manufacturing industry is the penetration of the home market? Can the Government provide help?

Mr. Rees: Yes we can, by creating the right climate for an improvement in our economic performance, to which the Government's economic policies have been devoted. The figures show that British industry is becoming more competitive and that it will be able to retain a share of the home market.

Mr. Terry Davis: Surely the Chief Secretary appreciates that it is the balance of trade in manufactured goods, not the level of exports, that is most important. If the Chief Secretary is so pleased with the level of exports, will he explain why our balance of trade in manufactured goods is heading for a further deterioration—indeed, the fifth deterioration?

Mr. Rees: It is more important to recognise the overall performance, which shows that so far this year there is a current account surplus of £724 million. The forecast for this year is an increase of £3 billion.

Economy Recovery

7. Mr. Merchant asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further evidence he has of the strength of the economic recovery.

Mr. Lawson: Gross domestic product grew by an underlying 3½ per cent. between the first quarters of 1984 and 1985. This year the United Kingdom is likely to have the fastest growing economy in the European Community, and in all probability it will grow faster than that of the United States, too.

Mr. Merchant: Does my right hon. Friend agree that this good news will produce an effect that will result in even better news, namely, a reduction in unemployment? Does he broadly agree with a recent CBI study which illustrated this effect by predicting that 1 million new jobs would be created by the end of this year?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the CBI study, which was extremely encouraging both about manufacturing in general and about employment. I referred earlier to the growth in employment during the last two years. That is expected to continue. The level of unemployment will be assisted by the measures which I took in this year's Budget, which will not have an effect until next year. It will also be affected by the level of pay increases, which is still running at too high a level if we are to price sufficient numbers of people back into work.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Chancellor agree that, if interest rates remain at their present high levels, that will severely damage the prospects for economic growth as they will increase the level of inflation, give rise to inflationary expectations by wage bargainers and result in a higher value for the pound, which will make it more difficult for manufacturing and service industries to export? In the light of that, will he reconsider his condemnation of the call by the CBI to reduce interest rates, and will he take action to do so?

Mr. Lawson: No, but the House will have noted that the SDP representative is in favour of measures which would undoubtedly lead to faster inflation.

Mr. David Howell: Does my right hon. Friend accept that his renewed commitment to tax cuts as the path to recovery, higher employment and enterprise is very welcome? Will he also confirm that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has authorised greater capital spending by local authorities from capital receipts? Will that not also make a great contribution to economic recovery, and is that not consistent with the Government's financial strategy?

Mr. Lawson: On the first half of my right hon. Friend's question, I am indeed glad to have his endorsement of the importance of further reductions in the burden of income tax on the people as a whole as a means of ensuring a sound, healthy and growing economy. I also believe that that is what the people want. As for local authority capital expenditure, it appears that there is some overspend on the figures originally allowed for. This is catered for by the reserve, but at this stage it is difficult to say precisely what the overspend will be.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Chancellor now answer the question which he declined to answer a few minutes ago? Is it the Government's intention to keep the value of the pound as high as they can get away with to keep up pressure on prices and wages?

Mr. Lawson: I do not determine the rate of exchange, as I have made clear to the House on a number of occasions, but I have noted that the Opposition are always complaining that the pound is either too high or too low.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are very real signs of a recovery in manufacturing industry, as shown by the recent unemployment figures in the midlands, which dropped while those for the nation as a whole went up? Does he also accept, since a review is now taking place into export credit guarantees, that we have lost some contracts to overseas business whose terms have been more generous? Will he urge on the Department of Trade the importance of making sure that financing is available on equal terms with our competitors?

Mr. Lawson: The Export Credits Guarantee Department does an excellent job, as I am sure my hon. Friend will concede. The whole question of export credit and aid and trade provision is constantly under review. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that there is little point in extending credit to countries beyond their capacity to repay. As for the recovery in the midlands, since I represent a midlands constituency, as does my hon. Friend, I find that particularly welcome. I am sure that my hon. Friend will also warmly welcome the recent announcement that non-North sea profits during the first quarter of this year are 25 per cent. up on the first quarter of last year.

Mr. Hattersley: If the recovery is so well established, why did the index of manufacturing output fall by 1·3 per cent. in one month? Indeed, why is manufacturing output still substantially lower than it was in the spring of 1979?

Mr. Lawson: Manufacturing output is steadily rising. Last year's increase of 3·5 per cent. was the highest in any year since 1973. The right hon. Gentleman may not be aware of it, but the shape of the economy is changing, and many manufacturing industries here, just as in many other countries, are now a smaller part of the total economy, whereas other sectors are growing very rapidly. The overall economy is growing fast, and I would hope that the right hon. Gentleman would be the first to welcome that.

Mr. Higgins: With regard to local councils spending the receipts from council house sales on further housebuilding, will my right hon. Friend accept that this is not import-intensive but it is labour-intensive; it increases labour mobility and is likely to encourage greater employment?

Mr. Lawson: I am glad to say that the numbers of total housebuilding starts are looking very encouraging. I believe that it is more desirable to encourage the growth of private sector housing than a further extension of municipal ownership.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

9. Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the likely cost to the Exchequer over the next five years of extra tax concessions to pension funds that will result from the proposals for the phasing out of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Moore: No extra tax concessions are envisaged. The proposed arrangements would be subject to the same tax treatment as existing superannuation arrangements.

Mr. Winnick: Is not the position that the phasing out of SERPS will mean an overall cost to the Treasury? Is this one of the reasons why there was such a severe clash between the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Social Services, which the Prime Minister tried to resolve?

Mr. Moore: No, in so far as the last apocalyptic aspects of the hon. Gentleman's questions are concerned, that is not accurate. He is right to remind us of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services said on 19 June in the Select Committee on Social Services, when he estimated that the proposals could reduce tax revenues by somewhere in the region of £300 million.

Pensioners (Housing Benefit)

11. Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the implications for tax policy of the proposals for housing benefit for pensioners in the Green Paper on the reform of social security.

Mr. Moore: The implications of all the proposals in the social security Green Paper for tax policy will be kept under review.

Mr. Bowden: Will my hon. Friend accept that it is ludicrous that some people who are receiving housing benefit are also paying tax? Will he further accept that many pensioners in receipt of housing benefit have had the purchasing value of their non-inflation proof occupational pensions reduced by 86 per cent. in the last 12 years? Is it not true that housing benefit is some small compensation for that section of the community?

Mr. Moore: With regard to the specific tax aspects of the question, my hon. Friend is right to say that the inability of Governments in the past properly to raise the tax threshold has created problems, and I know that he will welcome the Government's moves in the last few years to raise real thresholds by 20 per cent. He is also right to say that the prime victims, among the many victims of the evil of inflation, are those who are elderly and those who are seeking to live on the thrift that has produced a modest amount of capital for their old age. I know that he will join me in supporting the Chancellor to make sure that we eradicate inflation, which affects such people more than any other section of the community.

Limited Liability Companies

12. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of limited liability companies operate below the value added tax threshold; and if he will estimate how much revenue would be lost if it was raised (a) to £20,000 and (b) to £25,000.

Mr. Peter Rees: The proportion of VAT registered traders with turnover below the threshold is about 20 per cent. of the total VAT registered trader population. To increase the threshold to £20,000 would have a negligible revenue cost, and to £25,000, about £30 million.

Mr. Taylor: In thanking my right hon. and learned Friend for that helpful reply, may I ask him to comment on the small business lobby, which has said that it would be good for business energy and good for employment to raise the threshold to £50,000?

Mr. Rees: I have noted those comments, but equally my hon. Friend and the House will have noticed that there have been representations from other quarters suggesting that to increase substantially the threshold would result in a distortion of competition. Indeed, during consideration of the Finance Bill my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) suggested in an amendment which was not selected, that the threshold should be reduced for the construction industry.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware, however, that many small businesses in Suffolk and throughout the country would regard a substantial increase in the threshold at which they became liable to register for VAT as the single most useful step that the Government could take to try to assist their development, and that they regard such a move as long overdue?

Mr. Rees: I note the comments of my hon. Friend regarding East Anglia, but he and the House may be aware that there are already 300,000 traders who are trading at below the threshold but who have not chosen to de-register. This may indicate some evidence the other way, in that it does not quite reflect the hardship that my hon. Friend's question indicates.

Betting Tax Levy

13. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from professional association football clubs about the betting tax levy.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): Representations have been received from the Football League and about two dozen clubs.

Dr. Mawhinney: Will my hon. Friend confirm that it remains his policy to take a sympathetic attitude towards third and fourth division football clubs faced with large bills for safety and security measures if it becomes necessary for them to appeal to him for help?

Mr. Stewart: I note what my hon. Friend says and compliment him on the interest that he is taking in those clubs. I am sure that it would be best, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, to conduct a thorough inquiry into the whole question before deciding what is needed.

Mr. Ashton: Why is it that, when it comes to law and order on the picket lines, the Government will pick up a bill of £900 million for policing during the miners' strike, yet when it comes to law and order at football matches and providing safety at football ground, they rip off over £200 million from the betting tax and give nothing back? Why will the Government not set up a betting levy board for football as has been done for horse racing?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman may have overlooked the fact that, for racing, both betting duty and levy apply.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

14. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the funding of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Peter Rees: The Government's practice is to finance their borrowing requirement in a non-inflationary way.

Mr. Pike: Will the Government, in pursuance of their monetarist policies and their desire to contain the PSBR, make further cuts in public expenditure, or will they sell more public assets?

Mr. Rees: The Government's policy has always been to maintain firm control over the level of public spending and to maintain it at a broadly constant level in real terms.

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that under the last Labour Government the public sector borrowing requirement as a percentage of GDP increased to 9·2 per cent., while today it is 2 per cent.? Even at 2 per cent. of GDP it is costing the taxpayer £18 billion to service the national debt. Is that not high enough? Would it not be folly to increase the PSBR?

Mr. Rees: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's conclusions. As a consequence of the profligate policies of the last Labour Government, the IMF had to intervene to restore us to solvency.

Mr. Wainwright: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not understand that the Government's policy of persistently overfunding and borrowing substantially more than public borrowing requires makes nonsense of their claim to the Opposition parties that more borrowing would lead to even higher interest rates?

Mr. Rees: I think that the hon. Gentleman misunderstands our position. Overfunding is not expansionary. Like previous Governments, we use a mixture of interest rates and funding policy to maintain monetary control.

Building Societies (Deposits)

15. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the level of the ceiling for depositors with building societies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Following discussion with the Building Societies Association, abolition of the limit on building society investments under the composite rate arrangements was announced on Budget day and took effect from 6 April 1985.

Mr. Greenway: I welcome the abolition of the ceiling on the amount that depositors can invest in building societies. What effect has this had on the level of deposits? Will it lead in due course to a reduction in interest rates for mortgagees? Does my hon. Friend have any other plans for different roles for building societies?

Mr. Stewart: It is too early to say whether the abolition of the ceiling on deposits will have a material effect on the inflow of funds into building societies. Those funds determine the building societies' ability to lend at a particular rate. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the speech that I made on 6 June in Eastbourne confirming many of the proposals in the Green Paper, which will enable the building societies to compete more effectively in the market place, especially on an equivalent basis to the banks.

Mr. Heddle: Does my hon. Friend accept that the proposals that he put forward to the building society movement at that conference were widely accepted and that they will benefit the depositor and the home-owner alike? Will he ensure that the legislation which he will, perhaps, introduce next Session preserves the integrity of the building society movement, which is widely respected? Will he ensure also that building societies do not fall prey to overseas financial institutions?

Mr. Stewart: I am glad to know of the welcome that my hon. Friend gives the proposals for reform of the building societies. Although I believe that it is a good thing for the building societies to have wider powers, in relation to both their balance sheets and their other functions, I am conscious that it is important to maintain the principal characteristics of building societies, which have ensured their reputation for such a long period as a safe home for savings and as a means of providing home ownership.

Licensing Laws

18. Mr. Maclean asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made a calculation of the effect on income to the Treasury of more liberal licensing laws.

Mr. Moore: No, Sir.

Mr. Maclean: Does my hon. Friend accept that if we were to have more liberalised licensing laws that would have an effect on the income that the Treasury would receive, because to the additional number of foreign tourists who would come to this country to drink under laws as civilised in England as they are in Scotland?

Mr. Moore: I can see the surface attraction to the Treasury in terms of revenue, but my hon. Friend will know that licensing hours policy and related issues are matters for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be travelling to Milan for a meeting of the European Council.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Prime Minister take an opportunity now to say where she stands in the row between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Leader of the House over future income tax cuts? If she is in favour of further income tax cuts, will she explain to the 3·25 million unemployed, all those with bad housing, the parents who want better education in the schools, and many others, why the revenue from North sea oil and from the massive sale of public assets is not being reinvested in the crumbling fabric in this country instead of being given away in election bribes and income tax cuts?

The Prime Minister: With regard to the speech by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, he pointed out very vigorously that expanding welfare policy could be financed only by the proceeds of profitable industry and commerce. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out that company profitability last year was the highest ever and that investment reached an all-time high. It seems to me that the two speeches fit together admirably.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Would my right hon. Friend like to confirm firmly that it is not Her Majesty's Government's policy to re-rate agricultural land? Is she aware that hon. Members from both the Social Democratic and the Liberal parties in the so-called alliance are for once in unison in the sense that they have recently shown an intention in the House to re-rate agricultural land?

The Prime Minister: I gladly confirm once again that it is not this Conservative Government's policy to re-rate agricultural land. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for emphasising that.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Does the Prime Minister recall the activities of Admiral Cochrane, who stood for Parliament in Honiton in 1806——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before we get too far down that historical line, does the question relate to the Prime Minister's responsibilities?

Mr. Rees: Admiral Cochrane reneged on his promise to pay 10 guineas a head to those who voted for him and never returned to Honiton again. Does the right hon. Lady think that "Field-Marshal" Heseltine will ever go back to Brecon and Radnor?

The Prime Minister: I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would be pleased with the decision to use Crickhowell barracks as a training camp and a Territorial Army centre, following extensive representations, including the delegation to my right hon. Friend from Lord Hooson. I would also have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have noted that as long ago as 12 December 1984, long before there was any thought of a by-election in Brecon, it was announced by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces that the Ministry of Defence, following inquiries, was looking for alternative military uses and was identifying possibilities.

Q2. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Will the right hon. Lady accept that the action yesterday by the Secretary of State for Defence conforms brilliantly to the rule that elections work wonders? May we, in the next six days, have an extension of that rule to cover special credit facilities for newcomers to farming — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] — for increased expenditure on high schools in Powys—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] — for the withdrawal of the Transport Bill to rescue rural buses—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]—an assurance that there will be no nuclear dumping in Wales—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]—and ——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No reading of supplementary questions, please.

Mr. Meadowcroft: To facilitate matters, Mr. Speaker, I shall send the right hon. Lady the list.

The Prime Minister: I thought that the hon. Gentleman's king had been trumped previously. Along with the Crickhowell decision, there was also announced the retention of the Gordon barracks near Aberdeen, a constituency now held by a Liberal. I know of no impending by-election there, unless the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) is so dissatisfied with the Liberal party that he intends to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a business, Oak Publications, newly set up in Lincoln to publish a free newspaper, has been blacked by the NGA because it refuses to impose a closed shop after the employees, in a free vote, rejected a closed shop? [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Is she aware that that action has, in this new enterprise, frustrated nine jobs — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]—at the hands of the NGA? Will my right hon. Friend agree that in the English language we have a clear word for action of that sort, "tyranny"?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is a disgraceful act of intimidation and attempted coercion to try to put a small man out of business by saying that there will be a closed shop unless that small business man does as others say. It is an act of tyranny and I hope that he will take up his rights in law.

Mr. Hattersley: Now that the retail prices index has risen to 7 per cent., will the Prime Minister repeat and confirm the forecast of 3 per cent. inflation by the end of this Parliament, which she made somewhere in south-east Asia two and a half months ago?

The Prime Minister: Before I refer to the figure of 3 per cent., I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that although the retail prices index is at 7 per cent., which is bad for this Government, we have a better record than anything achieved under Labour. The answer to the last part of his supplementary question is that 3 per cent. is an attainable target.

Mr. Hattersley: I leave aside the retreat from forecast to target, which is backing away in quite spectacular terms. As the Prime Minister is into comparisons as well as forecasts, will she also confirm that unemployment, real interest rates, company liquidations, the manufacturing trade deficit and mortgage rates are not only higher now than during any month of the Labour Government's history, but are higher than at any time during the history of Great Britain as a whole? And since, as well as making comparisons, the right hon. Lady is making forecasts, will she say by polling day whether unemployment, mortgage rates and interest rates will have come down and whether there will be any improvement in any of the other disasters?

The Prime Minister: Had the right hon. Gentleman been in Government, the position would have been far worse and we should have gone to the IMF again and joined the list of those who are trying to get help from the IMF, instead of, under this Government, being in the list of those who are giving help through the IMF.

Mr. Hattersley: Instead of irrelevant hectoring, will the Prime Minister answer the question? Is it not a fact that all the indicators that I just described are now worse than at any time in our history? Does the right hon. Lady expect any improvement in one of them before polling day?

The Prime Minister: As I said, the position would have been far worse had the right hon. Gentleman been in power. I do not dismiss as lightly as he does the record of Labour in going to the IMF. It was the worst disgrace Britain suffered. His Administration borrowed money and we are still having to repay what they borrowed.

Q3. Mrs. McCurley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. McCurley: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity of confirming to the House the Government's resolve to enhance the status of women in Britain and abroad? In view of the recent agreement to ratify the convention on equality for women from the United Nations, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to tell the women of Britain of the Government's excellent record in promoting them in education, the sciences and work?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. This country has the second highest proportion of women in the labour force in the European Community. The long-term trend is towards an increase in the number of women at work. In the past four years the number of young women entering higher education rose by 17 per cent. In 1982-83 nearly half the new medical students were women, and the number of women studying engineering and technology has doubled in less than 10 years. Those are new opportunities for women under this Government.

Mr. Alfred Morris: What are the Prime Minister's comments on the snide and widely condemned remarks earlier this week by the Secretary of State for Wales, in which he made clear his contempt for mentally handicapped people? Has he been reprimanded?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would do no such thing. The right hon. Gentleman has grossly misinterpreted what was said.

Mr. Hume: Will the Prime Minister ensure at the Milan summit, for which she is departing this evening, that the problems of famine in Africa are high on the agenda, and particularly that there will be a positive and adequate response to the tragedy of Sudan?

The Prime Minister: I believe that that matter will almost certainly come up during our discussions, but probably in the separate meetings, not the main meeting, which is on the European Community. On the last occasion when we were at Brussels we asked for a report, in particular on the difficulty of distributing the stocks of food, which is one reason why they do not always reach those who are suffering from famine.

Q4. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Bottomley: Now that the great majority of rate-capped local authorities have set a rate, has my right hon. Friend noticed the scenes of violence, intimidation and disruption at council meetings, and will she seek broad agreement that there is no place for such behaviour in local democracy and that it should be condemned on all sides?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Some of the scenes, in places such as Southwark, Brent and Hackney have been the face of Socialism in power—a face of violence and intimidation. I hope that when Lambeth sets a legal rate—if it does so—we shall see no more of those scenes, because they are totally undemocratic. They are scenes of the Fascist Left.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the Prime Minister give more profound thought to and review the answer that she gave to me several months ago about the economic consequences for women who have had a breast amputated and undergo chemotherapy? Does she realise that, since she made her statement at the 1983 Conservative conference, a woman who has chemotherapy has to pay £2 every three weeks, or £31.50 a year? Will she ask the Secretary of State for Social Services to add a ninth category to the British Medical Association's list of eight scheduled diseases—mastectomy?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman is asking about what diseases are scheduled for the purpose of receiving free treatment. I believe that that is the point of the question that he is asking.

Mr. Pavitt: No.

The Prime Minister: In that case, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put it to me in writing. As he knows, it has not been possible to review that schedule to include the diseases in which he is interested.

Q5. Mr. Hannam asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hannam: Will my right hon. Friend confirm her support for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his determination to reduce the high levels of personal taxation? Is this not in direct contrast with the policies of the Leader of the Opposition, which are basically the same as the policies of his predecessor—high taxation and high inflation?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the policies of the Labour party when it was in power resulted in 2 million more people being in the income tax bracket when it left office than there were when it entered office. We have taken people out of tax. The Labour party introduced new taxes, such as the national insurance surcharge, and we have abolished taxes. We have increased thresholds—that is the tax-free allowance—which are now 20 per cent. higher than they were when the Labour Government were in power.

Q8. Dame Jill Knight asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 27 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dame Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that not everybody welcomes with open arms the implications of the ratification of the United Nations convention on discrimination against women? Can my right hon. Friend protect this country from the trap that has been discovered in other countries when they have ratified, which is that 50 per cent. of all the work force in certain firms, no matter how heavy or unsuitable the jobs, have to be women?

The Prime Minister: I know my hon. Friend's views on this, and I know that she will understand that when we ratified the convention we entered a number of reservations about it, which were made as a result of insistent representations from my hon. Friend.

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it directly arisng out of questions?

Mr. Powell: Yes, it is, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance to find out how it is possible for us to have a clear understanding from the Prime Minister when a question is asked about one of her Ministers who made a statement, which was publicly announced in most of the national and local press. The Prime Minister denied that that statement was made, although it was released by the Secretary of State for Wales to the Press Association. How do Back Benchers pursue the matter—when a question is asked and a reply such as we had today is given—to ensure that they get a truthful and a proper reply from the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: I said earlier, and I think that the hon. Gentleman will accept it, that the Prime Minister, or any other Minister, can only answer questions about her direct responsibilities. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman's correct course, if he is concerned about the statement made by another Minister, is to put that question direct to the Minister.

Mr. Parry: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: We shall be delayed.

Mr. Parry: This point of order arises from the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). The Prime Minister has denied that the Secretary of State made that statement, when the Minister has agreed to withdraw it and apologise. Will——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know nothing about such statements.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Will the Leader of the House state the business of the House for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen,): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 1 JULY — Until seven o'clock, private Members' motions. Consideration in Committee of the European Communities (Finance) Bill.

Proceedings on the Further Education Bill (Lords).

Motion on the African Development Fund (Fourth Replenishment) Order.

TUESDAY 2 JULY—Opposition Day (18th Allotted Day) (First Part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "Government cuts in the National Health Service".

Motion on the British Steel Corporation (Borrowing Powers) Order.

Motion on the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements) Amendment Regulations Order.

WEDNESDAY 3 JULY — Proceedings on the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Bill.

Motions on the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order and the Credit Unions (Northern Ireland) Order.

THURSDAY 4 JULY—Opposition Day (19th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on a motion on the restoration of stability in Northern Ireland. The subject has been chosen by the Ulster Unionist Party.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

FRIDAY 5 JULY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 8 JULY—Remaining stages of the Oil and Pipelines Bill.

Mr. Hattersley: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. May I ask three questions? Does he recall that the Opposition expect an early debate on the Johnson Matthey collapse? Debating a Bill which provides extra controls for the future will not do — there must be a debate on the collapse and the Bank of England's part in that debacle.

On Wednesday 3 July we are to debate the limitation of alcohol sales at football grounds. The football season is now only eight weeks away. Is this Bill all that we shall get, after the sound and fury in Downing street a few weeks ago? Will spectators be left unprotected and will grounds be left unimproved because the Government will not assist in any way in regard to money, or will there be another debate and another statement on football and the dangers therein?

Can we be told how the Government propose to respond to their defeat in the Northern Ireland Committee on their proposal to end the production of town gas in Northern Ireland? Should not the matter be debated on the Floor of the House? Is that a possibility? We believe that it should be.

Mr. Biffen: On the right hon. Gentleman's third point, I gather that it is a technical vote which has no significance for the legislation under consideration but, if the right hon. Gentleman wants to mention the topic, I should have thought that the debate on Thursday 4 July would give him an opportunity.

As for the debate which is promised for Wednesday on the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Bill, I assure the right hon. Gentleman that we appreciate the talks that have taken place with the Opposition and other parties. We hope that good progress can be made. The House will consider this Session the contribution that legislation will make to solving the problem.

I appreciate what the right hon. Gentleman said about his desire for an early debate on the Johnson Matthey affair. Perhaps we could pursue this matter through the usual channels.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): May I remind my right hon. Friend of my early-day motion, which was tabled soon after the Grand Hotel bombing and which has attracted the signatures of some 181 of my right hon. and hon. Friends? Does he recall that that motion invites the House to reaffirm "its total resolve that the freedoms of which it is the guardian must never be lost or lessened by violence or the fear of it"?

It goes on to consider whether those who show such total lack of concern for the lives of others should not forfeit their own lives if caught and convicted. Will my right hon. Friend endeavour to allot time, before the House rises for the summer, for discussion of that or a similar measure so that the House may demonstrate to the country its absolute determination in these matters?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for drawing attention to that motion again. I am sure that there is a deep detestation in all quarters of the techniques of violence and the terrorist violence which have appeared yet again recently, but there is no prospect of Government time being made available for such a motion in the very near future.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Will the Leader of the House confirm that he will provide an extra hour for the debate on the first of the two Northern Ireland orders set down on Wednesday? Will he also do his best to avoid statements on Thursday, which would curtail time for the subsequent debate on the motion?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the importance that the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends attach to the first point. Perhaps he could examine that through the usual channels. I hope that we shall be able to accommodate his anxiety. I also note his second request.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Further to the question asked by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival), will my right hon. Friend assure us that, although there cannot be such a debate before the recess, a debate will be considered urgently as soon as we come back?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly take note of that point.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that hon. Members on both sides of the House are worried because hospitals are above the law and are flouting food hygiene regulations, and health and safety laws? The reason for that is Crown immunity. Many hospitals are in a shocking condition, and some patients have died. Will the Leader of the House note early-day motion 808 and arrange time for a debate in the House?

[That this House notes that Crown immunity enables health authorities to flout the Health and Safety at Work Act and the Food Hygience Regulations; is deeply concerned at growing evidence that hospital patients are suffering unnecessarily; believes that it is wrong in principle and deplorable in practice for Crown authorities to be above the law relating to welfare provision; and calls upon the Government to remove Crown immunity from all premises covered by the Health and Safety at Work Act and the Food Hygience Regulations.]

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman refers to a point which he has argued hitherto in the House. While I will refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, I can guarantee no debate in Government time at this time of the year. The right hon. Gentleman might like to consider whether the matter could come within the terms of the debate that we are promised on Tuesday.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House consider arranging to lift the 10 o'clock rule on Thursday 4 July so that the important private business being discussed may be completed before the summer recess?

Mr. Biffen: May I on behalf of the House congratulate my hon. Friend on her new title? The Chairman of Ways and Means has asked that the 10 o'clock rule be suspended on that day, and I am certain that it would be for the convenience of the House for that to be done.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Does the Leader of the House recall that, earlier this week, the Minister for Social Security had to come grovelling to the House and admit that after only a few days he had the regulations wrong on the board and lodging measures that he introduced? We do not want to hide the real magnitude of the problem by talking only of the suicides and pregnancies, because hundreds of thousands of our youngsters are suffering. Is it not shameful that, despite seven requests from me, the right hon. Gentleman will not allow a full debate on the matter so that Opposition Members can help the Minister to get the regulations right?

Mr. Biffen: To describe the performance of my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security earlier this week on those regulations as grovelling is a most extraordinary representation of a masterly parliamentary performance. If the hon. Gentleman is a glutton for punishment, he can seek to participate in the debate on the motion on Tuesday.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House take time in the present climate to arrange a debate on the steps that civilised countries can take to combat international terrorism in all its forms? In his answer, will he pay tribute to the Scottish police for apparently saving the English from the Irish?

Mr. Biffen: I should like to pay tribute, but in more generous terms than those suggested by my hon. and learned Friend. On his first point, I recognise that there is widespread interest in the matter in the House, but, to put it bluntly, we are now approaching the time of year when all the time available to the Government must be used to ensure that we are not sitting in the middle of August.

Mr. Alex Carlisle (Montgomery): Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the serious plight of tenant farmers in the light of the Government's agricultural policy, especially bearing in mind today's decision in the Court of Appeal in the case of Williams v. the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which will enable the Government to carry out their decision to dump the 4,000 members of the Land Settlement Association?

Mr. Biffen: It would not be appropriate for me to comment on that case. However, I know that the re-rating of agricultural land will affect tenant and non-tenant farmers. I will draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food the request for such a debate and the point that the hon. and learned Gentleman made, and we shall see what time may be made available.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in a recent speech, which was also masterly, he agreed with me that in politics as in music if one has a good song one should sing it? Is he aware that next week and the week after we should have some statements by Ministers about some of the achievements of the Government—for example, today's announcement of the first-class return on our balance of trade for May? Last week I received a letter from my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Transport telling me that the Government are spending £312 million more on a new roads programme, about which hardly anybody knows. Will he have a word with the Prime Minister and ask her to increase the housing programme as well as the roads programme, so that we will really have something to shout about?

Mr. Biffen: I can think of no more charming prospect than my hon. Friend and myself as a sort of parliamentary duo, and that thought will sustain me in the fragile days and weeks ahead. As to the searching point that he made, I shall certainly ask my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the serious issue of alcohol abuse and its treatment? I hasten to add that I am convinced that such addiction is thoroughly absent from this place.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a profoundly serious point that merits consideration by the House. He will appreciate that, in a relatively narrow sense, it can be debated on Wednesday. I can offer no Government time for the wider debate that he seeks, but I shall bear his point in mind.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the report in The Daily Telegraph today that Derbyshire county council has banned 600 schoolchildren from singing "Rule Britannia"? Should not that disgraceful state of affairs be debated in the House?

Mr. Biffen: It is absolutely scandalous, and I am sure that the censure which my hon. Friend has just delivered will be appreciated in Derbyshire.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that it will not be satisfactory for the House to consider the British Steel Corporation (Borrowing Powers) Order next Tuesday without Ministers having received the BSC corporate plan and considered it, or made a statement to the House that the security of the big five BSC steelworks is guaranteed?

Mr. Biffen: I note the hon. Gentleman's point, and I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the latest and most sinister attack on parliamentary democracy by Leicester city council, which proposes to set up a research and development unit at a potential cost to the ratepayer of £135,000 to peddle Labour party propaganda, and to set up a contracts monitoring unit at a potential cost of £45,000? When can we expect to hear the results of the work of the Widdicombe committee, which should put a stop to this once and for all?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. and learned Friend might take comfort from the fact that an unsaleable product needs marketing on that scale. I shall take his other points into account.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Would the Leader of the House direct his attention once again to the plight of the young homeless? Does he accept that his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) was inadequate? Although the list of exemptions was extended as a result of the statement earlier this week, the refusal to grant exemptions in Middlesbrough alone has caused 80 people to lodge appeals against those refusals. The appeals will take as long as four months to hear, and for those four months, those people will be without financial support. Therefore, they have already been judged, sentenced and executed. Does he accept that it is not good enough to push any reference to this matter to the fag-end of a debate on Tuesday evening or early Wednesday morning, and will the Government provide time to discuss the matter within the next nine days?

Mr. Biffen: The motion has been put down for debate on Tuesday evening. The matter requires the urgent consideration of the House, and I have no doubt that we shall have a good and hard-fought debate.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Will my right hon. Friend make time available for a debate on the report by the Select Committee on Agriculture on the Government's handling of the Aujeszky's disease eradication programme now that great hostility is being expressed by pig farmers.

Mr. Biffen: My constituency interest makes me aware of the point that my hon. Friend has made. It would be appropriate that the observations of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food were made on the report before it was further considered by the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Leader of the House consider granting time for a debate on arms sales to Third-world and other countries with military regimes which do everything that they can to deny human rights—especially as we learn today that despite the Government's protests that they urge the Government of Chile to uphold human rights, the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend, Lord Trefgarne, is entertaining 12 senior Chilean military people in Britain this week? They are to be received at four national institutes — the International Institute for Strategic Studies, the Institute for Defence Studies, the Civil Service College and the Institute of Latin American Studies, effectively as guests of the Government. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that we can debate whether the Government's policy is to encourage dealings with and arms sales to Chile?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that both sides of the House would welcome a debate upon that topic, because if the hon. Gentleman's speech were to be be delivered in those terms, many hon. Members would have great delight in rebutting it. There is no immediate time available for such a debate in Government time but the hon. Gentleman might like to try good luck with an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my right hon. Friend share my anxiety for the Labour party, which appears to be running out of stamina? Does he agree that its performance last Monday——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member asking for a debate?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Soames: I was trying to ask whether my right hon. Friend agreed that the Opposition are having too many days, and that they cannot cope with them. Could we have fewer so that they would be a more worthy foe?

Mr. Biffen: I may be ultra-cautious, but I think it imprudent for any Leader of the House to taunt the Opposition with running out of stamina just as we move into the month of July. We will have just about enough stamina to see us through to the appropriate rising time.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that if, on Wednesday, when we discuss the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Bill which stops the sale of alcohol in certain places in England and Wales, he decided to stop the selling of alcohol in the Houses of Parliament and closed all the bars, he would not then be accused by people outside of saying what is all right for some people does not apply to those in the legislature? Does he believe that it would be a good idea if at 10 o'clock or whenever we have the vote, none of those people who have been in the bars from 10 o'clock in the morning could be accused of being a little weary and overtired?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting proposition. It could lie at the core of a fascinating speech to be delivered in the debate on Wednesday, when another Minister will have to answer.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): As I have the great honour, privilege and pleasure of speaking in my right hon. Friend's constituency tomorrow evening, may I ask a small favour of him? Like many right hon. and hon. Members, I have asked for a debate on care in the community. I refer my right hon. Friend to early-day motion 515.

[That this House, noting the widespread interest in the issue of care for the mentally ill and mentally handicapped in the community following the publication of the report of the Social Services Committee on this matter, calls for an early debate on the recommendations and implications of this report.]

It is a matter of considerable anxiety and relates to a deserving group of people. Will he arrange a debate before damaging decisions are taken by regional health authorities which will prejudice the future care of such people?

Mr. Biffen: That is all very well, but my hon. Friend outlines a fairly fragile political situation. He is speaking in my constituency, and I am not prepared to give an answer until I see how he behaves in north Shropshire.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): In view of the recent tragic air disaster and the fact that yesterday armed forces were stationed at Heathrow, will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate or statement on security at British airports?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that I do not have the ability to give a debate in Government time, but my right hon. Friends are keeping the matter under constant review and a statement will be made if appropriate.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Now that Congress House has opened its doors to private enterprise by converting rooms to a restaurant, a theatre and a bar, would it not be appropriate to allow the Opposition an extra Supply Day so that they can further extol the virtues of the Government's privatisation policy?

Mr. Biffen: It is a fascinating thought, but at this stage of the year time is a precious commodity and some might think me flippant if I responded positively to my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): Weeks ago, when redundancies were announced at British Rail Engineering Limited in my constituency, the Secretary of State for Scotland promised that a consultative report would be produced. When that report becomes available, will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to arrange for a debate on the immense problems of Springburn? We have serious unemployment, drug addiction is the worst in the west of Scotland, many elderly people live in severely damp housing and very few new companies have opened up in the area. Yet at one time we had four railway workshops employing 10,000 people. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that there is a debate on the Floor of the House when the report becomes available?

Mr. Biffen: I very much appreciate the hon. Gentleman's constituency interest in this, and I will convey his request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I wish to draw attention to early-day motion No. 789 about Arthur Bell and Sons, the excellent and profitable Scotch whisky company in my constituency.

[That this House recognises that Arthur Bell and Sons is a well managed Scottish company which, during a period of great difficulty, has continued to expand the sale of premium brand Scotch whisky; congratulates the management and the workers on the splendid results achieved; and believes that control of this fine Scottish company should not pass into non-United Kingdom hands.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is great concern in Scotland that the bankers dealing with the Guinness takeover bid are also acting for Arthur Bell and Sons and that there is a feeling in my constituency that there has been skulduggery in smoke-filled rooms, which cannot be good for the city, for Scotland or for Arthur Bell and Sons? May we have an early debate on the subject?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not expect me to follow his remarks in any sense other than to say that the matter is being considered by the Office of Fair Trading. There is a legal framework which must be observed.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): In view of the interest in the Government's proposals to improve safety at football grounds and the need to know whether they intend to make any financial contribution, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a statement to be made before the Bill relating to this matter is introduced next week? Alternatively, will he give an assurance that the Ministers presenting that Bill will give some information about the progress of the working group set up some time ago under the Minister with responsibility for sport?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the significance of my hon. Friend's point. I will bring it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): As Government inaction is as appropriate a subject for debate as Government action, is my right hon. Friend aware of the widespread dismay among many homeless people and unemployed people seeking to move house to find work at the Government's decision not to legislate in this Parliament to decontrol new lettings in the private rented sector? Does he envisage time being available for a debate on that important subject?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will appreciate that I cannot say anything about the possible contents of the Queen's Speech in the autumn, but I will bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What has happened to the statement on Lear Fan, for which I have repeatedly called in the past five weeks?

Mr. Biffen: We all have to learn to be disappointed. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman feels that the Government have been remiss in not providing that statement. I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to the point.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Once again.

Mr. Biffen: Yes, once again.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend share my concern at the spiralling cost of running the House of Commons, which was £51 million in 1983-84 and £57 million in 1984-85? Is it really necessary to have a new telephone system costing £2,035,000? Will he also seriously consider timetabling the business of the House next week so that we finish by midnight each night from Monday to Thursday and thereby reduce expenditure which is getting out of hand?

Mr. Biffen: There is an old adage that the guillotine is a sharp cure for dandruff. I was reasonably tolerant about my hon. Friend's point until he suggested that there ought to be an automatic timetable for every evening next week. However, I am grateful to him for making the point that the costs of the House of Commons are rising sharply.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the army training establishments of the Ministry of Defence, in the light of the announcement yesterday by the Secretary of State for Defence of a reprieve for Crickhowell and the somewhat misleading statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon? She implied that the Gordon barracks in my constituency have been reprieved. The barracks have been reprieved only as a TA base, not as a training centre.

Will not the Leader of the House acknowledge that we need a debate because of the Ministry of Defence's argument that the reason for the closure of both barracks is that there are insufficient recruits in Scotland and Wales to sustain them? Scotland has twice as many recruits as Wales, yet the Government have not reprieved the Bridge of Don barracks in my constituency. Will the Leader of the House acknowledge that the only way that I can save it is to run under a bus, if there are any left after the Transport Bill becomes an Act?

Mr. Biffen: I will not respond to the invitation to comment upon the hon. Gentleman running under a bus, but his point is a particularly suitable one for him to try his luck in the Ballot for the Adjournment.

Rate Support Grant (Scotland)

4.1 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make an announcement about local authority expenditure and rate support grant in Scotland.

Scottish local authorities are planning expenditure in 1985-86 which is some £91 million or 3·2 per cent. above the guidelines that I issued to them. When I met the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities on 24 June, I said that I was disappointed that despite my warnings that grant penalties would be more severe than last year, local authorities continue to plan for significant overspending. The total of local authority budgets is still above the 1984-85 outturn in real terms and is 1·8 per cent. above expenditure in 1978-79. Given the continued overspending, I have decided that for 1985-86 the total penalty would be £126 million. I will lay the necessary rate support grant Order shortly and grant reductions will start on 10 July. I have today placed in the Library a paper showing how the abatement will affect each local authority, and letters of notification to them are being posted today. The penalties are on a tariff which starts at a grant loss of 70 per cent. of overspend, rising to a grant loss of 90 per cent. of overspend for a 1 per cent. excess over guideline and 110 per cent. for a 2 per cent. excess. At 2·5 per cent. the rate of penalty is 120 per cent. and then steepens to 140 per cent. at 3 per cent. and 170 per cent. at 3·5 per cent. excess and above.

While these severe penalties have been necessitated by the continued overspending of some local authorities, no authority which is planning to spend at guideline will suffer a penalty, and I am glad to see that this year 30 local authorities will avoid penalties by budgeting within guidelines. I very much hope that the remaining authorities will reduce their expenditure to guideline and thus eliminate their penalties, to the benefit of their ratepayers when penalties are recalculated at outturn.

When I announced the penalties for 1984-85 I said that, in response to representations from the convention, penalties would be adjusted in the light of outturn to give incentives to authorities to respond to the grant abatement. Authorities bringing their expenditure within guidelines would have their penalties cancelled. Those reducing their overspending would have their penalties reduced. When I met the convention on 29 April it asked that this adjustment should first be made on the basis of provisional outturn. When I saw the convention on 24 June, I told it that I was able to agree to this suggestion. An initial adjustment of penalties on the basis of provisional outturn will be made for the first time in Scotland this year. The 1984-85 penalties will be further adjusted in the light of audited final outturn about January.

I am glad to see that 13 authorities subject to penalty on their 1984-85 budgets have brought their expenditure within guideline at provisional outturn and will have their penalty cancelled unless final outturn figures show them to be above guideline. The repayment of penalties will obviously be of benefit to ratepayers. Most other authorities subject to penalty have reduced their expenditure and will have some repayment of penalty under the new arrangements introduced last year. I am sorry to say that nine authorities have increased their spending and will have increased penalties. The total amount of penalties to be repaid in respect of 1984-85 is £29 million. Overspend for 1984-85 is still — at £77 million—too high.

There is no need for authorities to lose grant and it is in the interests of their ratepayers to spend at guideline. I hope those who have not budgeted at guideline for 1985-86 will bring their expenditure to guideline at outturn.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): It is sometimes easy to lose sight of the enormity of what the right hon. Gentleman is doing in the welter of detail that he provides. Last year the excess over guidelines was £114 million and penalty £90 million. This year the excess is £91 million — a very considerable improvement according to the terms of reference of the right hon. Gentleman—but the penalty is to be £126 million. Even if we exclude Edinburgh, where there are complicating factors, the excess is £74 million and the penalty will be £117 million.

Can the right hon. Gentleman say why, for the first time, he has thought it necessary to impose what can only be described as punitive fines, which are based neither on justice nor on logic? There is no pretence that the Secretary of State is trying to ensure that the guidelines are met. It is a vendetta, with stinging penalties for any local authority that does not bow the knee to his personal diktat. How does he justify this when local authority budgets between 1984-85 and 1985-86 increased by only 4 per cent., which is well below the rate of inflation? Will he tell the House whether the comparable abatement in England and Wales for 1985-86 will be weighted in a similar way, with a clawback of more than £1 in the pound, or whether this is a particular form of torture that he has devised for Scottish local democracy?

Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the impact upon individual local authorities? For example, in Strathclyde the excess over guidelines in 1984-85 was £50 million and the penalty £38·5 million. This year the Strathclyde excess will be £41 million—£9 million less than last year—but the penalty will be increased from £38·5 million to £67·5 million, the equivalent of 5p on the rates. According to my calculations, the penalty is 165 per cent. of the excess over guidelines. Even if there were merit in the guidelines, which is a matter of considerable controversy, there is no case for imposing an additional penalty of this kind. Can the right hon. Gentleman say why the hard-pressed councillors of Strathclyde should be expected to make a saving of this kind in this financial year? How many teachers does he think will have to go to the wall, how many home helps, how many occupational therapists——

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): And social workers.

Mr. Dewar: Yes, and social workers. Unlike the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie), I do not think that the term "social workers" is an insult. They do a useful job. An authority such as Strathclyde cannot find £67 million at the fag end of the year. This announcement will result in an unreasonable and unreasoning butchery of local government services.

Last year the excess in Central region was £4 million and the penalty £3 millon. This year the excess is slightly down—about £4 million—but instead of £3 million the penalty will be £7 million. Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to be thanked by his political allies in Lothian region, which in 1985-86 has an excess over guidelines of £7·5 million and which will be asked to pay a penalty of £8·8 million? In other words, Lothian region will be brought below the already completely inadequate guidelines that have been set by the Secretary of State. Lothian is not unique. Tayside is in exactly the same position.

What about some of the hideous complexities that will now face Edinburgh district council? The right hon. Gentleman seems determined to throw everything at the situation, including the kitchen sink—[HON. MEMBERS: "Too long."] Will he confirm that Edinburgh will be deprived of the entire needs element of its rate support grant settlement? Even if it meets his demands — because of the right hon. Gentleman's allegation that its spending is excessive and unreasonable — and makes cuts of £16·3 million, it will still be faced with more than £1 million in penalties as a result of this announcement.

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept, as any fair-minded person would, that his announcement is a recipe for chaos and that he is deliberately creating confrontation while at the same time parading around Scotland lamenting and complaining about the very crisis for which he is largely responsible? Even now, at this late date, will not he make some contribution to settling a difficult and dangerous situation by abandoning what amounts to no more than a pointless and punitive campaign against local democracy in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: To hear the hon. Gentleman, one would think that all this was complete news to him. But he knows perfectly well that last year the huge gap between what local authorities were planning to spend and our provision was met half way by an extra £98 million that was found by the Government. At that time I clearly said that, as part of that, the penalties would be much more severe this year. What is more, I have said that every time I have met the local authorities and I have also said it in public. Therefore, no one should be surprised that the penalties are much more severe.

The hon. Gentleman described the penalties as fines. That is not correct, because authorities can get this money back by bringing their spending down at outturn. Indeed, quite a number of authorities that suffered penalties last year have now got some money back. That will either reduce the net effect of these penalties or in some cases will wipe them out altogether. In England and Wales, the reverse of what the hon. Gentleman said is the case. The highest levels of penalties in England and Wales are far higher than in Scotland. The highest is 300 per cent. of overspend, which is much more severe.

The penalty for Strathclyde is large because it is a large authority with large expenditure. Although the penalty is up this year, that masks the fact that Strathclyde will get some money back from the penalty that it was scheduled to pay last year because it has brought its expenditure down at outturn. It is not all that difficult for Strathclyde, but I accept that it is not easy.

As to the time of the year, the hon. Gentleman might have mentioned the fact that we have managed to make the announcement considerably earlier. Last year's announcement was made well into July. I hope that this earlier announcement will be helpful.

Edinburgh is in a unique situation. I confirm what the hon. Gentleman said, that as things are going at the moment, Edinburgh will come out of grant altogether. But it will get that back if it brings its spending down to anywhere near guidelines. I have merely asked Edinburgh to go 3 per cent. above guidelines in the order that I propose to bring forward. But it is interesting to note, such are Edinburgh's extraordinary spending plans, that, had the penalty been 60 per cent. rather than the higher figures I have mentioned, it would still have lost rate support grant this year, given its planned level of overspending. Edinburgh is in a totally different situation, and I urge everyone in Edinburgh to think again before they do real damage to the city.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must bear in mind that this is an Opposition Day. A large number of hon. and right hon. Members wish to take part in the subsequent debates, and there is also an application under Standing Order No 10. I am anxious that questions on this statement do not continue much beyond 4.30 pm. Questions should therefore be brief.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Will my right hon. Friend accept that he is absolutely right to implement the grave warnings that he has given over many years? Does he also agree that some local authorities, such as Dumfries and Galloway, have, through prudent budgeting, kept within the guidelines and deserve credit for doing so? In next year's formula will he consider some incentive for those authorities that have kept within guidelines this year so that they benefit from their prudence?

Mr. Younger: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend. It is worth pointing out that even those authorities that have kept within guidelines have had to work extraordinarily hard and have had to make very difficult decisions to do so. I hope that they will be duly regarded for the contribution that they have made. We shall be looking at ways of ensuring that they are not penalised for their care and responsibility.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Are not these outrageous penalties just another part of this dishonest charade that we have had from the Government every year? They have laid down completely unrealistic guidelines and have pretended that they can be reached, when the Secretary of State well knows that they cannot. They have now come forward with these penalties that are a burden on the ratepayer. Will the right hon. Gentleman stop talking about penalties on local authorities, because these are penalties on rates and services? They expose the hypocrisy of the Secretary of State posing as a friend of the ratepayer. He provided an ostensible £50 million of relief for domestic and commercial ratepayers, reduced that to £30 million, and, as a result of this announcement, has taken away £100 million more than he is giving in the current year.

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. It is extraordinary that he should say that guidelines cannot be reached when 30 Scottish local authorities are now planning to do just that. He might also note that the guidelines are in some cases above the needs assessment. As for a charade, he will recall that when he imposed penalty, it was completely unfair and bore no relation whatever to the amount of overspend by particular authorities. That we have put right, and now the penalty at least bears a fair relationship to overspend.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): Was not the Edinburgh district council Labour group fully warned about the consequences of its actions? Much more important, will my right hon. Friend strongly emphasise to those Labour councillors that if they reduce spending to within guidelines they will again be entitled to grant?

Mr. Younger: I certainly confirm what my hon. Friend has said. Edinburgh's course is beyond understanding, particularly when it has been asked to achieve a figure that is quite a long way above guidelines. Edinburgh is being treated very well.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the so-called guidelines are simply his arbitrary figures so that he can act in accordance with Treasury diktat? Is he aware that any kudos he received for the £50 million repayment, later massaged to £30 million, will disappear when the ratepayers feel the effect of this massive piece of political chicanery?

Mr. Younger: The right hon. Gentleman might have been well advised to wait until he saw the figures, when he will find that the Western Isles does rather better out of this change than he might have thought.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Exactly how many local government jobs does the right hon. Gentleman expect to be lost as a result of his announcement? Does he not agree that the local authorities he is penalising have a much better mandate than he has to govern the people of Scotland?

Mr. Younger: I do not expect that this will lose nearly as many jobs as would be lost if spending were allowed to get out of control. That is what I am trying to prevent.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on fulfilling the punishment of extravagant sinners, but will he remember that forgiveness is also part of the treatment of sinners? One of my sparse virtues is an ability to understand the English language. I understand what an assessed need is, but not what a guideline is. It is absurd that a frugal council such as Perth and Kinross should have a guideline that is £1·2 million below what the Scottish Office has assessed as its need, whereas in extravagant Edinburgh the guideline is 10 per cent. above assessed need. Cannot we change such a mad system?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what my hon. and learned Friend has said. As I have told him, we are looking hard to see whether we can get a more accurate calculation of guideline in the future. I sympathise with him on that point. I agree with what he said about the repentance of sinners, but they must repent before one can forgive them.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Surely nothing extravagant has been done by any of these authorities. Much of what they have done has been caused by the duties imposed on them by central Government and the central Government cuts from which they have suffered. How much longer will we see our urban services in particular run down under this Government? What will happen to the marvellous and massive private housing improvement in Glasgow, for example, which has now stopped in midstream as a result of these punitive measures? This is part of the problem facing local authorities, and the Government will go down in shame for having halted these things.

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken in thinking that there is any effect whatsoever on housing improvement in Glasgow. That comes under the Housing Corporation, which has been very generously funded by the Government. As to the statement that none of these authorities has indulged in any extravagance, the credulity of the people of Edinburgh will be stretched beyond belief if they read that the hon. Gentleman has said that.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the method that he has adopted to ensure that the high-spending authorities are penalised when levying these undue charges against the ratepayers. Will my right hon. Friend accept, however, that rural areas and places such as Banff and Buchan district council and Grampian regional council have found it difficult to keep to his guidelines, but nevertheless have endeavoured to do so? I sincerely hope that the work that they have put in will be found to be of benefit when they realise what local authorities will enjoy in abatement.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct in that. Indeed, he is being unduly modest because he will find, when he sees the figures, that not only is Grampian within guidelines and has no penalty, but Banff and Buchan has some money back from the penalty that it would have had to pay last year because it has got its spending within guidelines.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Surely the Secretary of State is aware that not one single local authority in Scotland believes his guidelines are fair and provide the kind of finance needed for a local authority to supply services to ratepayers. Not even Grampian regional council, or Banff and Buchan district council, has a good word to say about the guidelines. Will he not take that into account? Secondly, he seems to express some surprise that there should be outrage on the Opposition Benches because we knew that this statement was coming. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that somebody who is sentenced to be hanged knows that capital punishment is coming, but that does not make it any the more palatable when it finally arrives.

Mr. Younger: I should have thought then, with that last point in mind, that such a person would not commit the crime in the first place if he could avoid it.

Aberdeen still has some penalty to pay, but the hon. Gentleman may be reassured to know that it will be getting back some of the penalties that it incurred last year because it got its spending down nearer to guidelines.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that, if there is any hypocrisy in this matter, it lies with those Socialist councils in Scotland that are bleating about having to cut services because of cuts in rate support grant which they have brought on themselves by having chosen to spend millions of pounds on supporting striking miners, giving money to CND, sending councillors on trips to eastern Europe and elsewhere and many other extravagances, in the sure and certain knowledge that not only would the ratepayers have to pay but they would lose grant and incur penalties as a result?

Mr. Younger: Yes, I certainly agree that some of the things on which such councils as Stirling are spending money are almost beyond belief. My hon. Friend will agree with me, I am sure, that, while these authorities seem to enjoy putting on the crown of the great overspenders, they do not like it when there is some penalty as a result. They should realise that one goes with the other.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): I understood the Secretary of State to say in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) that relevant expenditure was to be increased by £98 million. Surely this does not meet inflation, and, since local authority expenditure has risen by only 4 per cent., it represents a cut in real terms.

Mr. Younger: That is not quite the point that I was making. I was saying that there was initially a gap of about £200 million last year. I moved just about halfway to make it easier for local authorities. In return, I expected them to do better, and I warned them that there would be severe penalties. The hon. Gentleman may be pleased to know, however, that his local authority will get some benefit from the changes in the order.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for announcing earlier that Aberdeen district council would get a refund of penalty on 1984-85. Is that not the best possible incentive for it to remain within guidelines this year and to make every effort to ensure that its expenditure is reasonable?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that it is a tremendous incentive. It compares very much with the previous system, which meant that authorities got completely indiscriminate penalties related only to their proportion of rate support grant, which often bore no relation to the amount of overspending that they had incurred.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is it not the case, whether or not local authorities in Scotland have met their guidelines, that they are virtually united in regarding the system of guidelines and penalties as being operated with gross unfairness? Is it not also the case that, after six years as Secretary of State, the right hon. Gentleman has wholly failed to protect ratepayers from overspending local authorities, has failed to promote local accountability and has failed to develop a system that is comprehensible to anyone?

Mr. Younger: I have been used for years to the "on the one hand, on the other hand" speeches of the SDP, but to call for freedom for local authorities to spend what they like and then to criticise me for not curbing overspenders is beyond even me.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the whole problem of local authority expenditure began way back, before the general election of 1979, when the compact that existed between local authorities and Government worked? It broke down during the winter of discontent in the late 1970s, and, sadly, the expenditure base from which the prudent authorities began under guidelines meant that, as the years went by, the prudent authorities found it much more difficult to maintain the guidelines. Those that have deserve rewards. I should have liked to see more rewards for those authorities that had been good and even steeper penalties for those that had been bad. Being good has not been an adequate reward, and it is time that we got rid of the whole system.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's last point. It is desirable that those who have made the very difficult efforts necessary to keep within guidelines are rewarded. I think that the system now is very much fairer than it was. My hon. Friend is right in referring to this as a long-standing problem. I am afraid that the honour still falls to the Opposition, when in power, of having—in 1976—made the biggest-ever cut in one year.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): As a Strathclyde Member of Parliament, I wish to add my protest to those of my right hon. and hon. Friends as this vicious attack on the ratepayers of Strathclyde. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Cunninghame district is the unemployment black spot in the United Kingdom, with every third man unemployed? Is the Secretary of State further aware that Cunninghame district council is known as a responsible authority, one which not only carries out good housekeeping now but has done so in the past? Why should we suffer further when we have done well in Cunninghame and have tried to keep to the Government's guidelines? Why should we be penalised?

Mr. Younger: I do not always agree with the hon. Gentleman or with Cunninghame district council, but in this case it has had a much fairer deal because on this occasion it is getting back some money and is a net gainer from these changes.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Does not my right hon. Friend think that it is time to consider a new system to prevent this annual wrangling of an auction every year, which makes it very difficult for councils to organise their budgets, particularly when the budgets are affected halfway through the year?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that making these changes in the middle of the year is extremely difficult. That is why I have been pressing local authorities to do this much earlier—in fact, long before the year starts. Some of them did so and some of them did not. My hon Friend will be glad to know, however, that Inverclyde council is one that will be getting back some penalty as a result of the savings that it has made.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that the brutal cut he is trying to impose on Edinburgh amounts to an attempt to make a complete mockery of the decision of the Edinburgh people to elect a Labour council, and will do real damage to the level of services and to housing provision in Edinburgh? Will he admit that the 15·7p rate that he is trying to impose on Edinburgh is precisely the rate that was moved unsuccessfully by the minority Tory group last March, and that he has made no attempt to acknowledge the successful 22·7p rate moved by the majority Labour council?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman must know, as does everyone on Edinburgh council, that the council has deliberately and openly—it has been quite honest about it—set out to bust every one of the rules and regulations governing dealings between central and local government. If it does that, it must expect the normal methods to be used. I hope that, in the interests of the ratepayers of Edinburgh, it will now get its spending down. After all, all that I am asking it to do is to cover the huge growth in spending which it has instigated. There is no question of ordinary services being affected.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that my district council is operating within the guidelines? However, that does not deter the council from stating that this is the worst Government in history when it comes to looking after the interests of local government. Will the right hon. Gentleman take cognisance of the fact that, if Strathclyde works within the guidelines, there will be serious cuts in social services? Because of the clawback that will be imposed on the council, the right hon. Gentleman will not be able to fulfil his promise on Tuesday that the teachers would be taken care of with an increase in rate support grant.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says about his local district authority. I applaud the council for coping with its difficult task in operating within the guidelines. Of course it is not easy for a large authority like Strathclyde district council to get its spending quickly down to the guidelines. However, I have urged the council to do so for six years. If the council had started to act earlier, it would have found it much easier to get within the guidelines.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that my colleagues and I do not approve of or support Socialist councillors accused of breaking the law, even though we may disagree with the Government's choice of guidelines? We believe that the position in Edinburgh warrants some flexibility from the right hon. Gentleman, and not law-breaking by the council. Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, following the rates debacle last month, the Scottish people know how much the Government are responsible for forcing up rates? They will see this decision as a further move by the Government to force up rates and consequently to cut services next year. In those circumstances, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to ensure that the £126 million penalty which he is now clawing back will be handed back directly to Scottish ratepayers?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his clear statement about giving no support to law-breaking. I hope that that statement will be noted in all quarters. However, the hon. Gentleman's remarks about overspending were quite off beam. I thought that he would have been thoroughly pleased that his district local authority and regional local authority have avoided any penalty. Surely he must feel, therefore, that this penalty system is much fairer than the one that operated before the Conservative party came to power.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I am pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman's positive reference to Inverclyde district council. Has he calculated the number of teachers' jobs that may disappear because of these penalties and other proposed cuts?

Mr. Younger: It is for the local authorities to decide the details of the cuts. The provision that the Government have made allows, in general, local authorities to provide teachers up to full Red Book standard, plus an extra 6 per cent. to allow for curriculum development. If local authorities are already employing many more than that, they may have to reduce the numbers to make some savings. The provision is certainly perfectly adequate.

Mr. Fairbairn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The documents that the Secretary of State promised the House would be in the Library are not available. It is difficult for Back Benchers to frame their questions when the information about which they are either going to cheer or complain is not available.

Mr. Younger: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If that is the case, I shall look into it at once and make sure that hon. Members get that information as quickly as possible.

Mr. Millan: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this procedure not an abuse of the House? The Front Bench at least should have these details instead of having to rely upon details in the Library. The Secretary of State has information that is denied to the rest of the House. This information is not included in the statement.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State has refused to answer any supplementary questions. He has simply looked up the figures and said that the hon. Gentleman or the hon. Lady "may be pleased to know" that his or her authority has received some sort of benefit. If the right hon. Gentleman is going to abuse the provisions of a statement in this way, he should at least ensure that a copy is available, not only in the Library but in the Vote Office, so that hon. Members may study the figures and have a sensible question and answer exchange.

Dr. Godman: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to call the Front Bench soon.

Dr. Godman: The problems faced by Back Benchers in these circumstances are worsened by this lack of information, especially when figures and percentages are bandied about between the two Front Benches. Back Benchers are in a difficult enough position. They should be provided with the information that is necessary for them to ask good questions.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member's point rings a chord with me, but this is not my responsibility. The Secretary of State is responsible for placing papers in the Library.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): As this Front Bench speaker does not have the detailed abatement figures either, I ask the Secretary of State to spell out some of the details concerning certain authorities, because hon. Members are faced with great difficulties when their authorities are affected and they do not have full details.

Why, when the total budget is to increase by less than the rate of inflation, does the right hon. Gentleman propose to unleash this chaos on Scottish local government? The right hon. Gentleman has not yet given details of the staffing cuts that will be necessary for the remainder of the current year to fulfil the proposed guidelines. Has Edinburgh already received £2·5 million of the needs element in RSG? Does the right hon. Gentleman propose taking that money away from the council? If so, how will he do it? Why is the right hon. Gentleman conducting this frenzied attack on Scottish local authorities, the ratepayers and the services that are provided in these areas? Why does he continue to give us these bland assurances that he has the interests of Scotland's ratepayers at heart when, in fact, COSLA representatives must have given him a roasting the other day when he met them? Perhaps the Secretary of State would like to tell us what the COSLA representatives said this morning when he consulted them about these outrageous proposals.

Mr. Younger: Talking about strange roles, the hon. Gentleman's role as the supporter of ratepayers is pretty odd in view of the fact that he is a greater supporter of overspending councils than anyone.

I gave instructions that the information should be made available in the Library, which was asked to release the information. I shall of course look into the matter. I very much regret any shortcoming in the provision of information for hon. Members.

The proposed spending for the coming year is not increasing as much as the probable rate of inflation, but the spending must be related to what the country can afford. If that is not done, worse things might befall us. No business or family anywhere in Britain has a guarantee that what it spends next year will be fully uprated for inflation. The public sector cannot be guaranteed in that way.

An over-provision had already been made to Edinburgh, and we are considering the best way to rectify that position.

Rate Capping (Lambeth)

4.38 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the consequences of rate capping in Lambeth."

Those consequences are specific and immediate because today 31 Labour councillors and one former Labour councillor have received information from the district auditor of an immediate surcharge of £126,947 for loss of housing benefit and loss of what is called "Crown contribution in lieu of rates" together with the threatened loss of further massive sums by way of surcharge, possibly as high as £750,000. Today, the municipal equivalent of the rack and thumbscrew have been wheeled into Lambeth to threaten councillors with bankruptcy and disqualification. This process is conducted on a presumption of misconduct, not of innocence.

This matter is important because, whatever side one takes in the controversy, rate capping is indisputably a device to force councillors to depart from their promises, principles and consciences and to change — at least temporarily — through an unelected district auditor, the political control of the council.

The matter is urgent because, once the surcharge is raised, there can only be a matter of days during which an objection can be lodged and an appeal made to the High Court. Once that happens, the rules of order of the House could remove from discussion in this Chamber the predicament and problems faced by Lambeth.

It is urgent, too, because the consequences of today's decision and the logical conclusion would mean massive redundancies, cuts and the subversion of a democratically elected council in a borough with the highest unemployment, the highest number of unfit dwellings and almost the highest crime rate in London, and many other very high indices of deprivation.

A debate would allow the Government, even at this late stage, to recognise their responsibilities, admit the amount of money that they have deprived Lambeth of and avoid the damaging consequences of this current confrontation.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that this application should take precedence over the orders of the day so that these matters may be discussed in the House and the House may assert that intimidation and presumption of guilt have no part to play in the process of democracy whether at central Government or local government level.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the consequences of rate capping in Lambeth."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Opposition day

[17TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Child Benefit

Mr. Speaker: We now move to the important Opposition debate on child benefit. I must tell the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.42 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House strongly condemns the Government's breach of their own repeated promises to increase Child Benefit in line with inflation which will result in mothers and children being deprived of £175 million in the current year as the first of the Green Paper cuts; notes that Child Benefit is uniquely effective in countering family poverty, reducing the poverty trap and ensuring that mothers are the recipients of monies needed for child care; and therefore calls upon the Government to restore the real value of Child Benefit both now and for the future.

Our case in this debate is very simple and very clear. It is that child benefit is uniquely effective in countering family poverty, in reducing the poverty trap and in ensuring that the person who receives the money necessary for caring for the children is the mother. It was a Labour Government who brought in child benefit and, for the reasons that I have just given, we believe strongly that it is a key benefit, central to our social security system, which should be built up and not cut back. It is a benefit which has attracted widespread endorsement.

I offer at the outset one or two quotations. My first is this:

"We would all, I suspect, like to see an increase in child benefit; I think that it is one of the most effective ways in which you can deal with the problem of poverty and the problem of bringing help to children."

I am sure that we would all say "Hear, hear" to that. Those were the words not of a Labour Minister, but of the present Secretary of State for Social Services when speaking to the Treasury and Civil Service Sub-Committee on 28 July 1982. That was when he still believed in child benefit, just as, when he set up the pensions inquiry, he still believed in the state earnings-related pension scheme.

If child benefit was, in the Secretary of State's own words, of dealing with the problem of poverty, does the downgrading now of child benefit mean that the Government are repudiating that objective? The Secretary of State does not appear to want to reply now. No doubt he will do so later.

"one of the most effective ways"

On 28 June 1983 the Prime Minister said that the Government's real increase in child benefit then was "evidence of our commitment to the family."—[Official Report, 28 June 1983; Vol. 44, c. 49.]

Quite so, but does this latest princely increase of 15p—which is less than one third of the rate of inflation—now indicate that the Government's commitment to the family is somewhat wilting? That is another question to which we would like an answer today.

I offer a third quotation:

"It plays a major part in easing the unemployment trap, and so in our strategy of improving incentives for everyone. It is important for families, and particularly for the low paid. Indeed, it is the benefit which provides the greatest help to many of the poorest families in the country. I refer, of course, to child benefit."—[Official Report, 15 March 1983; Vol. 39, c. 143.]

Again that is not some Child Poverty Action Group enthusiast, as one might think, but the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1983.

If child benefit is so effective in all these roles, according to Ministers, why is it being sidelined now? If all those unsolicited panegyrics applied in 1982 and 1983, why do they not apply now?

The Secretary of State's justification for his backtracking on child benefit was stated by him in his answer to me a week ago, when he said:

"The first priority must be to give help to families in greatest need."—[Official Report, 18 June 1985, Vol. 81, c. 177.]

It would indeed be a seductive argument if it were true, but it is not. It simply does not reflect what the Secretary of State has done, for three good reasons.

First, only a fraction—about 16 per cent.—of the £175 million saved from the child benefit cut is being used to improve benefits for low-income families. The improvement in family income supplement will cost just £17 million, and the housing benefit child's needs allowance £12 million — which had in any case originally been promised for April this year. So the Government are not transferring resources at all; they are cutting benefit to mothers by £150 million.

Secondly, cutting child benefit and spending more on FIS, which is the Government's strategy, does not concentrate resources on the poorest families. It has the opposite effect. It cannot be stated too often that take-up of child benefit is virtually 100 per cent., while FIS, because it is means-tested, reaches only about half of all the low-paid families which are eligible. Housing benefit is little better—the take-up there is about two thirds. So the losers from the right hon. Gentleman's package are clear. They are those entitled to FIS but not claiming it, and that is about 200,000 of the poorest families, those with incomes just above the FIS eligibility levels, and mothers and children in families with reasonable incomes, but where the income is not shared fairly. Far from being helped by what the Government have done, those families will be the hardest hit.

There is a third important reason, if one follows through the logic of the right hon. Gentleman's package, why the outcome contradicts his own claims. It is that even those families which get the family income supplement will find that the so-called extra help that the Government are providing by increasing the FIS prescribed amount by more than 7 per cent. will be swallowed up by the loss of child benefit and the consequential changes in housing benefit.

I shall give an example which effectively demolishes the Government's case. In March of this year the average FIS payment for a two-child family was £12, which implied an average wage of around £76 a week. Assuming that their earnings increase in line with inflation, this family's FIS award will increase by £1 in real terms as a result of the higher FIS levels announced by the Government a week ago. However, at the same time, no less than 70p of this £1 increase will be snatched back by the cut in child benefit.

Indeed, the result will be even worse because of the infernal logic of the interconnection between means tested benefits. Because increases in FIS are taken into account for calculating housing benefit, many parents will find that the gain in housing benefit due to the increased child's needs allowance will be outweighed by the downward adjustment to housing benefit resulting from the higher FIS levels. The Secretary of State looks puzzled, but I hope he realises the logic of his own proposals. That is exactly what will happen even to those who get the fullest benefit of his increases.

The result of all that was the boast by the Secretary of State a week ago:

"The first aim is to direct help to the poorest . . . That is precisely what we are doing".—[Official Report, 18 June 1985, Vol. 81, c. 177.]

That is not borne out by the facts. Indeed, the truth is the reverse. Downgrading child benefit and upgrading the odds and ends of means tested benefits at the margin does not bring the greatest help to the poorest families, but traps them even more deeply in their own poverty.

We know the Government's real motive behind this child benefit cut. It has next to nothing to do with targeting the needy, which is Fowlerspeak for more meanstesting. It has everything to do with cutting expenditure on benefits to safeguard future tax cuts, which, as usual, will go mainly to the better off and the rich.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow) rose——

Mr. Meacher: If the hon. Gentleman was in his place at the start and heard my argument, he knows how compelling it is. If it has a fault, I should like to know what it is. It contains the compelling fact that even those who will benefit most by the increase in FIS levels will probably lose in net terms, leaving aside those who, because they do not claim FIS, do not get the benefit.

Far from concentrating resources on poorer families, which will not happen as a result of this package the proposal paves the way for concentrating resources on the richer sections of society—a redistribution which has become the characteristic hallmark of Thatcherite Toryism. That connection was made absolutely explicit yesterday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he made a ringing call to bankers and business men at the Carlton Club in favour of further tax cuts at the expense of further public expenditure cuts, and child benefit is the first victim of that renewed Treasury drive.

Mr. Hayes: How can the hon. Gentleman say, hand on heart, looking at the figures, that the Government's proposals are not designed to help families most in need, when he has not mentioned that one-parent benefit has increased by 7 per cent., that the child's needs allowance has gone up to £15.40 a week, and that there is a new higher prescribed amount for families with older children?

Mr. Meacher: I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman ran away after a single day when he was setting up a new organisation in the Tory party, if those were the sorts of arguments that he had in mind. He obviously has not listened to my remarks. I mentioned the increases in housing benefit, in the child's needs allowance and in the FIS prescribed amounts. I agree that for one-parent families the FIS increase is an improvement, but would the hon. Gentleman care to give the details of the increases and the number of families who will receive them? They are minuscule compared with the 11 million children who are losing 35p every week this year as a result of the cut in child benefit.

[Mr. Meacher]

This switch from public expenditure to taxation cuts has precious little justification. The Financial Times—scarcely a Left-wing publication—commented on 20 June, just after the Secretary of State announced his package:

"By looking for economies in the benefits but not in the tax allowances which form part of the welfare system, the Government is open to the charge of unfairness. The real value of child benefit, in reality a substitute for child tax allowances, is to be cut by nearly 5 per cent., yet the Chancellor recently raised the married man's tax allowance, enjoyed by couples without children, by twice the rate of inflation."

In truth, the married man's tax allowance has been increased by about 17 per cent. — that is, if it was increased by the statutory price-linked formula which the Government use—whereas child benefit is 3 per cent. lower in real terms — that is, if it was pitched in accordance with that formula. That demonstrates how, long-term, the fiscal trend under Tory policies has worked against families.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): When does the hon. Gentleman intend to depart from the brief prepared by the Child Poverty Action Group? Is he aware that most of us have read it?

Mr. Meacher: I am pleased to hear that. I hope that many Conservative Members, including the Secretary of State, will read it, because it represents a devastating indictment of the Government's social policies. If the Secretary of State read more documents such as that at bedtime, rather than the briefs from his Department, we might get better policies from him.

I quote again from the document, this time from the Conservative Women's National Committee, the publications of which I do not normally read. In a passionate plea on behalf of child benefit, that organisation said:

"We recommend that as economic circumstances permit, child benefit is increased in line with increases in tax allowances, or at least protected against rising prices."

Poor old Emma Nicholson. She really did her best among the upper echelons of Conservative women. Just her luck that the present Government are led by a women who happens to be more like a man. [HON. MEMBERS: "Sexist."] I am sure that the Prime Minister will be delighted by that reaction from the Government Benches.

There is a further important reason why this attack on child benefit cannot be justified on the grounds of public expenditure costs, which is what I suspect the argument is really all about. Even if child benefit had been indexed fully in line with inflation—as we believe it should have been—expenditure on it would still be falling in real terms. That is because the number of children qualifying for it has been, and still is, falling. It fell by 1 million in the six years up to 1984, and that reduction saved about £300 million at present benefit rates. Moreover, the number will continue to decline in the immediate future because of the relatively low birth rates of the late 1960s.

All of that is in addition to the fact that the Conservatives have cut spending on child support since 1979 by allowing child benefit to fall below its 1979 level during the period up to the November 1983 uprating, and by the steady and continuing reduction in the real value of child support for national insurance beneficiaries. For those reasons, there is absolutely no excuse today, in expenditure terms, for chopping back child benefit even further.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): The hon. Gentleman referred to the position in 1979 and then carefully spoke of the November 1983 uprating. Is he aware that in that uprating, and in the November 1984 uprating, the resulting real value of child benefit was higher than in any year under any Labour Government back to 1951?

Mr. Meacher: Quite, and we are approaching November 1985. It is true that at November 1984 prices the value of child benefit rose to £6·85, the level from which it is now being increased. That is marginally, by 15p, above the level in April 1979. However, at November 1984 prices, in the same real terms, it is now to be lowered to £6·57. That is precisely our objection. Child benefit is not being increased steadily in line with rising prosperity and increasing growth, as we are always being told, but is being lowered.

There is even less excuse for any cut in child benefit. The Government are mortgaged to the hilt in terms of promises about child benefit. The previous Secretary of State for Social Services, the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) said in 1980:

"We are committed to the child benefit system and it is our intention, subject to economic and other circumstances, to uprate child benefit each year to maintain its value." — [Official Report, 28 July 1980, Vol. 989, c. 1063.]

Perhaps we should now ask: are the Government saying that the economy is in a worse shape than in 1980, so that the promise of the then Secretary of State no longer holds good? Otherwise, we should like to know how their actions are justified.

Equally important, I quote from the letter from the 38 organisations, including the National Federation of Women of Great Britain, to the Prime Minister in March this year. The letter reminded the Prime Minister of her pre-election assurance:

"there are no plans to make any changes to the basis on which child benefit is paid or calculated."

Nothing could be more unequivocal than that. Moreover, the letter went on to say:

"In our view, the retention of child benefit, paid at a reduced level in real terms, alongside a restructured system of meanstested child support would mean a 'change in the basis of that benefit'. The Government would be seen, we believe, to be paying lipservice only to the principle of a benefit for all children, and would be widely suspected of intending to allow the reduced universal benefit to decline in value until it withered away and was replaced entirely by meanstested provision."

In a nutshell, that is exactly what is happening, despite all the Government's solemn pledges which are churned out like confetti before an election and then disappear like snowflakes on a boiler after it.

What is most worrying is that this attack on child benefit is not a "blip"—to use a word which I believe is beloved of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—but part of a calculated long-term strategy on the part of the Government to run down child benefit. I quote from paragraph 4.49 of the Green Paper, which is a very important statement by the Government:

"The Government believe that it will be right to give greater priority to assistance for families in the income range covered by family credit than to the assistance given to families as a whole through child benefit. We will therefore have regard to the need to concentrate resources in this area . . . in determining the overall level of child benefit."

That says it all. Today we are debating the beginning of the end of child benefit. All that I would add is that to embark on this strategy——

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): As the hon. Gentleman is about to conclude, are we to understand that we shall have this debate without him informing us of his own policy in this area? Does the hon. Gentleman still stand by the pledge that he made only two months ago to abolish the married man's tax allowance?

Mr. Meacher: I shall certainly outline not only our future policies but what we have done in the past. In April 1974 the Labour Government inherited child benefit at £5·14, at November 1984 prices. We increased that to £6·70. We shall not cut child benefit. We shall seek to increase it, not in line with prices as we did previously, but to do better than that. We stand on our record. If only the right hon. Gentleman could do the same. He inherited the level of £6·70, and it will fall this November to about £6·57.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman said in a statement only two months ago that he would double child benefit and abolish the married man's tax allowance. Are we to understand from what he has just said that that part of his policy has been abandoned?

Mr. Meacher: I think that the right hon. Gentleman is used to the terminology of Green Papers. I hope he believes that Green Papers are the subject of consultation. I made it clear that the document I released was not party policy, but a consultative paper. There should be serious consultation about whether we spend £4·5 billion on the married man's tax allowance, which is in no way concentrated on those who need the money, instead of increasing child benefit, which is far and away the most cost-effective and direct way of assisting those in need. That is a serious question, and if the right hon. Gentleman seeks to make a mockery of it I think that his view will be taken into account by the people of this country.

It is a travesty of consultation that the Secretary of State, having issued a Green Paper, which we presume is for consultation, embarks on carrying out the policy with his first statement no less than two weeks after he issued the Green Paper. Is that his idea of a Green Paper and consultation? That is also a pointer to the shape of things to come from the Green Paper. So far we have been given no figures from the right hon. Gentleman's policy document, after the most important review of the welfare state for 40 years, except for two. One is a £500 million cut in housing benefit, and now we have a £175 million cut in child benefit. It does not exactly fill us with a great deal of confidence as we await the rest.

It is our contention in this debate that the Government's family policy—if I can dignify it with that title—is fundamentally flawed and misconceived. In seeking to justify the cut, the Prime Minister argued on 20 June that the alternative to raising tax thresholds is "of particular benefit to families".—[Official Report, 20 June 1985; Vol. 81, c. 433.]

It cannot be said too often and too strongly that that is absolutely wrong. An increase in tax thresholds gives most money to the highest paid and least to the low-paid lifted out of tax, while the half a million working families with children below the tax threshold gain absolutely nothing. An increase in child benefit, on the other hand, is pound for pound a far more discriminating way of assisting families and concentrating help on low-paid families in need.

Even the Government's Green Paper accepts, at paragraph 4.44, that "Child benefit is simple, well understood and popular."

Yet, perversely, the Government now want to give higher priority to family income supplement, which is complicated, poorly understood and unpopular, and moreover, worsens the poverty trap. Not only that, but the problems associated with FIS will be compounded by the shift to the proposed family credit scheme. In particular, not only will payment through the pay packet be used, I suspect, to subsidise low-pay employers, but the benefit is less likely to be spent on the children, and the take-up could be reduced still further.

Last November the Government clawed back £1 a week from pensioners on supplementary benefit who were getting heating allowances. This June they are clawing back £1 a week from families with three children. That cut further threatens the diet and health of children, especially since the Government have already withdrawn school milk and run down school meals, when one third of all children in our society are in families living either at or only just above the Government's own poverty line. It is not a policy for families; it is a policy for cutbacks at the expense of families. Because 7 million mothers and 12 million children will lose, I earnestly and unhesitatingly request every Member of the House who cares about families to vote for our motion.

5.10 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"endorses the Government's commitment to maintain Child Benefit as a universal benefit paid to all mothers as a contribution to the cost of bringing up children; notes that an additional £2 billion will be spent on benefits as a result of the uprating in November; welcomes the additional help that will be provided for low income families with children and welcomes the proposals for a simpler and more effective benefit structure which will result from the Government's recent review."

I am considerably underwhelmed by the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). When he started, three Labour Members were present on the Back Benches. The numbers have increased a little, but even now are not into double figures—Ascot has ended and Wimbledon has begun.

Everyone knows that the hon. Gentleman's attack is a sham. The trouble with him is that he now speaks in such perpetual hyperbole that he is losing all contact with the real world. He complains of the uprating statement last week as being another attack on the welfare state. But what did the statement say?

The statement set out an increase in spending of over £2 billion a year, taking total social security spending to over £42 billion a year—one third of all public spending. That is a real increase in spending of over 30 per cent. since 1979. The statement set out an increase of £4 a week in the pension for a married couple and £2·50 for the single pensioner—increases which benefit over 9 million pensioners. The statement set out a 7 per cent. increase in unemployment benefit and a 12 per cent. increase for those on invalidity pension.

That is the real context of this debate—and the debate that is to follow on housing benefit. The uprating represents not a cut in spending on social security but the payment of over £500 million more than was originally planned for social security spending. Those resources have been directed at some of the families most in need. That is right, and I make no apology for our priority.

There is one fundamental point to make, which I sought to raise with the hon. Gentleman towards the end of his speech. We are now past the stage when the Opposition can get by simply by letting loose the hon. Member for Oldham, West to set out a shopping list of aspirations—and then repudiate those of his policies that lack instant consumer appeal. We are now at the stage where serious debate has to be joined about our objectives in social security policy and about the best methods to achieve them. For the Opposition, that means moving from generalised aims to particular policies. The trouble is, to judge from the hon. Gentleman's speech, all that that means is a move from the incoherent to the incredible.

Over the past few weeks, we have heard one call after another for more spending. According to the hon. Gentleman, virtually every part of the social security budget will be increased by billions of pounds. On child benefit alone, two months ago the hon. Gentleman proposed to spend an extra £4·5 billion a year and to pay for that simply by abolishing the married man's tax allowance. We should be clear what the effect of this would be. For 10 million couples, it would mean an increase of about £7 a week in their tax bill. For the 5 million without children it would mean a £7 a week cut in their income.

What I find even more than usually extraordinary about the hon. Gentleman's speech is that he utters vague generalisations about tax and social security but has not bothered to put any of his comments on the Government's record into that context. In particular, he has not looked at the effect of total policies in the lower income sector which is, of course, crucial in the whole rationale of child benefit. In other words, one cannot look at child benefit in isolation. One also needs to take into account what else has happened in terms of the tax system. Several things have happened. Tax thresholds are now 20 per cent. higher in real terms than they were in 1978-79. In other words, married taxpayers paying at the standard rate are £3·30 a week better off because of what we have achieved in raising the real level of thresholds. Those with working wives are £5·40 a week better off. In the context of this debate, it is right to point to that achievement.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I accept that one should look at matters in the round. Therefore, will the right hon. Gentleman look at the position of taxpayers to see how much indirect taxation they have to pay as a result of switches of Government policy from direct to indirect taxation? Will he look at the increase in rents that the Government have forced upon people and take into account the increasing rate burden imposed by the Government, and then tell us whether people are individually better off or worse off in their net tax burden since the Tories came into office?

Mr. Fowler: I would gladly do all those things, but it is sensible, when talking about child benefit in particular—we all remember the history and rationale of child benefit, which was to bring help particularly to those in the low income sector—to look at the tax position as well. At the same time we should examine the national insurance position.

The changes in the structure of national insurance contributions announced in the last Budget will also give extra help to those on low incomes. For the lowest paid, they almost halve national insurance rates, and for people earning under £90 a week they will mean increases in net income ranging from £1·10 to £2·18 a week. That is effective and immediate help directed at those on low incomes.

Therefore, the context of this debate is a £2 billion uprating of social security, a raising of tax thresholds with the effect that 1·25 million people have been taken out of tax altogether and a reduction in national insurance in this year's Budget of 3·5 million low wage earners.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend so early, and I am grateful to him for giving way. Before he altogether leaves the married man's tax allowance, can he answer this point? In today's society, is it really sensible if, when two individuals, both working, get married, they have an increase in their tax allowance? As Secretary of State for Social Services, would not my right hon. Friend rather that the money that is lost in that tax allowance could be spent somehow on families?

Mr. Meacher: Ah.

Mr. Marlow: Would it not be a good idea if we moved it more towards a child tax allowance, as we have in the past?

Mr. Fowler: I see that the hon. Member for Oldham, West now wants child tax allowances to be considered as well. There appears to be no end to his flexibility on what his policy will be. I accept that there are issues that have to be examined; that is why the Green Paper on personal taxation that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is bringing forward later this year will look at this sector. That is the right context.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The right hon. Gentleman has just made two very important points, one about raising the tax threshold and one about changes in national insurance contributions, and those changes need to be recognised. Will he take the argument a stage further and admit that neither the raising of the threshold nor the national insurance changes distinguish whether the taxpayers have children and that, over the past 30 years, we have shifted the burden of taxation onto those with children? Before the last election and up until recently, both sides thought that the only way to shift the burden back was to raise child benefit in line with tax thresholds. Is not that an important point, and is not the failure to raise child benefit in line with thresholds a defeat for the Government's policy, which they say is about protecting the family?

Mr. Fowler: It is not remotely a defeat, but I agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said, in a typically sensible intervention. I do not wish the hon. Gentleman any permanent harm by that comment. Clearly, what he says is entirely right. The tax system, and only the tax system, can direct help at low-income families without distinguishing between low-income families with children and those without. The same is true for national insurance. The context of this debate, unlike the picture painted by the hon. Member for Oldham, West is the £2 billion uprating announced last week, and the fact that we have raised the tax threshold and reduced national insurance.

It is against that background that the Government had to decide their priorities on child benefit. We have already made it clear that child benefit should continue as a benefit payable to all families irrespective of their incomes. The greatest priority must be the support of families on low incomes, not the general level of support. It is here that we find some of the most difficult problems — as the review of social security showed — and it is right that this should be our first priority.

That is why we decided to take other measures to get extra help to low-income families. The result is that we have made two important changes to the family income supplement scheme. Two hundred thousand families stand to gain from these changes — those with older children will gain most. We have increased the allowances in the scheme by at least £1 more than the 7 per cent. increase in prices would have justified. That will mean that the benefit payable at a given level of income could be £3·75 per week higher for a one-child family and £4·50 per week higher for a two-child family.

Wherever we divide on this, I think that the hon. Member for Oldham, West will agree at least with this step — that we have, for the first time, introduced some age relation into the family income supplement system. At present, the allowances for children are the same whatever the age of the child. That is in marked contrast to the supplementary benefit rates, which rightly give more help to those with older children. This gives rise to some of the more extreme effects of the unemployment trap — the help available for a child through family income supplement is well below the help provided for a teenage child through supplementary benefit. By increasing the prescribed amounts for a child aged 11 to 15 by £1 per week, and for a child aged 16 or over by £2 a week, we will be taking the first step to reducing that problem. It is of course a first step to reduce a problem which many people previously recognised.

I also announced last week a further real increase in the child need allowance in housing benefit. That is the amount of extra income which is assumed to be needed for each child in assessing entitlement to benefit. At its new level of £14.50 — a £1 a week real increase — the allowance, although not age-related, will be much closer to the scale rate for older children in supplementary benefit. The change will also benefit more than 500,000 families with children in receipt of standard housing benefit and increase entitlement by up to 40p per child per week.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West failed to mention the increase of one-parent benefit from £4·25 per week to £4·55, the fully uprated child scale rates in supplementary benefit and the child dependency additions payable with national insurance benefits.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Secretary of State nevertheless confirm that the point I was making — that those 200,000 families who do not receive family income supplement will not get any of those extra benefits? Secondly, even if they are getting family income supplement, the fact that there is a connection between housing benefit and family income supplement, and that family income is taken into account in assessing for housing benefits, means that the increase in the housing benefit child need allowance will be outweighed by the downgrading of housing benefit because of the relationship with housing benefit. The net result will not be a gain, even for those very few families who are most favoured by the right hon. Gentleman's changes.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member has not got it quite right. With regard to housing benefit, children on supplementary benefit will not lose at all. As for the housing benefit rates taper and the changes to which the hon. Gentleman referred, those below the needs allowance will not lose either.

Perhaps I might give the hon. Gentleman an example of what will happen. A family earning £80 a week and with two teenage children gets £10 of benefit a week. Under the new system that I am introducing as a result of the uprating, the benefit for that family will increase to £15·50. I accept that family income supplement is not conceivably an end to the matter — we should not be making our family credit proposals in the Green Paper if it were. We have already said that we intend to do more to improve the circumstances of low-income working families with children.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way again as I should like to get on. The new family credit scheme would aim to eliminate families with children finding themselves worse off in work than on supplementary benefit, to prevent any family facing a marginal tax rate of more than 100 per cent. — which completely undermines incentives for people in lower-paid jobs — and to give extra help through the pay packet so that people in lower-paid jobs have their tax and national insurance liability effectively reduced or eliminated.

Those are important social objectives and real improvements in how our social security system works. The Government have made it clear that we regard a universal child benefit as important.

Mr. Frank Field: But not very important.

Mr. Fowler: It is the only recognition in our tax or benefit system of the extra responsibilities borne by all of those who are bringing up children. They are recognised in almost all western European countries that I have visited and whose social security systems I have seen. We must keep that general support in proportion, however. I see no reason why we should provide help to all families with children at the level appropriate to those families most in need of help. The Government are proposing a general level of help and additional help for families most in need.

I find no great attraction in the option, which the hon. Member for Oldham, West trailed, of increasing child benefit in order to tax it, as the hon. Gentleman appeared to suggest on the BBC "Newsnight" programme last week. Doubling and then taxing child benefit would increase public expenditure by about £4·5 billion. Even allowing for the extra tax revenue, the cost would rise by £1·5 billion to about £6 billion a year. The result would be a savage cut in effective tax thresholds — for all families with children, the point at which earnings would be subject to tax would be reduced by about £725 per child. That would mean an increase in tax, at standard rate, of almost £220 a year.

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman totally misunderstands what I said. I did not say that child benefit would be increased and taxed with the current income tax structure. As the Minister of State, who was present, ought to know, I argued that it could seriously and valuably be done only in the context of a different type of income tax structure.

Mr. Fowler: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind my saying so, the House is in some difficulty about what he means, because he keeps changing his story. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) doubtless wants to give the hon. Gentleman his support, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can look after himself. Two months ago the hon. Gentleman set out in a Green Paper, which he described as a document which would pre-empt the Government's proposals——

Mr. Frank Field: More green than the right hon. Gentleman's.

Mr. Fowler: That is probably right, and as I understand it, that sentiment is shared by the whole shadow Cabinet.

The fact is that on "Newsnight" the hon. Gentleman said that we can pay universal benefit such as child benefit to everyone and then concentrate it on those in the greatest need without a means test by taxing the benefit.

Mr. Meacher: On a different income tax structure.

Mr. Fowler: I hear what the hon. Gentleman said, but that is not in the quotation. I am delighted to know that he has ambitions to change not only the social security system, but the tax system. He now wishes to change the structure of income tax. Has the hon. Gentleman got those proposals past the Shadow Cabinet yet? Would he like to intervene and tell me what those proposals are for the change of the income tax structure? His silence speaks volumes.

The Government want to see child benefit at a reasonable level, payable to all families irrespective of means.

Mr. Gordon Brown rose——

Mr. Fowler: I shall not give way.

The Government want to see full provision for those with children on supplementary benefit, a more effective system for working families with lower incomes to help with the greater pressures they face, and a continuing reduction in the burden of tax on the lower paid. Our policies and plans are clear, both in the short term and in the proposals that we have put forward for the long term. Our policies are based on a clear view of priorities—in particular, our aim to direct more help towards low-income working families. Our policies also recognise the need to find a balance between benefit levels capable of meeting those objectives and what the taxpayer can afford.

In contrast, we have the approach of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. I do not see what the point is of his coming to the Dispatch Box time after time with promises of spending increases, if he can never provide an adequate answer about how the money will be raised. I do not see the point of his promising money for benefits, if the consequence is to bring down tax thresholds, to drag more people into tax, and to take the benefit money away in higher taxation.

As a result of the uprating system, the Government will spend more than £42 billion a year on the social security budget. Even by the hon. Gentleman's definition, that is not a cut in social security. It is an increase in spending of more than £2 billion a year.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The cost of unemployment.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman is wholly wrong. It shows his complete ignorance of social security, which goes hand in hand with his complete ignorance of health policy. Our policies represent the Government's practical commitment to help people, such as the retired, the unemployed——

Mr. Dobson: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what the figures would be if unemployment had remained at the level it was when the Tory Government took power in 1979?

Mr. Fowler: The 30 per cent. real increase in spending from 1979 to today has partly been because of the increase in unemployment, but also because of a real increase in benefits and because there are more beneficiaries, such as the 850,000 extra pensioners.

Mr. Dobson: The right hon. Gentleman is now taking credit for people growing old.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman does not understand what I am saying, which is that the Government certainly face their commitments and fulfil them.

We have retained child benefit as a universal benefit paid to the mother, but in addition, the Government are tackling the real problem of bringing extra help to low-income families with children. In the uprating, we are achieving that notably with the help of the family income supplement system. In future, thanks to the review of social security, we shall be able to use the new family credit scheme.

The Government's record is one of giving help and support to families with children, both through the benefit and the tax systems. It is a record that we shall maintain in the future.

5.35 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Secretary of State made much of the size of the increase in the social security budget, and he was undoubtedly wise to do so. However, he did not tell the House about the £2 billion increase in social security benefits most of which he had to bring about because of the social security laws. He did not mention that in areas where the Government have discretion, and where there is no legal commitment to keep benefits in line with rises in prices or tax thresholds, such as with child benefit, there have been cuts. Had past commitments to these benefits been fulfilled he would have announced not a £2 billion increase, but a £2·25 billion increase in social security payments. Yet again there has been a cut in the rate of increase in benefits.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): It is not a cut.

Mr. Field: If the hon. Gentleman were as diligent in his attendance in the House at these debates as he is in the Select Committee, he would know that I have never claimed that there have been cuts, in the old-fashioned sense, but that we have been talking about cuts in the rate of increase in benefits.

Today we face a major change in the Government's stance. For the first time the Secretary of State has not made the Government's traditional defence on child benefit. Historically, both Front Benches have advanced powerful arguments why child benefit should be increased, not just in line with prices, which has not occurred this time, but, more important, in line with increases in tax thresholds. I thought that there had been agreement on that, but it appears from the debate that that agreement no longer exists.

During the past 30 years there has been a shift in the tax burden, and that has happened irrespective of which party make up the Government. While the tax burden has risen for all taxpayers, it has risen fastest for those with children. Until today's debate Ministers stood at the Dispatch Box and said that the only effective way of maintaining tax equity between those with responsibility for children and those without was to increase child benefit in line with tax thresholds. We have now reached an important divide, and the Government no longer believe that that is the most effective way. Yet they have not said what from now on their policy will be on redressing the tax burden, so that we reduce it faster for those with children than for those without.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I have listened to the hon. Gentleman with interest. Does he accept that many better-off people with children—my family included—would willingly forgo a greater rate of increase in child benefit to help those who are less fortunate?

Mr. Field: I shall come to that point. The hon. Gentleman is not as well off as he would be if he did not have children. That is crucial and we must keep it in mind. Just as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was right to talk about the real increase and the real value of child benefit under the Government, we need to look at what that level would have been, had child benefit been increased in line with the rise in tax thresholds for single people and married couples.

The second argument that the Government have always used in these debates, although not today, is that child benefit is the most effective way of tackling family poverty. It is a major change that the Government will now rely on the family income supplement and on the new family credit scheme.

The Government were silent today on the third reason usually put forward by both sides of the House on the importance of child benefit—to maintain and increase incentives to work. There was no mention in the Secretary of State's speech that this is now an important objective of Government policy. He was wise not to say so, because he knows that the more the Government rely on means-tested benefits the more difficult it will be to maintain, let alone increase, the incentive to work. Yet this is a problem that many poor families face.

The fourth reason that binds or used to bind both sides of the House is that child benefit is one way to ensure that the money goes not to the man but to the woman.

The Opposition do not say that, since 1979, the Government have reduced child benefit below what it was under a previous Government. However, had the Government maintained their pledge to keep child benefit in line with rising tax thresholds—the threshold for a single person has risen by almost 90 per cent.—child benefit should have risen by an equal amount, but it has not. It has risen by only 75 per cent., which is a cut and a shift in the burden of taxation from those without children to those with children.

Not only have the Government changed their argument about the defence of child benefit, but it is significant that when the Secretary of State announced the increase in child benefit, small though it was, there was no pro-child benefit lobby among Conservative Members. No Conservative Member criticised the Secretary of State for failing to increase child benefit in line with tax threshold increases. Far from it. The only Conservatives to speak were those asked the Secretary of State to rein back and cut child benefit still further. The organisations that are in business to protect and promote child benefit must now realise from recent debates that, for the first time in 15 or 20 years, there is no Conservative lobby in favour of the benefit. This damaging position must be quickly repaired.

From the uprating statement and from today's statement, we do not know whether the Government have made a once-for-all change in policy or whether the cuts in child benefit will recur in future years. The saving in child benefit is £175 million. My guess is that the Secretary of State has fought his corner in Cabinet to get those funds for his new family credit. We should like to know whether the Secretary of State envisages future cuts in child benefit to pay for even larger resources for the family credit scheme, or whether he was forced to agree to a cut just for this year in order to initiate the scheme. This is an important point, because the anger that we are expressing in this debate about the cut in child benefit is mitigated if it is a once-for-all cut. But it is a different matter if the Secretary of State envisages further cuts in the future to finance the new scheme. I shall happily give way to the Minister to respond to this point.

Mr. Fowler: I am listening.

Mr. Field: The right hon. Gentleman prefers not to respond, but I am pleased that he is listening.

Without the active support for child benefit on the Tory Benches, those of us who put a premium on the benefit must look to the future and adjust our position accordingly——

Hon. Members: Where are they?

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): They are in Committees.

Mr. Field: I make no excuse for the poor attendance of Labour Members. Even if they are in Committees, it does not excuse their constant poor attendance on social security issues which are of such vital importance. The more we say that, the more chance there is that the powers that be will take note and persuade Labour Members to attend debates, even though they do not wish to speak.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will my hon. Friend accept that he is being a little unfair? My hon. Friend knows that there are Committees meeting in the House today and, indeed, every day, which hon. Members must attend. It is not that these debates are any less or more important than those in Committee. Hon. Members cannot be in two places at once. My hon. Friend only aggravates the problem further.

Mr. Field: Not even Labour Members can be in two places at once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. This is a short debate. The hon. Gentleman must not get carried away with sedentary interventions, which delay the debate.

Mr. Robert Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It ill becomes hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who has just returned from a swanning trip to South Africa, to complain about the absence of Labour Members from the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me. I must say that running commentaries from a sedentary position do not help the debate.

Mr. Frank Field: You were right to reprimand me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I hope that the point will have been taken by Labour Members.

When the Government set up their reviews of the social security system they were going to invite me to give evidence. But when the Minister of State realised that not much attention would be paid to the evidence, that invitation never materialised. Had I given evidence to the committee, I would have put forward the option of taxing child benefit. Although I wish to see a massive increase in child benefit, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) wishes, taxation on child benefit is an option that we should consider without such an increase. Although there are difficulties with such a policy, it would fulfil many of the Government's objectives vis-á-vis family policy. The Government say that they wish to target benefit on the poorest. If we tax child benefit, we shall have an effective targeting policy without any of the take-up problems. Most families with children have a tax threshold above the supplementary benefit level, so we would not be clawing back off the poorest in work. We would be taking from those paying the higher rate of tax. Those on the standard rate of tax would not be worse off, and the gain from that policy would be concentrated on the poorest. That would be an effective targeting policy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): There is a further option upon which the hon. Gentleman might want to comment—converting child benefit to a tax allowance.

Mr. Field: I shall not follow up that remark because this is a short debate and I should like to see a complete change of tax allowance policy. I believe that we should be moving towards phasing out tax allowances so as to reduce tax rates, but this is not the time to develop that argument.

There are two difficulties with the policy that I have suggested. One is that we should be transferring income within the household. The increased tax would be paid largely by males in work and the money would go to women. Some would see that as a disadvantage and if one were in government one might say that it is a disadvantage. Those of us who wish to see the position of women in our society strengthened would no doubt see it as an advantage.

Another disadvantage is that under the rules for taxing income, that change would mean that the child benefit of those on supplementary benefit would be liable to tax. I suggest that if the Government made such a proposal, they should exempt from tax the child benefit of those on supplementary benefit. At one stroke that would give the Government one of their other objectives—the creation of a family premium within the supplementary benefit system—without creating new administration.

Mr. Favell: I am most interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He has gone a long way towards dealing with the point that I raised with him earlier. The only problem with his suggestion is that taxing child benefit would lead to people being taxed twice. They would be taxed once to provide the money and then taxed on the benefit in the hands of the wife. Could he deal with that problem?

Mr. Field: I cannot deal with it, because I do not fully understand the hon. Gentleman's point, and if I give way again it will delay the debate.

The Secretary of State raised a further objection to that proposal—that the policy would lead to a lowering of the tax threshold. It would be useful if we could make some changes in the language that we use in approaching these debates. While the policy would lead to a change in the tax threshold, it would not lead to a change in the effective tax-free income. Both sides of the House must stop playing the game that when they are in opposition they score points by saying that tax thresholds have been lowered when the tax-free income has been increased and, vice versa, when they are in office. Equally, we need new ways of approaching our categories of public expenditure. If we pay the money as child benefit it appears as public expenditure, but if it is paid as a child tax allowance it does not. The same resources are being used, yet the amount appears differently in the public expenditure accounts. It is marked as a plus or a minus depending upon where one

This is an important debate. Its importance is not completely matched by the number of hon. Members present, but it is matched by the interests of those hon. Members who are in the Chamber. We have reached a watershed in the child benefit debate especially in view of the reaction from the Conservative Benches. That must be taken on board. If there is so little support for increasing the universal benefit in line with tax allowances those whose interests have been to see the furtherance of the benefits must regroup and rethink their position. I am suggesting one avenue of advance which would lead to a considerable increase in the cash payment going to women. It would achieve some of the Government's other objectives on targeting and a family premium within the supplementary benefit system and, above all, it would concentrate resources on the poorest — those in our society who earn poverty wages.

5.54 pm

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Like the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), I acknowledge and welcome the uprating of benefits announced by my right hon. Friend last week. I do not claim even a fraction of the hon. Member's knowledge of social security, but I share his anxiety about child benefit. I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me if I say that I am a little perplexed. He reiterated several times this afternoon that child benefit is important, but it seems to me that we are working ourselves into a position in which we believe and say one thing and do another.

We have already been reminded this afternoon of how my right hon. Friend's predecessor said that the Government were committed to the child benefit system and that, subject to economic and other circumstances, child benefit would be uprated each year to maintain its value. The Government constantly remind us of the improvements in our economic circumstances, yet they are now cutting child benefit.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has more than once emphasised the value and importance of child benefit. Many times before today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has done likewise, yet the Government are increasing child benefit by only 2 per cent., in the face of an inflation rate of 7 per cent. Furthermore, they are doing that not just in the face of their former statements but in the face of a great deal of support from elsewhere for the maintenance of the level of child benefit.

The Child Poverty Action Group brief has been referred to. I find it extremely helpful. Among other things, it referred to the view of the Policy Studies Institute which, I think, is accepted to be a reasonably objective organisation. The institute has concluded that the most efficient mechanism for directing more help to poorer families is an increase in child benefit.

Again, we have been told that apparently no fewer than 38 voluntary organisations have written to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister complaining about a cut in child benefit. We have also been told about the recent MORI poll which showed that 75 per cent. of mothers said that child benefit was "essential" or "important" for providing for the needs of their children, and that 77 per cent. of mothers said that it was "essential" or "important" as a regular payment paid directly to them.

I received a letter today from the chairman of a committee in my constituency which represents numerous organisations. The lady wrote:

"The Committee are shocked at the proposed minimal rise in Child Benefit when compared with the rate of inflation and the increases to other similar benefits."

The lady expressed disgust in support of those whose families are struggling to survive on low incomes or unemployment benefit.

The views of the Conservative women's national committee have already been described, but it is important that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should remember them. That committee stated:

"We recommend that, as economic circumstances permit, child benefit is increased in line with increases in tax allowances or at least protected against rising prices."

The Government are doing neither. I know that my right hon. Friend has said that one-parent benefit will be increased by the full 7 per cent., that family income supplement will be increased by more than 7 per cent. to provide extra help—that is welcome—and that some other family benefits will be similarly improved. However, we have been informed that only 16 per cent. of the £175 million saved by not adjusting child benefit fully in line with inflation is being used to improve benefits for low-income families.

Thus, I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me for saying that I am a little perplexed. The Government position seems perverse in the face of their earlier commitments and in the face of public opinion. Their position even seems perverse in the face of the Government amendment which praises child benefit. Indeed, after my right hon. Friend's speech today the Government's position appears perverse in the light of his own remarks.

The amendment seems to suggest that the cause of the Government's proposals for uprating child benefit so inadequately is the Government's recent review of social security. That review has a great deal to commend it and it has a commitment to the continuation of child benefit, but it is only at the Green Paper stage. The Government should not anticipate the ultimate results of that until a new system is agreed by the House. The Government should maintain the best of what exists in our present social security system, and that includes a properly uprated child benefit.

6.2 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Like the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison), I am perplexed, and I think that the Government have taken a slightly perverse step in making this cut in the increase in child benefit.

I listened carefully to the Secretary of State. I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that the £2 billion increase in the budget, which is not an inconsiderable sum, was virtually a statutory duty, so the Secretary does not get many brownie points from me for making great play of that. The more I listened to the Secretary of State, the more I concluded that the reason why the child benefit increase was being cut was that the uprating forced upon the Government actually cost more than they had budgeted for.

There is a world of difference between saying that the cut was a policy change due to retargeting and redirection, and saying that the budget increase of £500 million—I believe that that was the Secretary of State's figure—had not been expected. I suspect that the real cause is the unexpected increase in the uprating figure over the budgeted figure.

Hon. Members should know what really happened. It is a curious coincidence that yesterday, a short time after the cuts in the increase in child benefit were announced, the Chancellor of the Exchequer reaffirmed his determination to get extra room for tax cuts. I do not follow the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) any further down that road, but there is enough evidence to make me suspicious of the Government's motives in failing fully to index the child benefit increase. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will follow my lead when we vote tonight.

How does the Minister intend to redeploy the resources saved? Is the figure provided by the Child Poverty Action Group correct, as quoted by the hon. Member for Oldham, West, that only 16 per cent. of the £175 million saving from child benefit is to be used to improve benefits for low-income families?

I welcome these changes. They are a step in the right direction. The Secretary of State will know that in the last Budget we took the very hard decision that where there were scarce resources there might be a case for increasing family income supplement so long as one could ensure that the take-up rate was increased. However, with reference to the figures provided by the CPAG, will only £17 million go to family income supplement and £12 million to housing benefit? What is the Government's reaction to that?

This move was not presaged in the newspapers. On the Sunday before the uprating some newspapers stated categorically that child benefit was safe. Something happened between Sunday and Tuesday, and I should very much like to know what that was. I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead that the significance of this debate is that it marks the divide in the House on the issue of child benefit, and I join him in deeply regretting that. The commitment that the Government are now giving is only to the universality of the benefit. Before this announcement everyone had assumed that the benefit would be price protected. If the Government's commitment is only to universality, that is a new situation which we shall all have to face.

The decision taken in 1980 by the then Secretary of State to reduce the real value of child benefit, which was put right just before the 1983 general election, enabled the Government to say that they were in favour of price protection and were committed to protect child benefit. That has now changed. There are forces within the Conservative party—not just the Conservative women's national committee — which have expressed strong opinions in the House on this issue.

We have not changed our view about the argument of child benefit versus tax allowances. The hon. Member for Devizes mentioned the Policy Studies Institute opinion. We believe that child benefit, as opposed to tax allowances, is a more discriminating and cost-effective way of helping families and a more effective way of concentrating on low-paid families in need. I do not want to consider tax allowances as an alternative to child benefit. Tax allowances give money to the higher paid as well as to the low-paid. We must remember that half a million working families with children will gain nothing from any increase in tax allowance because their income is below the tax threshold. DHSS figures show that 82 per cent. of those living below supplementary benefit level where the family has a full-time worker are families with children. There is also the important fact that child benefit is paid to the mother.

In my arguments about child benefit versus means-tested benefit I must agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West that the child benefit system is simple and relatively popular, which is in contrast to family income supplement. It is the budgeted take-up that is the problem. Some of the people who qualify for family income supplement qualify for levels of only 18p to 20p. That is also a real problem. Family income supplement has many problems which affect those earning just above supplementary benefit levels. Mothers are hardest hit because they do not get the money that they require to look after their children.

If family credit is paid through the pay packet, it will result in take-up problems and affect children. We need to be told whether the cut in the child benefit increase is to happen only once. The Secretary of State for Social Services said in answer to my intervention during his ststement on the uprating that judgments would have to be made in the light of circumstances. I understand that circumstances can change, but there is a world of difference between that and saying that child benefit will be the target of social security savings in future upratings.

6.10 pm

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Like the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), I am concerned that many benefits are not well targeted. Although unprecedented levels of taxation are being levied, those who are poor and in need are not being reached. However, I am not convinced that child benefit is the best way to redress the balance. It is a universal benefit. We have a gigantic merry-go-round, with money being collected by the Inland Revenue and transferred via the Treasury to the Department of Health and Social Security. The Department forwards the money to the Post Office, which distributes it, and about 70 per cent. of it goes back to the people from whom it was collected in the first place. The result is that insufficient money reaches those who are most in need. The administrative cost of this merry-go-round is £102 million a year. If one thinks of the total that is collected, that may not seem to be a large amount, but it is substantial. The blind would be glad to receive £102 million in the form of a blindness allowance.

Mr. Frank Field: Does the hon. Gentleman realise where this argument may lead him? Would he care to apply it to mortgage interest relief, where one finds the same recycling? Is there not a case for saying that that benefit ought to be phased out so that the rates of tax can be lowered and people may choose how to spend their money?

Mr. Butterfill: We cannot debate that subject tonight, but I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Those who are most in need, people on supplementary benefits, are unaffected by what is called a cut in child benefit, and those who qualify for family income supplement will do very well out of the new proposals.

If we strip away the rhetoric of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) we find that he is concerned not about the poor but about the pin money of middle-class housewives. It would be better to abolish child benefit, except for those who qualify for supplementary benefit or family income supplement. There should be tapered, child tax allowances for those who do not receive supplementary benefit or family income supplement. The level of benefit paid to the poor would be improved and the administrative savings would be substantial. That money could be used to greater affect elswhere. I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to consider that alternative.

No original ideas have been advanced from the Opposition Front Bench. I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Oldham, West did little more than quote verbatim from the compassionate but muddled brief that was circulated to hon. Members by the Child Poverty Action Group. His speech contrasted starkly with the thoughtful contribution of the hon. Member for Birkenhead and with the creative and compassionate approach of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, both in the Green Paper and in his speech.

6.15 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South West): I wonder whether the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) also apply to the old age pension. Does he think that old age pensions should be provided only for those with below-average incomes? Individuals should be looked at in terms of their life cycle. Before reaching working age we are provided for and cared for, at least in part, by the State, whether through the taxation system or the welfare system. After retirement, once again we receive the benefit of State support and encouragement. I remind hon. Members that, under the child tax allowance system, the more children people had the better off they were. As a Conservative, I do not support a system of that kind; nor do I support the undermining of child benefit.

Mr. Butterfill: I would remind my hon. Friend that I said that child tax allowances ought to be tapered.

Mrs. Bottomley: I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Field: But they are tapered the wrong way.

Mrs. Bottomley: The uprated allowance for an adult dependant is between £18 and £23 a week. The costs of a child, particularly a teenager, can be argued to be well above the costs of an adult dependant. Their nutritional needs, clothing needs and frequently their social needs are greater. Those needs must be fully recognised. I welcome the fact that family credit will take into account the age of children.

The key point about child benefit is its simplicity, reliability and regularity. When we look at the Green Paper and the uprating figures we see that endless categories of people are considered to be static groups: the disabled, the one-parent families, the unemployed. But the reality is that the lives of people are constantly changing. There are more one-parent families, but more people are getting remarried. Seven million people change their jobs every year, but 4 million people go from the unemployment register into work every year. The joy of child benefit is that a reliable, regular income is paid through thick and thin.

Hon. Members have no excuse for not appreciating the complexity of people's lives and the difficulties they get into over form filling, because our constituents attend our surgeries and ask us to try to make sense of the complexity of welfare benefits. As we have the greatest difficulty in understanding the benefits, it is hardly surprising that the most vulnerable members of our society do not understand what they are entitled to and how the system works. The joy of child benefit is that everybody, from the richest to the poorest in the land, knows that it is available and knows how to get it. Women frequently say that child benefit has helped them to keep going. It would be very sad if we ended the United Nations decade for women by undermining what has become their right and their expectation.

The debate on child benefit took place in International Women's Year. My right hon. Friend asked then whether the amount paid in child benefit could be entered on a man's pay slip. That does not happen, although my right hon. Friend is now the Secretary of State, so there may be greater difficulties about my suggestion than I appreciate. I recognise the difficulty created if a woman is obtaining a substantial amount of benefit but her husband feels that he is being heavily taxed — not realising where the money is going.

Another key advantage of child benefit is the maintenance of unit labour costs. We were reminded this week by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the importance of maintaining competitive labour costs. The sting comes from the man with several children who is probably better off out of work. The maintenance of child benefit is one way in which to help those people.

I am pleased that so many references have been made to the longstanding work of the Conservative women's national committee. I wish to refer to a different part of its proposals:

"We argue strongly that Child Benefit should have a high priority in our welfare system. Of all our social provisions it is remarkable, in that it has an almost universal take-up, is comparatively easy and cheap to administer and is paid directly in response to the need of children."

Like other hon. Members, I have received letters from constituents. One movingly states:

"It has been believed in good faith that this benefit would keep pace with inflation, but sadly this does not seem to be so any more. I realise that there are moves afoot to try to ease the plight of the low paid and unemployed, but there are those of us, who are just out of the supplementary benefit bracket, who find it very hard to make ends meet".

There are many other such women across the country.

I shall be supporting the Government tonight, but the child benefit lobby may have been lulled by the fact that child benefits were at record levels at the last general election. It may have been lulled in the short term, but when we look to the future I hope that the Government will realise that many of us are alive to and aware of child benefits and that we shall continue to fight for them.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Child benefit is a right. We were reminded today of when the Prime Minister said that it was evidence of the Government's commitment to the family. The Foreign Secretary has said that child benefit offers the greatest help to many of our poorest families. The Secretary of State for Social Services is on record as saying that child benefit was one of the most cost-effective ways of helping families with children and easing family poverty. Two years ago, just before the election, the Prime Minister said that there were no plans to change the basis on which child benefit is calculated. Indeed, before the 1979 election the then Conservative social services spokesman was prepared to say that he wanted child benefit to rise in line with tax allowances. That would have put child benefit up to £8 at this uprating. Before the last election, social services Ministers were prepared to say that they wanted to see child benefit consistently rise in line with inflation.

Given all that, it should be of serious concern to the House that the majority of Conservative Members—who have been prepared to lead a rebellion over student grants and to threaten a revolt over the situation affecting commercial ratepayers—are, with only a few notable exceptions, virtually silent over the Government's proposed cut in the value of child benefit, which comes on top of ending the automatic right to maternity benefit, a reduction in the value of widows' allowances and an end to the right to free school meals for a substantial section of the population.

What is worse, 500,000 children are living below the supplementary benefit payments level, and 3·75 million children are living on the fringes of poverty. Poverty among children, even on the Government's official figures, has doubled since 1979. Either one child in every four goes to school ill-clad and hungry, or parents must choose between heating and eating. It is therefore remarkable that the majority of Conservative Members have been silent as the Government have moved not from a period of consultation without information — the situation two weeks ago—but to implementation of the review proposals without consultation or information.

Conservative Members remain silent as 2 million people stand to lose housing benefit from November as a result of changes in the rates tapers. They are silent despite the fact that 500,000 people will lose housing benefit altogether, most of them pensioners. Although £29 million will go towards higher child additions for people on family income supplement and housing benefits, £175 million has been taken out of the child benefit budget without any assurance that child benefit will rise in line with inflation, or even at all, next year, the year after or in any year to come.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

As a new Member of Parliament, I have come to suspect three things. The first is a debtor who tells me that a cheque is in the post. The second is a Conservative who invites me to a debate on philosophy. The third is a Conservative Back Bencher who tells me that he is about to lead a revolt or rebellion. Whether it be the Tory wets, those who support the concept of one nation, or the Centre Forward group, which seems to have disappeared as the football season ended, Conservative Members by their silence are saying that they are prepared to tolerate a divided nation in preference to living with a divided Conservative party over the social security review proposals.

They are prepared to support a reduction in taxation in preference to a reduction in deprivation. The Chancellor yesterday made a commitment that he would reduce taxes no matter what happens. A 1p in the pound reduction in taxation will cost around £1 billion. Before Conservative Members support that commitment, they should remember that it will mean that 7 million households, most of them pensioner households, will lose some housing benefit; 7 million mothers and 12 million children will lose the increase in child benefit that they should receive; and the 7 million people who depend on supplementary benefit will cumulatively get less money as a result of the social security changes.

To save £1 billion to secure a 1p in the pound reduction in income tax, the Secretary of State for Social Services has had to abandon any claim that this is a nil-cost review. It is a cost-cutting review in housing and child benefits, and it will be a cost-cutting review in terms of supplementary benefit.

We know that the cost of raising a child is far greater than the child benefit payment and the supplementary benefit addition for children. All the recent evidence in the paper produced by the Child Poverty Action Group—other organisations have drawn attention to it as well—shows that at present child benefit can cover barely one fifth of the cost of bringing up a teenage child.

On this and previous occasions Conservative Members have asked, "Why should rich mothers get child benefit?" They ignore the fact that child benefit was originally designed as a benefit to be paid to the mother rather than the husband. If we move from the universal concept of child benefit by reducing its value and introduce further means tests, the big money savings will come not from debarring the claims of the rich but from deterring the claims of the poor. Conservative Members are saying that they are prepared to allow child benefit to be frozen, as the Government probably intend to do from next year. They are really saying——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham) rose——

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way.

Conservative Members are saying that it is too expensive to run a welfare state, particularly a family policy for children, without the stigma and shame attached to claiming means-tested benefits. They also tell us that family credit will do more for low-income families than child benefit. But how can we accept vague assurances about uncosted proposals for family credit, undisclosed benefit rates, an unknown number of beneficiaries and an unknowable impact on poverty when in their uprating statement last week the Government took away £175 million from child benefit and are to return only about £30 million to low-paid families? How can we accept any vague assurances from the Government about family credit when during the reviews they betrayed their promises on the state earnings-related pension scheme and widows' allowances? They have certainly betrayed the promise made by the Secretary of State at the outset, that these would be nil-cost reviews and that there would be no savings as a result.

Thirdly, Conservative Members tell us that they are prepared to support child benefit because it is simple, popular and easy to understand. They seem to forget that the main reason that we support rises in child benefit is that it is the most cost-effective, efficient and economical way of easing family poverty.

In addition to asking the Minister, as did the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), whether he can give an assurance that child benefit will not be frozen this year, may I ask him to confirm that, if one were to put the £1·5 billion which would ease the burden of family poverty into reducing taxation, that would help very few families substantially and none who are below the income tax level? It would help only those on one third average earnings by 60p a week, whereas child benefit could be doubled or at least raised by £6 which would help those on between half and one and a half times average earnings to the extent of £1·88 per week. An increase in child benefit of £6 per week would be a much more cost-effective way of expending the same amount of money to ease family poverty.

If the Government were serious about using the tax and benefits system to reduce family poverty and were not merely intending to cut taxes for the sake of it, without any consideration of the impact on poverty, they would propose to the House that, in preference to reducing the standard rate of income tax or raising tax thresholds the rate of child benefit should rise substantially.

I am not particularly concerned that the facts and figures which we have been expecting got lost on the way to the Cabinet or the printers. What worries me most is that the vision that inspired the Beveridge report and the commitment that has inspired previous Governments to act on family poverty is totally missing from any of the proposals and rhetoric contained in the reviews.

I urge Conservative Members to reconsider their decision on child benefit as well as on other benefits which have been attacked by the reviews. I urge the Government to use the period of consultation to listen not only to the Conservative women's national committee but to a whole series of non-political representative organisations. Not only are these organisations asking that child benefit be raised; they are pressing the Government with the claim that that is the most effective way of reducing family poverty.

6.32 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), I am one of the few Members who actually claim child benefit; I have my book in my handbag and am grateful for the £54·80 which we receive every month. It is a very valuable and useful addition to the Currie family budget. As in most of the other 7 million families in the country with their 12 million children, it is spent mostly on the children.

All the advantages of the child benefit system have been rehearsed tonight. It is payable to everyone, it is cheap to administer, and it costs 25p per payment, which is one tenth what a supplementary benefit payment costs to administer. There is a feeling of equity, that we are all the same and that we are all in the same boat.

But I think that those of us in the position of my hon. Friend and myself should have an uneasy feeling about it. If we are to criticise, as Opposition Members have, tax cuts to families which do not need them, we ought equally to criticise benefit payments to families which do not need them. I do not need the money. Seventy-five per cent. of all families are over the supplementary benefit line before they receive child benefit. Those families which are in need and in receipt of family income supplement and supplementary benefit do not get any benefit from the child benefit payment; it is simply taken into account when their needs are calculated, so they do not see it.

We should also be aware of how much money we are talking about. If we were to abolish child benefit—we are talking about £4·4 billion this year—we would need about £800 million to make up to the families receiving family income supplement and supplementary benefit the element accounted for by child benefit. That would leave about £3,500 million to play with for all the other families of the nation. What we could do with that is raise all tax thresholds by 18 per cent. or reduce the standard rate of income tax to 27 per cent., and that would benefit all those families as well.

Mr. Frank Field: It would do the exact opposite. What the hon. Lady proposes is to take money away from families and spread it throughout the nation, including that half of the nation which do not have children.

Mrs. Currie: There are all sorts of ways of doing this. I merely quote the figures to show hon. Members exactly how much money we are talking about, and what a big dent in the tax system child benefit makes.

The Government have decided to raise child benefit for lone parents by the rate of inflation, child benefit for family income supplement receivers by more than inflation and my child benefit by less. I happen to think that that is right. Seven pounds per week per child will still be very nice. I do not feel the agony of the Labour motion at not getting an additional 33p per week on top of my £7.

Quite honestly, I would rather see inflation fall, because a drop in inflation would be of more value not only to the receivers of child benefit but to everyone else in the nation; more than almost anything else that we could propose.

The Labour motion talks about breach of promise. I always thought that breach of promise was one of those very difficult things to prove in court and that the evidence that would be produced by the defendant would often point to the rather sleazy background of the plaintiff. If I may have the permission of the House, that is exactly what I propose to do.

I asked the Library to produce for us the figures on the real value of the combined child benefit and child tax relief that we used to have before 1978, and it produced figures that go back to 1946. The support for a one-child family in August 1946 amounted, in November 1984 prices, to £5·28. In April 1951, the figure, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) quoted it, was £6·56. In 1956, it was £6·46, and so on. Then we get to the last Labour Government. In 1976, it was £4·72, quite a drop. Now we come to our Government. Last year, it was £6·82 and this year it is £6·85. The only years—and I am quoting—in which the child support in real terms was higher than November 1984 were in April 1952 under a Tory Government and in April 1955 under a Tory Government.

If it comes to having a go at a particular Government's policy on child benefit, the Labour party does not have a leg to stand on. If it comes to breach of promise, the Labour party bride is rolling up to the altar in the emperor's clothes, and it is a rather embarrassing sight.

As for Labour's own policy, that has already been dealt with to some extent very ably by my right hon. and hon. Friends. I think that it is worth pointing out two small points in the time available to me. The hon. Member for Oldham, West for about three days in April, managed to propose, before his other right hon. and hon. Friends got to him, that Labour should double the child benefit for most of us and treble the child benefit to children of single-parent families. To pay for all this, the married man's tax allowance would be abolished and the additional single person's tax allowance would disappear. On top of that, fewer people would be eligible for family income supplement, fewer people would be eligible for free prescriptions and fewer children would get free school meals. That was in all those proposals. That is quite an exciting suggestion—it is a good job that it was thrown out.

On top of that, the hon. Gentleman clearly said—I quote from his document on page 17—that he would have "an amalgamated National Insurance and Incomes Acts levied on a progressive basis on all personal income at rates of 15 per cent., 30 per cent., 45 per cent. and 60 per cent."

As I understand it, that would be a tax on child benefit, and it also means that he would tax the lower income groups at 15 per cent. In the Standing Committee on the Social Security Bill, on which I served, we cut the rate of national insurance contribution for the lowest-paid workers to 5 per cent., so the Labour party proposals would tax the lowest paid workers three times as much as we would in order to do that.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West is quoted in The Guardian of 16 April this year as saying that "his main aim was to abolish the degrading supplementary benefit system which he described as 'a fraud'."

Up in Derbyshire, we say that it takes one to know one, but it would be both unparliamentary and very unkind of me to direct a remark of that nature to the hon. Gentleman, who is not even listening.

My other main criticism of the motion refers to the question of mothers being the recipients. I have no desire to change the system, because I think that changing it would simply be change for change's sake, but I should like to challenge some of the underlying attitudes and at the same time to say that I find these attitudes on both sides of the House.

Sixty per cent. of all women of working age work. We make up to 41 per cent. of the workforce, and the percentage is growing. The household with the man as the sole earner and the woman at home with two children is very rare. Such households make up only 5 per cent. of all households. Most mothers now work. Many mothers are now taxpayers. It is patronising, wrong and out of date to suggest that we are not interested in tax cuts. Of course we are interested in them. Many working mothers will benefit more than their husbands from raising tax thresholds, because it is a common practice for many mothers to work up to the rate at which they start paying tax, and no further. If we raise that rate, they will be able to earn more money. That point should be put across firmly.

As to the notion that the cash handout should go to the mother because she looks after the children, I have to say that I think that parents look after the children. We should not perpetuate the idea that children need only their mother and that only the mother is capable of taking that responsibility. That is nonsense. That sort of philosophy, borne of feminism, has created far too many single-parent families and deprived far too many men of their children.

The child benefit system has none of the special qualities attributed to it by hon. Members. It is merely the redistribution of £4·4 billion a year. It comes from tax-paying pensioners. It comes from my constituents who pay VAT on their fish and chips or on the porch to go on their houses. The child benefit system competes with the other services that we would like—for example, the National Health Service, pensions, good roads and education. Child benefit goes to the mother of every child—not where there is a need but where there is a child, whether living in a castle or a hovel. We keep it because the British people want it. The Government's sensitive and generous approach deserves our support.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): In this debate we must first re-emphasise that child benefit must be considered not in isolation but in conjunction with family income supplement and benefits paid to the poorer families in general. It is appropriate and sensible that we are going forward in the proposed upratings with a system that substantially increases family income supplement and thus directs more money to those in need.

I accept the worries that have been expressed about the poor take-up of family income supplement. Because of this poor take-up, I supported the changes in the Green Paper with respect to family credit. This is a much better approach towards providing special assistance for the poor and general support for children.

I very much respect the remarks made on many occasions in debates such as this by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), but I was slightly surprised today by some of his comments. If I understood him correctly, he said that it would be possible to tax child benefit and that this would have a significant impact on families with a number of children which were caught in the poverty trap. I do not believe that that is true. Having looked at the figures in detail, I believe that the introduction of a tax on child benefit would effectively reduce the level of pay at which low-wage families would be subjected to tax. That would have an adverse effect.

The only way to cope satisfactorily with the problem would be to introduce a child allowance system or low tax threshold system for families with children. If that were done, one might be able to pursue the type of idea that is put forward by the hon. Member for Birkenhead and a number of my colleagues. If that were not done, the measure would have a damaging effect on low-income families with several children in terms of the poverty trap and the level of their take-home pay after wage increases. I have great reservations about that change.

It is important that we do not consider any one benefit in isolation and that we welcome the substantial increase in family income supplement and the help that it will give to those most in need.

6.45 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The debate has revealed a wide range of views, but it has singularly failed to throw the slightest additional light of any kind on the policies that the Labour party is urging on the House. One aspect about the Labour party that has become clearer during the debate is——

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): The Minister is already accepting that we will form the next Government. He has put up the white flag.

Mr. Newton: I should like to say to the hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Give the Minister a chance; he has only been up one minute.

Mr. Boyes: That is too long.

Mr. Newton: It is all right. The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) is not a bad bloke. I do not mind dealing with him. I am treating the Labour party with at least the respect that one would give those who presumably wish to become the Government. The only way in which the Labour party will have the slightest chance of becoming the Government—it is a very slight chance—is for it to have some type of policy. I want to know when we will be given the slightest sign of that policy. We learnt just one thing during the past two and a half hours about the Labour party—the Labour party's interest in child benefit is three deep. That is the number of Labour Members who were here to hear the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) when he started his speech. Three Labour party Members were here to hear this great assault on the Government's social security policy, and one them left during the first paragraph! Frankly, he did not miss a thing.

I shall deal with some of the criticisms of the proposals in last week's uprating statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It is right that I should repeat what he said. These proposals are in the context of an uprating which spent an additional £2 billion on social security benefits, taking it to a total of £42 billion, which represents one pound in every three of the money that is raised from taxpayers and contributors in taxation and contributions. It is worth my saying again that the uprating included an increase of £4 a week for married pensioner couples. This means that the pension of a married couple and, indeed, of all retirement pensioners will have risen by 96 per cent. between the time when the Conservative party took office and November 1985, compared with a rise of 86 per cent —10 per cent. more than the expected increase—in prices during the same period. Last week's uprating statement included a range of measures to help less well-off families, especially those with children in work.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West make some play of the figures relating to the complicated inter-relationship between family income supplement, supplementary benefit and child's needs allowances in housing benefit. I have no hesitation in accepting, first, that that relationship is complicated and, secondly, that it makes it difficult for Governments — whatever their colour — to achieve rational results with their policies. In the social security review we have put forward the first coherent structure in 50 years for income-related benefits to enable us to target resources more effectively.

Even with those problems and the kinks that inevitably occur within the present complicated and incoherent system, a married couple with two children aged 4 and 6, and whose gross earnings are £60 will get an increase in the family income supplement of £1, an increase in housing benefit of 53p and, even allowing for the fact that they will not be receiving the 70p of child benefit represented by the 35p — the difference between its uprating and the full prices figure—they will be better off by 83p net a week. The same would be true for the same family on £80 a week, and it would be 1p less for that family on £100 a week. For a married couple, with two children aged 12 and 14, on exactly the same basis, allowing for the fact that child benefit has gone up by 15p, and not 50p, there will still be, for the £60 a week couple, a net increase of £1·50 over and above what they would otherwise have received; for those on £80 a week an increase of £1·50; and for those on £100 a week an increase of £1·40.

Of course I accept that this is subject to problems of take-up, just as it is subject to problems of complication, but that is why the Government are seeking in the social security review to achieve a simpler, fairer, more understandable and more readily receivable social security system. The fact that we have problems at the moment which the Government are trying to tackle strategically does not give cause for accusation, because we are trying at least to do what we can to help less well-off families within the existing benefits structure.

I make no apologies whatever for that or for the fact that only a few months ago, in my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget, changes in national insurance contributions were announced which will benefit most of those self-same families by a significant additional £1 or £2 a week. In the last three months we have probably seen the announcement of the most significant extra package of help to low-paid families with children that any Government have introduced for several years.

Mr. Frank Field: The Minister has talked about the Government making strategic decisions. Until the announcement last week, the Government had increased child benefit in line with rising prices. They did not do so this year. Is that the policy from now on, or was this a one-off decision just for this year?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman asked that question in the course of his speech, and I would have answered it later. The Government's position on the uprating of child benefit is, as it has always been, and as it was stated by my right hon. Friend some time ago, that inescapably this is a matter, like many others in social security, on which we have to make judgments when the decisions are taken in the light of all the circumstances prevailing and of particular social priorities — in this case our desire to steer additional help to less well-off families with children.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister give the Government's strategic response to the universality of child benefit? Can he go as far as to say that he would interfere with that, if he cannot give the assurance for which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) is asking?

Mr. Newton: The Green Paper makes it clear, as we have made it clear on a number of occasions, that the Government adhere to the concept of a universal child benefit payable through the mother. I hope that that will be some reassurance to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) as well. There is no question of departing from that principle, and that is made very clear in the Green Paper.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister confirm that the Government have now abandoned any pretence that child benefit will continue to rise in line with inflation in future years? Secondly, will he tell us whether, if that decision is made, the £175 million saved this year and the perhaps £500 million saved by the time of the next general election will go to the family credit scheme, or will only a small fraction of it go, as happened last week, to improving family income supplement?

Mr. Newton: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman means by using the word "pretence" in this context. I have made the position absolutely clear — that the Government will make judgments about the proper level of child benefit in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time when those decisions have to be made, taking account of other social priorities, including our particular wish to direct more help more effectively to families with children.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the Minister accept that the answer that he has given is clear and that it is a major change in the stance that every other Conservative spokesman has taken on this issue?

Mr. Newton: I do not think that it is a major change, with the significance with which the hon. Gentleman has sought to invest it. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin), my right hon. Friend's predecessor, made it clear in the statement that has been quoted several times today that the Government's decision in this matter would necessarily be related to economic and other circumstances. Those other circumstances necessarily include judgments about the overall priorities of the social security budget and are particularly concerned with low-paid families in work, on which I placed a good deal of emphasis.

I have said that I think that the hon. Member for Oldham, West did rather less than justice to the Government's proposals represented in the uprating statement. Perhaps that was understandable, since he did even less justice to his own proposals and to the thoughts that he has put, not just before the House, but before the country as a whole.

Perhaps I might have the attention of the hon. Member for Oldham, West for a moment or two, because I am anxious to regale the House with his words on "Newsnight" on 18 June. Indeed, as he said earlier in the debate, I was taking part in the programme with him. He said:

> "We do need a better integration between income tax and the social security system, but based on an income tax system which is graded in its structure so that the lowest paid are either out of tax altogether or they pay a low rate of 15 per cent. and above that 30, 45 or 60 per cent.
> If you had that you could pay universal benefit like child benefit to everyone but then concentrate it on those in greatest need without a means test by taxing it, and that would be a far better way of ensuring that we retain universality but at the same time concentrate it on those who really need it."

When he was challenged by my right hon. Friend about this notion of taxing child benefit—which I must say the Child Poverty Action Group considers to be just as much an attack on child benefit as anything that the present Government have done—the hon. Gentleman said that what he had in mind was a different structure of taxation. Now, however, as we have learnt from his green—or whatever colour it was—paper, which has disappeared into some pigeon-hole somewhere, the hon. Gentleman's idea of a new structure of taxation appears to be one in which everybody right down to the bottom of the income range pays at least 15 per cent. income tax — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Well, what else does it mean? It says that the lowest payers are either out of tax altogether or pay a low rate of 15 per cent. Let the hon. Gentleman tell me what he means.

Mr. Meacher: It is obvious.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman does not know what it means. The one thing that has encouraged me in the debates on this issue over the past few weeks is that there is at least one thing in common between the Opposition Front Bench spokesman on social security and the Leader of the Opposition, who is unhappily absent,and that is that neither of them understands half the things that he says in the House. The hon. Gentleman has clearly signalled that it is his intention, in some way or another, to tax child benefit, whether at 15 per cent. or 30 per cent., in the hands of very large numbers of people. There is no way that that structure will work without substantial numbers of the families whom the hon. Gentleman is claiming to protect having effectively a 30 per cent. or 15 per cent. cut in their child benefit in the form of a major raising of the tax threshold for the person earning the salary.

I hope that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) will reflect that any such variants of taxing child benefit lead instantly and automatically to a substantial reduction in take-home pay for every family man who is a wage or salary earner. It is not, therefore, a sensible proposal.

Whether that is recognised through the tax or benefits system, or in what combination and at what level, are matters for debate about child benefit. In our system, it is recognised by universal child benefit paid to the mother, and we believe that that should continue, although it does not follow that its relationship with other benefits is immutable or that the Government can escape the need to make judgments from time to time.

Our judgment this year is that it is reasonable to make an increase of 15p for everyone and to give extra help to less well-off families through FIS and housing benefit. That is a judgment for which we do not apologise and which, I believe, the House as a whole will back.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House endorses the Government's commitment to maintain Child Benefit as a universal benefit paid to all mothers as a contribution to the cost of bringing up children; notes that an additional £2 billion will be spent on benefits as a result of the uprating in November; welcomes the additional help that will be provided for low income families with children and welcomes the proposals for a simpler and more effective benefit structure which will result from the Government's recent review.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Speaker: I have to inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.13 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the Government's record on Housing Benefit which brought administrative chaos when it was introduced and has since been repeatedly cut with the result that pensioners and poorer families have been deprived of essential help with housing costs; and opposes further proposals in the social security reviews which would bring further cuts and greater poverty.

The history of housing benefit has been one of the most extraordinary — and that is saying something — in the lifetime of this Government. The Government have been warned consistently about the structure of the benefit itself and about the problems created by the timing of the changes that they propose. Consistently, the Government have ignored the warnings and now, in their amendment, they blandly try to take credit for simplifying the system that they introduced. I shall look first at the proposals that the Government have laid before us and then briefly at their record in this area.

Housing benefit highlights the absurdity of the Government's pretence in the Green Paper, that no figures are available for the changes that they have discussed. Not only have examples been given of a joint taper of 70 per cent. that might be proposed, but we have been told what losses or cuts the Government expect to make from their housing benefit proposals. They expect to save some £500 million.

On the basis of the 70 per cent. example given in the Green Paper, I understand that a pensioner couple on about £75 a week would lose the whole of their present rebate of almost £5. Similarly, a married couple with two children on £110 a week, which is not a large sum by anybody's standards, would also lose all or most of their present rebate, again of almost £5. Those are substantial sums for people on such incomes, particularly for those who are trying to raise children.

One of the first things that we hope to hear from the Government in the debate is whether those figures are accurate and how great the damage to claimants will be. The Government know that they will save £500 million but they claim that they do not know who will contribute to the savings. They do not know how they will contribute to the savings or how much each particular group will lose in order to make that contribution. My first quesion is: is there any further titbit of information that the Under-Secretary can give us about the numbers of gainers and losers? If not, why not? If not, the unworthy thought occurs to us that it may be because of the contrast between the review team's proposals and those of the Government, and perhaps more because of the effects of the review team's proposals.

In the recommendations from the carefully selected group that carried out the review, we were told that about one third of those who get housing benefits would lose, although about one quarter — a smaller, but still substantial, number — might gain. However, when the review team suggested that there might be somewhat more losers than gainers, and that that was the order of magnitude, it was on the basis that the same money would be available from the scheme as a whole, and that there would be separate rent and rates tapers. Even with those provisos, the review team identified losses for what was reckoned to be 3 million people who now receive housing benefits.

The Government are not making the same proposals. They are proposing not nil-cost changes, but changes that will save at least £500 million. Nor are the Government proposing separate rent and rates tapers—they are going for a joint taper. On rebates alone, it looks as if the Government's proposals will mean losses for 5 million people. On rent and rate rebates, it looks likely that about 7 million people will suffer losses in their housing benefit.

If those figures are incorrect, we should be happy to learn from the Minister what the real figures are, but the Government's reluctance so far to give us any information makes us suspect that those figures may be accurate. Of the 5 million to 7 million people who will lose benefit, it has been estimated that between 1 million and almost 2 million will lose all entitlement to any housing benefit.

That brings me to the second question that I should like to ask the Minister, which is in two parts. First, I noticed that on Monday his hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security said in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) that the £500 million savings that the Government hope to gain may be drawn over a period. The first thing that we want to know is, what period?

Secondly, what we should most like to know is whether the £500 million savings quoted by the Secretary of State include the savings from the proposal that claimants pay at least 20 per cent. of their rates. It has been estimated that taking 20 per cent. of rates from claimants would bring in some £250 million. If that is part of the £500 million, we accept that it is a substantial part of it, although we would argue that it is an unjust proposal. However, if it is not part of the £500 million, it means that we are talking about savings of some £750 million, an increase of 50 per cent. on the savings that the Government have admitted, so far, that they wish to make.

We are talking about enormous sums—more than the Government have already saved in the many cuts that they have made in housing benefit in the past couple of years. The savings through the 20 per cent. of rates proposal will be more than the Chancellor tried to cut from housing benefit in July 1983, just after a general election campaign in which he told us how terrific our economic performance was, and that roses and gaiety were around the corner. Sadly, only a month or so later, he had to introduce cuts in housing benefit. We are talking about even greater cuts than those.

These large savings do not result from the recommendations of the Government's review body, and this applies particularly to the proposal to take 20 per cent. "at least", to use the Government's phraseology, in rates. The review body said:

"100 per cent. help with housing costs for those on the lowest incomes is the only fair way of meeting their needs within the present vagaries of the housing market."

We wholeheartedly support that view.

We know that the Government intend to remove help with water rates while at the same time, with another hat on, they are forcing up the water rates. Is there any intention to offer any recompense to those claimants who will be asked to pay 20 per cent. of their rates, even at the level of the rough justice of an average figure, which will be disadvantageous to those in areas with high rates?

Apart from the proposals to take 20 per cent. of rates from claimants, we also oppose the severity of the proposed rate taper. Here, both the Government and the review team are guilty of peculiar logic. In the phrase much beloved of the Government, they say that the rate taper goes too far up the income scale. Their justification for that is that it goes further up the income scale than the rate taper. However, the only reason for that is the Government's cuts in April 1983, April 1984 and November 1984. They have used the cuts that they made to justify further cuts in the rate taper.

The proposal for such a combined sharp taper will hit most the least well off owner-occupiers who get help only with their rates, and who so often figure among those groups for whom the Government claim to have concern. Again, the Government and the review team part company. The review team proposed to sharpen the rates taper. Although we question its logic in doing so, it also proposed that some form of what one could call rent rebate —in other words, some other help—should be available to all owner-occupiers, so that the impact of the reduced rate rebate that it proposed would have been diminished. Characteristically, the Government have taken the proposal for cuts and left out the proposal for improvement. Once again, one of their hand-picked review teams has gone too far and been too generous for the Government's liking.

It seems that the Government may further restrict the entitlement of those on supplementary benefit for help with mortgages, although they must be aware that that is bound to lead to an increase in the number of evictions. I understand that the number of people in serious arrears, which was running at 8,400 in 1979, rose to 29,000 last year. That is under a Government who claim to be devoted to encouraging owner-occupation. Proposals such as those that the Government are making can only lead to these figures rising, and to increases in evictions.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is it not a fact that in 1984, according to building society figures, there were 11,000 repossessions? A number of those people will find themselves on the homeless lists, and a number will come under board and lodgings regulations. The Government had to admit this week that they had got those regulations wrong. Is there not a strong possibility that they have also got this proposal wrong?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is correct, and it is an unfortunate feature of the Government's housing and social security policies that they continually create conditions of whose affects they then complain.

Another action proposed by the Government that will create substantial disadvantages is the proposal to remove from local authorities the discretion they have to give greater help to particular groups. As local authorities seem mostly to exercise, that discretion to the benefit of groups such as widows and war pensioners, about whom the Government claim to be concerned, this is a strange proposal for the Government to introduce. How many gainers and losers will there be from the proposals to remove that discretion from local authorities?

How many gainers and losers are there likely to be from the effects of removing the extra help available for those in high-rent areas? I seem to recall that last March, when we were discussing the changes that the Government were then making in the proposals for high rents, some 120,000 people were being affected. Presumably, those people are likely to be affected, all of them for the worse, by the Government's proposals and in some areas undoubtedly substantial sums could be involved for the individuals who will be affected.

All these proposals are particularly disgraceful because they follow the removal of the Government's general subsidy, which has forced up rents. We are horrified and appalled at the thought that the Government are likely to try to take as much as £500 million from housing benefit. Since 1979, they have already taken about £1,300 million from general subsidies for housing and councils' housing revenue accounts. This follows the pattern identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes).

When the Government began this process of cutting the general subsidy to housing accounts, they gave reasons that may sound remarkably familiar. They said that it was better to cut the general subsidy because then they would be able to target help on the poorest through housing benefit. Having cut the general subsidy, and increased rents so that more people were forced to draw housing benefit, they then forgot about targeting help on the poorest, and said that, as too many people were claiming housing benefit, that would be cut.

In these circumstances, it is no wonder that not only the Labour party but all who are on benefits regard the Government's talk about targeting and efficiency with considerable cynicism. They know that targeting and efficiency may be the buzz words for cuts this year, but next year and the year after the Government will have different buzz words, although they will be pursuing the same policy.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Does the hon. Lady concede that the purpose of social benefit is to help those in most need and that therefore targeting is worth while if the system is to be effective?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman has fallen prey to a delusion common to Conservative Members. The words he used, and the description he gave, have been given for every mean-minded poor law system since time began. The idea of the welfare state is not what the hon. Gentleman identifies.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Lady is ducking the question.

Mrs. Beckett: I am not ducking the question. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not understand, because the policies of his Government show every sign not only of a lack of understanding but of their wish to destroy the welfare state. The whole point of the welfare state is that it is for everybody—everybody pays as much as he can when he can, and everybody should have the right to draw when he has a need. That is what the welfare state is about, and it is because it is about everybody being able to draw to the extent that he needs when he has need that it is more expensive. The welfare state is not just for the poorest.

Surely the Government are not claiming that, under them, anybody who has need can draw benefit. Over 1 million people have lost entitlement to housing benefit since 1983. These people had need and were drawing benefit and they have lost the money only because the Government have made cuts so that they could give more away in tax handouts to the wealthy. If the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) does not understand that, he does not understand the welfare state.

Mr. Gale: Answer the question.

Mrs. Beckett: I have answered the question. The hon. Gentleman does not understand anything about the welfare state or the reasons why most people attach such value to it. Fortunately, it is a loss that will cost him and his party dear.

Over the past couple of years, the Government have taken 1 million people out of housing benefit entitlement. The numbers of claimants have grown only because of the failure of the Government's economic and housing policies — a failure that, characteristically, they blame on everybody but themselves. However, the penalty for that failure they exact from claimants. The Government's proposals are also likely to cause problems for local authorities.

The subsidies for housing benefit, now 100 per cent., though less in some cases, will be cut to 80 per cent. From what we can discover — the Government give no justification — this is an arbitrary figure. As I am sure the Minister is aware, local authorities believe that this will mean substantial cuts in the sums made available to them. Will local authorities lose money, because of the change in the subsidy offered to them? If so, what is the justification?

Local authorities will lose the 60 per cent. grant that they were given towards the cost of administering the scheme—yet another flagrant breach of an undertaking which the Government gave only a couple of years ago, when the scheme was introduced. This is another extraordinary example of how the Government are proceeding. In the same Green Paper, the Government have reduced the money local authorities receive in subsidies for administration and they have had the cheek to say that claimants have got to pay at least 20 per cent. of rates to encourage them to press authorities to reduce the costs that the Government have just increased by the proposed administrative changes. Not the least of these is the burden of collecting the 20 per cent. deduction from, I understand, some 2·5 million households. The Government then have the unmitigated gall to tell local authorities that they are reducing this 60 per cent. subsidy, not—perish the thought—just to save money, but to "provide a greater incentive to local authorities to contain costs and improve efficiency".

The local authorities are less than amused by the gall of the Government. Local authorities never wanted the housing benefits scheme as it was introduced, and they have consistently told the Government that they have not been allowed enough time or enough funds to run the scheme properly. The permanent secretary to the Minister's Department admitted that to the House recently. The Government have now taken the subsidy away from the local authorities, they say to encourage local authorities to improve efficiency. This is similar to the nonsense that we heard about the National Health Service, and it is equally unwelcome.

The justification which is continually cited for cutting housing benefit is that benefit is paid too far up the income scale. May I remind the Minister again—we cannot get this on record too often — that, for those who pay average rents, all entitlement to benefit for a two-child family is lost at more than £40 below average national wages. Those who live in areas where rents are higher have had rents forced up, but they receive housing benefit above that level, perhaps even up to average wages. I assure the Minister that those people would be only too pleased if the Government were to restore the housing subsidies cut so that their rents could be cut and hence there was no need for them to claim housing benefit, only to be abused by the Government for doing so.

We condemn the effects of the proposals in the Green Paper. We find it outrageous that the proposals are put before us in the Green Paper while we are in the middle of a consultation period — a consultation period of a whole four months. That was not excessive, one might have thought, for—what was it?—the most fundamental review since Beverage. But four months is too long for this Government to wait for their policies to come to the House to take effect.

The changes which the Government have proposed in the uprating—it may be an uprating in some benefits but the term is not justified for housing benefit—make exactly the same kind of reductions in rate support that are proposed in the Green Paper, or at least in some of the proposals. It is proposed in the Green Paper to reduce the rates taper to 21 per cent. on net income. However, in the November upratings, when the Government make the rate taper 13 per cent. on gross income, they will carry out the policy which they put forward for consultation in the Green Paper. That is one of the most controversial changes that they have put forward in terms of housing benefit. It is the change that bears hardest on owner-occupiers and it is likely to bear hardest on pensioner owner-occupiers. It was introduced in June, two weeks after the Green Paper, without any opportunity for consultation or reply.

I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm my figures. About 2 million households will lose money from the housing benefit changes and about 500,000 again will lose all entitlement to housing benefit. There is no need for those changes as part of the uprating because, in the scheme that preceded housing benefit, changes and tapers were not made customarily. In this case, they are merely yet another aspect of the Government's desire to make cuts.

I believe that a pensioner couple who are paying £5 in rates a week can now get rate rebate on an income of up to £95 a week but that, from November, under the uprating of which the Secretary of State spoke so warmly today, they will cease to qualify for housing benefit on a gross income of £85 a week—£10 a week less. Many of those who are affected by these latest proposals are the same people who have lost rebates in every cut that the Government have made in the few months since the scheme was introduced, but this cut will be the steepest so far.

I notice—I ought to say this to save the Minister the trouble—that there are some small improvements in the housing benefit scheme. The Minister of State claimed credit for the increase in the dependent child addition, in response to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). We occasionally give the Government the odd cheer, or perhaps even two cheers, but I do not think that the Government deserve even half a cheer for that. We are singularly bored with giving the Government any cheers for the increase in the child addition, as this is the third time that it has been before the House. They give the addition, postpone it, take it away altogether and then decide to give it again. Every time they say that they will increase the child addition, they expect a fresh round of applause. Not tonight, I am afraid. That behaviour is typical of the Government's approach to housing benefit, which befits the short title of the party to which they belong—it is a con.

We all know that the Government have made massive cuts in the sums available for housing support, whether through general housing subsidy or, once they managed to cut that, through housing benefit, which many families were forced to take in its place. They know, as do we, that pensioners and less well-off families are bearing the burden of cuts in housing support, but the Government merely increase the burden still more, complain about those who are still able to claim benefits and expect to be congratulated on their compassion.

The housing benefit scheme shows up the Government's incompetence and callousness. The cuts that they are proposing in the November uprating and in the Green Paper will, I am afraid, inflict further damage on claimants. The only advantage is that the cuts may inflict so much damage that they will help us to remove the Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof,

"welcomes the Government's objective of securing a structure of income-related benefit which will ensure greater equality of help with housing costs for people at the same level of income, whether in or out of work, will remove the need for housing benefit supplement and will be simpler for staff to administer and for claimants to understand.".

After the hysteria of the technique of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), it is something of a relief to have the rather more controlled approach of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). Although the difference is welcome, the basic song is the same. We have the same cries against change—any sort. Indeed, at one point, the hon. Lady seemed to be against the change from the original scheme which failed in the 1970s — the dual scheme of rates and rents and the complications between the Department of Health and Social Security and local authorities. It was a system that the whole of society interested in these matters, including the Supplementary Benefits Commission, thought desperately in need of change. The hon. Lady and her colleagues seem prone to harking back to what they regard as halcyon days.

We also heard the usual rigmarole about cuts in the social security programme. My right hon. Friend reminded the House that, following his uprating that was announced 10 days ago, the social security programme will now run at £42 billion a year. There are significant increases in all major benefits, taking into account the large increase in the number of beneficiaries, who include the unemployed and the 800,000 retirement pensioners. In spite of that, the hon. Lady talks about cuts and the record returns to the familiar topic of destroying the welfare state.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the Minister confirm that last week's uprating statement and the parliamentary answers that I have received mean that 2 million people will lose cash as a result of the housing benefit changes, and that 460,000 people will be taken off housing benefit altogether for savings of slightly more than £50 million? Will he tell the House how many people will lose cash, and how many will lose housing benefit to enable the Government to achieve their planned savings of £500 million?

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman happily makes the point that I am coming to. Opposition Members seem to think that the rates and coverage of every single benefit must be frozen in aspic, except that benefit must always increase. They pay no attention to the real rate of increase in the amount of public money that is devoted to the social security fund.

The hon. Lady follows the leading Labour spokesman on social security in offering no Labour policy, and in simply producing a list of negatives, all of which are ill-founded. We have had a classic demonstration from the hon. Members for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) and for Derby, South that whatever the level, and whether or not the benefit is rising, they would continue to pay benefit money and be irresponsible about the effect of that on the Exchequer.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that he may be being slightly unfair to the Opposition in saying that they have no policy in this area because their policy in at least part of this area was announced on Monday when they told us that they intended to abolish our board and lodging measure altogether by bringing it within rent control?

Mr. Whitney: My hon. Friend is following the Opposition's announcements closely, and one must keep at them to understand what their policy is. Earlier this evening we explored the fate of the policies announced by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), which were quickly jettisoned by his colleagues.

Clearly, the Government would never lightly reduce any of the benefits that we pay. We clearly understand that we are dealing with the lowest income groups and the poorest sections of society and, as will be observed and as has been demonstrated in the uprating statement which my right hon. Friend announced 10 days ago, all those changes are carefully cushioned. In our budget we have protected all the rates, and housing benefit has doubled in real terms while we have been in office. It now covers not 5·5 million, but 7·5 million people, yet the Opposition continually talk about cuts.

Even after the change in the rates taper to 13 per cent., more than 7 million people will continue to receive housing benefit—more than one household in three. If we take the Opposition at their word, we understand that they will be completely content to allow that sort of spending to continue to increase.

The figures that we were offered recently suggested that this year, in addition to 7·5 million people on housing benefit, there would be a further 300,000. That sort of expansion, both in the amount of expenditure and in the increase in the case load, would be unjustified. We have only to make comparisons with other overseas societies which are wealthier than we are, to see that no system compares in any way with the scope, range and expense of our housing benefit system.

Our aim is to give help where it is needed. Unlike the hon. Lady, we are not confused about precisely what that means. We understand what targeting means and give help where the need is found, but the hon. Lady clearly found that question uncomfortable and carefully ducked it.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I am confused by the case that the hon. Gentleman is presenting to the House. Am I right in thinking that the Government claim credit for having increased the sum paid in housing benefit until now, but that at this stage they are cutting that sum? That contrasts vividly with their policy on mortgage interest tax relief, which continues to increase by leaps and bounds.

Mr. Whitney: In a budget of the enormous size of the social security budget, judgments must be made when that budget is increasing at the rate that it is in this particular sector. It makes sense to make adjustments from time to time. Retargeting is the only responsible policy, which is what we would expect from the Government.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Whitney: I shall not give way. The hon. Member for Birkenhead asked me two points, and I should like now to deal with mortgage interest tax relief. I would be interested to know the attitude of the Labour party on that matter. Clearly we make no apology for recognising the importance of home ownership. Certainly, it seems that many Opposition Front Bench Members have come to understand that the British people value that policy. Opposition spokesmen are now seeking late in the day to follow us in our policy of home ownership for council tenants. When the hon. Member for Oldham, West suggested the abolition of mortgage interest tax relief, it took only hours before that policy was squashed.

We recognise that a balance must be struck. The aim of our social security policy is to produce help where it is needed. The housing benefit system, as it has developed, does not achieve that aim effectively. It is cumbersome, inefficient——

Mr. Field: It is the Conservative party's scheme.

Mr. Whitney: Yes, it is our scheme, and we are improving it. The existing scheme was an improvement on what went before. It appears that the hon. Member for Derby, South hankers after what went before.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): When the Minister says that the Government are improving the scheme, does he mean that it is acceptable to reduce the numbers of claimants of housing benefit by 400,000 in 1983, 500,000 in 1984, and a further 500,000 in 1985? Is that what he means by improving the system?

Mr. Whitby: We mean precisely what I have said. If it is necessary, I shall repeat what we mean for the third time. We must ensure that the large sums that we are spending in the social security programme as a whole, and certainly on housing benefit, are carefully directed. Even with the change announced 10 days ago by my right hon. Friend, we are talking of a benefit which goes to more than one household in three—to more than 7 million people. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to spread the jam more thinly and higher up the income scale, I should be interested to see his figures, as, I am sure, would the voters.

Mr. Gordon Brown rose——

Mr. Whitney: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman, and I must make progress.

Therefore, we seek to make improvements in the scheme. We recognise that while it has had successes, it needs improvement, as the examination of the housing benefit review demonstrated. The system is not at all well understood and it is definitely difficult to administer. Therefore, we must seek to reduce the case load and to control expenditure. The November uprating was a step along that road. The hon. Member for Derby, South claimed that this pre-empted the Green Paper proposals. It did nothing of the sort. It was a reform and an improvement which was needed. It would be strange if we took steps which were not consistent with the Green Paper proposals.

The change will produce a saving of about £57 million. However, the majority of people will not be affected. Those people on supplementary benefit will not be affected. By November, a pensioner couple with a total income of perhaps £13 above the retirement pension—a total of £74—would lose only 10p a week, taking into account the significant increase in the retirement pension of £4.

The hon. Lady was kind enough, with her customary charity, to pay due credit, albeit a little backhandedly, to the fact that the change in the child's needs allowance in housing benefit is a real increase of 95p and represents a step forward. It is another demonstration of our interest in protecting low-income families with children. It is estimated that about half a million poor families will benefit from that change. We believe that the changes that we have already made in the housing benefit system announced in the uprating statement are sensitive, prudent and fair.

We have never denied that housing benefit expenditure must be reduced and controlled. I cannot go into more detail on the target, because the consultation process is continuing, but it is about £500 million. A proportion of that will be made up by the minimum contribution to rates, which is one of the points that the hon. Lady raised. I must point out that that £500 million represents one sixth of the increase in the cost of housing benefit since 1979.

We have been down the familiar path of figures. The hon. Lady made another sortie or two to test whether she could catch any fish at the end of her line—if I may mix my metaphors. I must repeat that it is essential to have an agreement on the structure. Everyone, even the Opposition, understands that there is a need to change the structure of the housing benefit system. It makes sense to have a national debate on the subject.

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Minister suggested that the debate should be about philosophy, not about facts and figures. He also suggested that the aim of housing benefit reform is to target benefit to those most in need. How does targeting help those most in need if an unemployed person on £28 a week, who may be deprived of single benefit, must now pay £2 or £2·50 a week for his rates bill? How is it targeting on those in need to ask a pensioner on £35·80 a week, who may also lose heating additions and other benefits, to pay £2 or even £3 towards a rates bill? How is the principle of targeting to be achieved when the Minister proposes that, no matter how poor a person is, he must pay 20 per cent. of his rates?

Mr. Whitney: That is the last time that I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman. The document from which he was reading is the one that was leaked to him before the final version was drafted, and he clings desperately to that and to his illusions. As always, he tries to insert figures where there are none. The hon. Gentleman will understand later how misguided he is.

It must make sense to conduct a sensible debate about the structure of a phenomenon as complicated as the housing benefit scheme and its relations with other benefits without, at this stage, getting to the figures. We must discuss the merits of basing housing benefit assessments on the new income support rates. Of course, the rates will not be announced until 1987. Therefore, we must get the structure right first.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I have read the final version of the report. At present, the rates and housing benefit relief of many council tenants in Scotland is dealt with by the same authority. Did the Government calculate how much it would cost to set up a separate department dealing exclusively with rates relief?

Mr. Whitney: One benefit of the new structure is its simplicity. We shall soon begin to discuss with the local authorities the administration of the new structure, and I am sure that the result will be a scheme which is easier to operate not only for claimants but for local authorities.

Mr. Craigen rose——

Mr. Whitney: I will not give way again, because other hon. Members wish to speak in this short debate.

Other elements in our proposals are, of course, subject to developments in other areas. For example, as the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) suggested, we have proposed a 20 per cent. minimum contribution to rates. However, that will depend upon the outcome of the review of local government finance being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. We must re-establish the link between the local residents and local services. We should take account of the fact that 3 million households pay no rates and that our proposed changes would insulate them further. We are convinced that it is right to make local authorities more accountable to their ratepayers and to strengthen the link between ratepayers and services.

The Government recognise the anxiety about the impact of the changes, but we shall certainly consider them with great sensitivity. We have already shown great sensitivity in all the changes that we have made since 1979. However, we are convinced that we need a scheme that is simpler, easier to explain and more equitable. For example, the single taper will be greatly welcomed, and the system of using net incomes and the parallel with the income support arrangements will be of great benefit. They will tackle the poverty and unemployment traps and produce the important effect that the support available will be the same for those in work as it is for those out of work.

The Government's housing record is good. Our proposals for housing benefit reform will be of great advantage to the country and to the economy and to those at the lower end of the incomes scale.

I invite the House to accept our amendment.

7.59 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): The one thing that the Minister said which should unite both sides of the House is that the complexity and incomprehensibility of the housing benefit scheme desperately needs simplification. We have a system which is impossible for ordinary people to understand, which makes it impossible for anyone to calculate his entitlement unless he has a computer. It is a scheme in which papers are passed backwards and forwards between DHSS offices and local authority housing departments, which between them seem able to create a bureaucratic jungle which is impossible for the average person to penetrate. There are delays in calculating benefit and in notifying alterations, which means that tenants suddenly discover themselves substantially in arrears.

I ask the Minister to consider the reaction of an old person, for example, who has always taken pride in the fact that he or she has always had a clear rent account —never owed a penny piece—and who is suddenly faced with substantial rent arrears as a result of the operation of a system which he or she does not understand.

There are many such cases. I shall quote one that came to my notice yesterday. A 76-year-old widow in my constituency suddenly received a letter from the local authority saying that her housing benefit should have been withdrawn on 3 December 1984 and that as a result there had been an overpayment of £494·98. She was also told that henceforward she would be responsible for paying her own rent in full. That was a computerised letter, sent by the London borough of Greenwich. Someone in the department clearly felt unhappy about it, however, because there was a handwritten note which said:

"Do not worry about this letter. Please complete an application for standard housing benefit."

She did that, and as a result she now receives standard housing benefit, the arrears have been wiped off and she is £17 in hand.

This lady does not begin to understand how that has been worked out. She has a page of calculations on the back of the second notification letter which runs to 26 lines of figures explaining her entitlement. She has a daughter who could help her, but we all know of people who have no one to help them and who cannot begin to understand the complexities of such a system. It is extremely frightening for old people suddenly to receive such letters out of the blue. I am sure that the Minister recognises the difficulty.

A simplification of the system is essential. What worries me and, I think, other Opposition Members is that the Government seem to be mixing simplification with the cutting of benefits. That is something that we find much less attractive. For example, a case can be made for the introduction of the single taper, which withdraws housing benefit, combining the rent and the rate elements in one assessment.

The review team which recommended that also sounded a warning about it. It pointed out that the practical effect of such an approach would be to the disadvantage of owner-occupiers, since home owners are eligible for help only with their rates. They would, as a result, be counted as having low housing costs under a combined assessment and their housing assistance would therefore be withdrawn more quickly than now, and more owner-occupiers would cease to receive any help.

The review team made a clear recommendation. It said:

"In our view, in a combined assessment eligible housing costs should be extended to include some element of mortgage interest, to balance out the eligible costs of owner-occupiers and tenants."

In other words, the review team was calling for an approach to owner-occupiers similar to that of tenants.

[Mr. John Cartwright]

It is a matter of regret that in the Green Paper the Government seem to have rejected that approach. As a result, what they suggest in the Green Paper will have a harsh impact on home owners who receive assistance only towards their rates. Their benefit will be withdrawn, as the review team warned, at a much steeper rate under a combined taper than it would have been under the separate rate taper.

As has already been suggested, the main losers under such an approach are likely to be owner-occupiers whose incomes are just above supplementary benefit level. Most of them are likely to be pensioners with small occupational pensions, people who own their own homes, whose only assistance from the state is help with their rates. They are the thrifty, prudent people who made provision for their retirement — the type of people about whom the Government say they are worried. However, it seems to be those thrifty, prudent people who will be in the firing line as a result of the proposed changes. That is unnecessary. The Government could have accepted the review team's recommendations and could have treated mortgage interest on the same basis as rent.

If the Government had combined that with a sensible reform of rates and the introduction of a practical local income tax it would have been a much fairer way to treat people than they are now suggesting.

In the review, we see a Government determined to dress up a cost-cutting exercise as a radical reform. The Government are, as we have heard, seeking housing benefit cuts to a target figure of £500 million. The November uprating seems to be the first phase in those cuts. As other hon. Members have said, with the November cuts we are talking about 2 million households suffering a cut in housing benefit and about 500,000 households losing benefit altogether. That follows two years during which a similar policy has been operated. In April 1983, for example, about 2·25 million households suffered losses in housing benefit and 400,000 households lost benefit altogether. That was a package which saved the Government about £50 million. In April 1984, about 2 million households again suffered losses in their benefit and 500,000 households lost benefit altogether. That package saved the Government £215 million.

What that means to people struggling to balance their weekly budget is underlined by something the Government's Social Security Advisory Committee said in its comments on the 1984 housing benefit cuts. The report was produced in February 1984. The SSAC said:

"It is clear that, for many people, the loss of income will be very severe . . . We join with all those who gave evidence to us in deploring the reduction, which we believe will have an unduly harsh effect on many individuals."

The committee concluded:

"It seems extraordinary that so much money should now be taken out of housing benefit within so short a time."

That might have been extraordinary, but the Government's current proposals show that it is a policy that is continuing. However, the Government say—the Minister implied much the same tonight—that there are no cuts because they have increased the amount of money available for housing benefit. I notice that the Secretary of State made just that point on 3 June, when he said:

"housing benefit expenditure has increased from £1·2 billion in 1979 to £4·2 billion in 1985-86."—[Official Report, 3 June 1985; Vol. 80, c. 45.]

The Policy Studies Institute has examined those claims and has clearly proved that the figures do not reveal the whole story. It points out that the apparent rise in the amount paid in housing benefit is what it calls "entirely artificial". It said:

"of the £3·1 billion increase since 1981-82 (at 1984-85 prices), £2·7 billion is simply the book-keeping transfer of supplementary benefit cases; the other £0·4 billion provided a modicum of protection to the poor against a £1·7 billion fall in council housing subsidies."

What the Government claim is an increase in overall support for housing costs is clearly a cut. Those Opposition Members who point to cuts are plainly proved right by such an analysis.

I am pleased that the Government now realise that with the present housing benefit scheme they have created an insensitive, bureaucratic monster. Some of the reforms which the Government suggest are sensible, but I object to the fact that they are trying to cut corners. They are trying to slip through cuts in the guise of reform. Those cuts will have a severe impact on some of the most deserving households. That is why I and my colleagues will vote for the motion tonight.

8.10 pm

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): The review that we are discussing today sets four targets in relation to housing benefits — simplification, equalisation, accountability and administrative savings. I am surprised and horrified at the extent to which all those objectives—which should be entirely laudable and welcomed in all parts of the House—have received such scant praise and acknowledgement from the Opposition.

To fill the gap left by the Opposition I intend to say what the Government seek to achieve in connection with housing benefits. The most important aspect of the Green Paper is simplification. A scheme to abolish the complexities and low take-up of housing benefit supplements and replace it as part of a new income support scheme on a more broadly drawn basis can only be administratively simpler, more easily understood and undoubtedly more popular.

The concept of replacing six different tapers, as people move up and down the housing benefit scale, with one taper, can only be welcomed as an exercise in making the scheme more intelligible.

One major advantage in the proposed simplification is that it will remove many complications caused by the present system under which the needs allowance is based on gross income and supplementary benefit on net income. Cuts have been mentioned, but many of the proposed changes will create benefits. For instance, a constituent of mine, a frequent visitor to my surgery, did not believe that it was worth waiting for the Green Paper but now that he has seen it and I have explained it to him he has gone away rather happier.

Mr. Frank Field: I cannot say that about my constituents.

Mr. Stern: My constituent had over many years set aside as much as he could out of a relatively low-paid job to provide a pension for himself. He believed that that pension would be a modest help in his retirement. He retired in the early 1970s thinking that that relatively small pension would help to support him through his retirement. Since then he has lived through the inflation of the Labour

Government and seen his pension dwindle almost to nothing in real terms. Nevertheless, he was very proud of the principle that he had saved to buy himself an additional pension, no matter how small. Under the existing housing benefit scheme, because with his state pension and his works pension he was earning just enough to pay tax, he found himself suffering a reduction of 100 per cent. in the pension of which he was so proud through a combination of tax and the taper.

As a result of the scheme now proposed, which will be based on net rather than gross income, I have been able to tell my constituent that all his efforts were not totally worthless and that although he will not keep much of his pension as a result of the changes he will at least keep some of it.

Mr. Field: I would not want the hon. Gentleman to mislead his constituent, who may be listening to this debate. How can the hon. Gentleman give that assurance, when we do not have the figures necessary to know the nature of the scheme?

Mr. Stern: My constituent has read about the 70 per cent. taper and drawn conclusions from that. I accept that there is no absolute assurance but at least he now has some idea of what is to happen.

The need for simplification of housing benefit is clear. People on supplementary benefit are treated more favourably than people with low incomes and almost identical resources. That is clearly unfair and needs correction. Help with rates goes further up the income scale than help with rent. That, too, is illogical and needs simplification. Moreover, no one who handles constituency cases can seriously suggest that the complexities of the present system are capable of explanation to anyone who has not made a detailed study of the subject.

Mr. Field: The hon. Gentleman presents all this as a major advance in understanding for our constituents and that may be so, although I suspect that many of my constituents will still not have the energy to follow these matters in detail, but is not another advantage of simplification the possibility that the staff running the scheme will understand it when previously they did not?

Mr. Stern: Yes, I had intended to refer to that.

With regard to equalisation, it is surely right that people with similar needs and circumstances should have similar benefits whether they are in or out of work. At present, certificated cases — those on supplementary benefit — have 100 per cent. of their rent paid. Standard cases — those in work or with some kind of income—receive 60 per cent. benefit which is tapered up or down on one of six tapers and may also attract housing benefit supplement. Equalisation was clearly needed and that is what has been offered.

The third advantage is accountability. There are many different views about the desirability of the domestic rating system, but most people agree that one of its major faults is that far too few people pay rates. This makes swingeing rate increases such as the 55 per cent. increase promised for next year by Avon county council even more painful to people at all points on the income scale. The Government's proposal to increase the number of people who pay rates will inevitably be to the advantage of the rating system and of accountability by local government and may even make spendthrift councils such as Avon pay more attention to the views of the people whom they claim to represent, because they will be attacking far more of their constituents when they increase the rates. A proposal which means that an additional 7·5 million households —one household in three—will have to take note of rate increases is clearly an advantage in terms of accountability.

Mrs. Beckett: How does the hon. Gentleman square the comments in the review about the need for 100 per cent. of housing costs to be returned to people in the lowest income brackets with the advantages that he claims will accrue to them from paying rates? How does he square the enthusiasm of some Conservatives for targeting help on the poorest people with his view that it will be an advantage to those people to have to pay sums that they do not now pay?

Mr. Stern: I see many advantages for the whole of society, and certainly for the poorest members of society if, as a result of the increased accountability that the new scheme will bring, more and more people realise the extent to which their environment is being impoverished by spendthrift councils. That advantage will extend to all who inhabit areas in which spending comes first and value a long way behind.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stern: I have given way several times and many other Members wish to speak. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way again.

I turn to the administrative savings that will result from the Green Paper's proposals. The existing arrangements have been widely criticised by the Public Accounts Committee. Any system that is unintelligible but which involves 8,500 local staff costing £117 million is not immune from criticism. The Green Paper's proposals will enable local authorities to save money which can then be used either for other forms of spending or for rate reductions. On those four grounds, I commend the Green Paper's proposals.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The speeches in the debate on child benefit and the speech of the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security in this debate have convinced me that the Government intend to axe the welfare state, not to reform it. The purpose of the exercise is to make major public expenditure cuts. The Government are wrong not to give the figures.

The Under-Secretary of State said that the annual cost of the social security budget is £42 billion. I believe that the Government intend considerably to reduce that figure. They are not prepared, however, to say what their target is because they wish to avoid a major outcry at this stage. The public will not be conned by the Government's actions. The figures will be made known when the legislation is introduced. Unless they change their mind before that stage is reached, people will then know exactly what the Government intend to do. The reviews will be the greatest single reason for the Government's defeat at the next General Election.

The only figure we have been given is a cut of £500 million in housing benefit. This will result in 7·2 million households losing benefit. It means that one third of households will lose benefit. Four million of the 7·2 million householders are pensioners. And 1·8 million householders will probably lose all of their housing benefit, of whom 1·2 million are pensioners.

Housing benefit is to be made available to those, both in and out of work, who receive the level of income set for income support. That may seem to be fair and reasonable. However, such a policy subsidises low wages and is consistent with the Government's policy of abolishing wages councils. The Government believe that the solution to unemployment is to reduce wages. I have yet to see reduced pay resulting in the safeguarding of jobs and the avoidance of redundancies.

Mr. Whitney: Is the hon. Gentleman opposing the family credit scheme?

Mr. Pike: No, I am not opposing it, but I do not believe that it is the right solution. Nevertheless, if it is the only solution on offer, we have to accept it. We ought to ensure that every worker is given a reasonable wage with which to support his wife and family. Family income supplement is wrong. Its replacement is also wrong. Supplements of that kind mean that employers are subsidised. As income increases over the base that is to be set, people will be hit very hard by the sharp reduction in income supplement. Although the Government have not said what the taper will be under the new scheme, if the tapers that are used in the example in the Green Paper are put into effect the poverty trap will be made even worse. For those paying tax and national insurance and receiving a rent and rate rebate, the marginal rate of tax has already increased significantly since housing benefit replaced the previous rebate-allowance scheme. The marginal rate of tax of working households receiving housing benefit in March 1983 was 61·75 per cent.; in April 1983, 67 per cent.; in April 1984, 74 per cent.; and in November 1984, 77 per cent. The rate of withdrawal of benefit foreshadowed in the Green Paper, of 70p. of net income, would mean a marginal tax rate for working households receiving housing benefit of 82 per cent. at current levels of tax and national insurance rates. This will make it even more difficult for low wage earners to improve their standard of living by working overtime and earning extra money.

Furthermore, capital will be taken into account. Those with capital of over £6,000 will be barred from housing benefit. Those with capital of over £3,000 will lose benefit of 40p for every £100 of capital between £3,000 and £6,000. These further blows have to be considered on top of the other attacks on housing by the Government. The insufficient HIP allocations mean that housing conditions will be made worse. It will not be possible either to build or to improve houses in both the public and the private sectors.

Since this Government were elected, the support available to the housing revenue account has been considerably reduced. The last figure fixed in 1979 by the outgoing Labour Government in my borough was £1·6 million for 8,000 houses. For each of the last four years it has been zero, zero, zero and zero. It does not take a mathematician to work out what that means for people's rents. The Government forced up rents. Although they say that they want people to have a choice, they have eliminated for many people the choice of living in rented council accommodation.

Over 15,000 households in Burnley receive some form of housing benefit. Nearly three quarters of council house tenants receive some form of housing benefit. An additional burden will be placed upon local government because of the central Government reduction of subsidy from 90 to 80 per cent. The Government do not intend to increase the grants paid to local councils. It would be a nonsense for the Government to transfer grants from one he[illegible] to another. This means that the additional 10 per cent. burden to meet housing benefit will be passed on to council tenants in the form of rent and to ratepayers as a whole. A further burden will be thrown on local authorities. Rate capping will also throw an additional heavy burden on local government. Local government will have to bear an additional burden of 10 per cent.

It is wrong that mortgage interest payments should no longer be eligible for consideration in the assessment of housing costs. The Government claim to be the friend of owner-occupiers, yet they intend to hit those whom they claim to be their greatest allies. It is a bad policy.

I do not accept the proposal that everybody should bear 20 per cent. of the rate burden. The inference is that unless householders pay something towards the rates they should have no say in local Government elections. The Government infer that because people may pay no rates they vote irresponsibly. What nonsense. The reverse suggestion might be that if they do not pay rates they should lose their local election vote, and if people do not pay taxes they should lose their parliamentary vote. Their motto at the next election could well be, "No representation without taxation."

The independent review team recommended 100 per cent. help with housing costs for those on the lowest incomes as "the only fair way of meeting their needs within the present vagaries of the housing market".

While the Government have accepted that argument for rent, they have not done so for rates. The Green Paper states:

"The Government are firmly of the view that should domestic rates continue to be a significant element of local authority revenue then all households should make a contribution towards them."

I have already said that I cannot accept the logic of that argument.

The Government have suggested that claimants should meet at least 20 per cent. of their rates, although this could be revised. One assumes that, under a Conservative Government, a revision would be an increase rather than a decrease. This is a foot in the door, and it will put a further burden on the people. The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) has referred to the kind of people who will be hit.

The consequences for claimants on income support of having to meet 20 per cent. of their rates could be considerable. Disturbingly, there is no indication in the Green Paper as to whether the loss to claimants of 20 per cent. of their rates benefit will be compensated for by an equivalent increase in the income support scales. At best this could be done only on a rough justice average basis which would involve an increase of around £1 a week to the income support scheme, equivalent to 20 per cent. of the average rate bill. Again, it would be absolute nonsense to assume that the Government will consider this, as that would merely transfer the figure from one heading to another. In my opinion, this exercise is designed to save money. Unless the Government say that they intend to do this, one assumes that they will not do so.

The consequence would inevitably be to generate increased debt problems. The absence of any pledge even to make this average compensating adjustment is particularly worrying, and I do not believe that the Government will be prepared to say that they will do that, given that their objective is to save money rather than to simplify the system.

It is clearly inappropriate and unrealistic to expect people on income support to find sufficient money to meet 20 per cent. of their rates bills without extra assistance. The Minister failed to answer the forceful and pertinent points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), and I hope that he will answer them when he replies to the debate.

No figures are given in the Green Paper of the saving that would be made by the DHSS if the 20 per cent. were not compensated for, but it seems likely that it could be of the order of £250 million.

Making income support recipients pay at least 20 per cent. of their rates would turn on its head one of the key arguments used by the DHSS to persuade local authorities to agree to the introduction of the housing benefit scheme in 1982-83—that by rebating claimants' rent and rates at source, local authorities would greatly reduce the rent and rate collection tasks as well as the arrears problem. That problem will now be reintroduced in respect of 20 per cent. of the rates for every ratepayer. Approximately 2·5 million households that now have their rates fully rebated at source will, under this proposal, have to resume payments. The administrative costs for authorities and the potential for increased arrears should not be underestimated.

The attack on housing contained in this part of the reviews shows that this is not a caring or compassionate Government. They intend to make the poorest and most deprived areas of the country pay the penalty. They will give tax hand-outs to the rich and wealthy at the expense of the poor and the poorer regions.

8.34 pm

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): There are three key elements in the Opposition's motion. First, as critics of the principle of housing benefit, they cite the administrative problems, which undoubtedly are still in the system, as a condemnation of the principle of housing benefit. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the city officers of Nottingham, who in that first year dealt with 55,000 certificated and standard cases. Secondly, they claim that pensioners and poor families are deprived of help. That may be a subjective opinion, but it is certainly not truthful. Thirdly, the motion pours scorn on the social security review and, in my view, assumes that such a review must of necessity bring greater poverty.

Those three elements illustrate beyond doubt the Opposition's unwillingness to face facts, as well as the very synthetic nature of their concern.

On the first point, there has been no mention of the justice of bringing in a new scheme to replace the tangle of the old one prior to housing benefit. No mention has been made of the fact that, in order to be as even-handed as possible in an undoubtedly major reorganisation, housing benefit supplement — the real complicating factor — was provided. There is no recognition of the fact that had the Government gone for total simplicity and ignored losers there might not have been any of the administrative chaos to which the motion refers. Perhaps the Opposition wish the Government to put simplicity before fairness. If so, it is a very strange brand of new Socialism.

I wish to touch on one of the least mentioned reasons for the original change, which also added to the administrative difficulties. Sadly, it is still in the system. I refer to what in euphemistic jargon is called financial flexibility. That actually meant that one could do what one liked with the money that one was given to pay the rent — booze or make whoopee if one wished — and that other tenants would, through higher rents, pay the bad debts that had to be written off by local authorities.

Expenditure on housing support, which has risen from £1·4 billion in 1979-80 to £4·2 billion in 1984-85—and a budget of £4·5 billion next year—cannot remotely be described as depriving the pensioner or the poor. No one could describe that gradation as a cut. I understand the impact of unemployment on those figures, and there is no comfort or pleasure in those human statistics, but to accuse the Government of not meeting the social cost of this problem on behalf of the community at large is the ultimate humbug.

While we are talking telephone numbers, my understanding — I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will correct me if I am wrong — is that spending under the review is likely to rise from £40 billion to £42 billion. When I went to school——

Mr. Gordon Brown: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept, as I think the Minister will confirm, that the object of the housing benefit proposal is to save £500 million? On top of that, money is to be saved from the child benefit budget, and almost certainly from the supplementary benefit budget. There are savings as a result of the review. The suggestion made a year ago that this was a nil-cost review has been totally undermined by the various announcements made by the Government. Why did the housing benefit review recommend no change or cuts in housing benefit? Why did it not recommend that the poor pay 20 per cent. of their rates entitlement? Why have these proposals been totally undermined by the decisions of the Cabinet and Ministers?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman abuses the courtesies of this House, because on two or three occasions he has sought to intervene in every speech. All that we have had is a catalogue of the minuses. We are saying in the broad approach to this matter, yes, there have to be losers and there have to be minuses. I have said that in the totality of spending we have gone from £40 million to £42 million, and I am sure that I shall be corrected if I am wrong. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) is shaking his head. When I went to school I thought that that was an increase, but, standards being what they are these days, I suppose that that now has to be pronounced a cut. In Socialist jargon, any spending that is less than what Labour promises—with the honourable exception of what the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said this evening—becomes a cut.

The sad part of all this is that so many people are beginning to swallow that humbug. First, there is the opposition to the review in general. After 40 years, what reasonable person would not say, "And about time too."?

[Mr. Brandon-Bravo]

When there is such a tangle of interrelated allowances, benefits, discards and adjustments, it is insulting the intelligence to say that it could all be straightened out with nobody being the loser. Indeed, natural justice demands that where benefit is going where it should not go, the recipients should lose. Midas himself would not have the resources so to increase the level of all benefits—this applies as much to housing benefit as to any other sphere—that no one tends to end up with less than before. But even if that were done, I am certain that Opposition Members would leap to their feet and claim that, because some people had more than others that, too, would be wrong. Nothing, but nothing, would satisfy the Opposition.

Losers might indeed arise, if, for example, we consider student support. Few people outside the House realise that, in addition to grant and or parental support, housing benefit may be paid. Losers might prefer it if we try to simplify the speed or frequency with which benefits change with changed personal circumstances. Losers would probably arise simply in the consideration of minimum payments.

There is one group of losers whom I should not be sorry to see lose. They were highlighted in the report, and I might refer to them as the free-loading up-marketeers. So long as some recipents — I stress some — of housing benefit are satisfied that there is no limit to what they can get, they will stick out for a house of the size and quality and in the precise place that they want to be until, in the end, a housing officer grants them that property. I am sure that all of us with council estates in our constituencies know of people who will continue to refuse until they get the house that they want.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who opened the debate for the Opposition, is gazing at me as if to imply that that does not happen. If that is so, I do not know where the hon. Lady has been when dealing with housing, because this is a matter which gets up the noses of most honest straightforward tenants who regard themselves as playing by the rules, and they are irritated, and rightly so, by those who abuse what ought to be a reasonable and fair system.

I deal next with the non-dependant reductions, which, as the review body rightly points out, ought to be called non-dependant contributions. I agree entirely with the view of the review body. This should remain in the calculations on the basis that those who are sharing a household should contribute to it, or at least be assumed to be contributing to it, if they have the income to do so.

I join my hon. Friends in welcoming the sound approach of the recent uprating. We should underline the point that, contrary to what is stated in the Opposition motion, a pensioner couple will need to have an income of nearly £700 a year over the retirement pension level before housing is reduced by even 10p per week. As the review body made clear, there are bound to be difficult judgments on how to provide assistance in a fair and equitable manner within the limits of public expenditure. There are limits, and it is nonsense to suppose otherwise. It is dishonest politics to tell people that there are no limits.

The review body went on to point out—this refers to the last part of the Opposition motion—that the review should not be allowed to stand in the way of the basic reforms necessary to achieve a similar and equitable system.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman referred to dishonesty. Does he agree that it is a little dishonest to quote the review body without acknowledging that it did not propose cuts in housing benefit, whereas the Government are proposing cuts of £500 million and then casually saying, "Mind you, there have to be changes in priorities."?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I do not think that I could be accused of having made selective quotations or of being dishonest, unless the hon. Lady wishes me to read out the whole document to prove that I have read it, or am I misunderstanding her point?

Mrs. Beckett: I think that the hon. Gentleman has not understood. I accept that the hon. Gentleman does not make selective quotations. My point is that the review body, which he chooses to quote as stating what should be a fair system—of course choices have to be made—did not propose any cuts in the overall cost of housing benefit. In my view, it is a little dodgy to use the words of the review body report about changes in the system which do not imply overall cuts to justify what the Government are doing, which is to make cuts of £500 million.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: If I appear to have been suggesting that the review body stated that we should reduce benefit by £500 million, of course I apologise. The hon. Lady is correct. That was not the task of the review body. That is the task of the Government and of politicians. Their task is to consider the report of the independent review body and to decide what is good in it and with what they agree or disagree, and to establish whether those recommendations can be fitted into the totality of what can be spent in the public sector. This would apply whether the hon. Lady was speaking from the Opposition Dispatch Box or from the Government Dispatch Box. The hon. Lady will be in the same position of examining the report and saying, "What can I take out of it that I agree with, what do I disagree with, and how much can we afford?"

There is always a limit to public expenditure, whichever party is in government. The Government seem to be going about it in the right way, and they have my complete support.

8.47 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I have listened to most debates on the review, and in the matter of housing benefit, I am convinced that there has been a con trick by the Government. The Minister talks about simplification. It will be worse later than it is now. I do not know how many surgeries the Minister has, or the Secretary of State, for that matter.

Mr. Whitney: One a week.

Mr. Haynes: I hold surgeries regularly to meet constituents about their problems.

Mr. Whitney: So do I.

Mr. Haynes: I mean those I hold to discuss housing benefit when constituents have lost it. Is the Minister going to say that he has those as well?

Mr. Whitney: I am certain that all our constituents will welcome the simplicity which will be built into the new system, and they will then understand it.

Mr. Haynes: I did not ask the Minister that question. I asked whether he had constituents enjoying housing benefit who have now had it taken away. That is the kind of constituent who comes to my surgery with a problem. I am asking the Minister whether any of the electors come to him and complain about losing housing benefit. I notice that he is not coming back to the Dispatch Box. He knows full well that those people come to see him, but he is not saying anything because the Government robbed the people last year, never mind what they will do in the future.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman seems to want to tempt me, and I am happy to be tempted up to a point. We all have constituents who enjoy housing benefit. In 1979, 5·5 million people enjoyed housing benefit; now, there are 7·5 million. That is the arithmetic.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman has dodged it again. I am talking about his constituency, not about the national level. I am asking him specifically about his constituency and the people he represents. It is obvious that he is not going to say that his constituents have complained that their housing benefit has been taken away because of the Government's policies. The hon. Gentleman is not going to admit that. If he does not give us the answer, he is not being really honest.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Does my hon. Friend recognise that the Under-Secretary of State has said that in 1979 5·5 million people received housing benefit and that the figure is now 7·5 million? Is that not because of Tory policy, the large number of unemployed and the low wages that are being paid?

Mr. Whitney: I am happy to point out that the whole of our social security benefit system, including housing benefit, has kept well ahead of the drain involved in the sad unemployment figures. That unemployment is the reason why we must keep public spending under control. If we trod the road down which the Opposition are tempting us, we would spend billions and billions of pounds and unemployment would double and treble. That is the point that the Opposition must grasp.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman really is naughty. I have not yet made any suggestions. I have only asked him a question, and he has not answered it. Good grief, that is the limit.

Let us look at the cold facts. I have heard the Prime Minister and other Ministers at the Dispatch Box pour out compassion, but there has not been an ounce of real compassion from the Government. I know that the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) is a member of Nottingham city council. When he made his contribution, all his thinking concerned finance. He was not thinking about the problems created for the people who will be totally dependent upon these benefits. That is why I say that this is a con trick. Ministers are constantly asked for figures, but they talk only about structure. We were given only one or two figures.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) put his questions, the Minister did not want to respond, because he knew full well that my hon. Friend had all the answers. My hon. Friend knows what will happen with social security from A to Z, right through the benefit schemes, and he knows what the Government want to do.

I remember what happened when the right hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Prentice) was the Minister with responsibility for the disabled. History is now being repeated. The Opposition were moaning and groaning as we do constantly, about unemployment. The right hon. Gentleman set up a scheme with one thousand storm troopers to find out where he could rob the disabled. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Government Members have bad memories. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was not a Member then and did not hear what was said. I assure her that that programme was implemented. The Government are again robbing the poor people to feed the rich.

I well remember the last time a massive decrease in income tax was given to the rich. When the Prime Minister was asked what would happen, she said, "The money that they get back will be invested in industry. It will create jobs, and will get the nation back to work." It did not do that. The restrictions were lifted, and all the money flowed out of the country.

The same thing will happen with SERPS. Unless the Government back off from their proposal, the insurance companies will invest their money abroad, just as they do now. This will affect the working-class people who contribute to SERPS. The Government will push money overseas, instead of investing it in Britain.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Like all his colleagues, the hon. Gentleman makes constant references to handouts to the rich. Does he want us to return to the days before the top tax rate was more than 60 per cent., back to those confiscatory levels that created the brain drain?

Mr. Haynes: Talk about the brain drain. Pop stars? Are those the people to whom we want to give back all the money? There are thousands of them. That is not work. I have worked in the pits; I know what work is. I contributed to SERPS. But we are talking not about that scheme but about housing benefit.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman made that point.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) intervened in response to my point. I raised that matter only in passing, but he extended it. Let us consider fairness. Members of Parliament obtain relief for a second home, yet we are talking about taking the benefit from those who desperately need it.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Rubbish.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Lady is half asleep. If she does not know about the entitlements of Members of Parliament, she should go the Fees Office and find out.

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Haynes: I shall not give way. The hon. Lady should go to the Fees Office and clarify what I have just said.

Mrs. Currie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Haynes: It is in Hansard. The hon. Lady can go to the Fees Office and find out about those entitlements. Hon. Members have the right to claim relief on a second home, and are doing so. Conservative Members applied pressure to bring about those benefits. That is how fair they are. They are looking after themselves as well as the rich.

Mrs. Currie: For his own sake, will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Haynes: I shall not give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) is not giving way. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) must resume her seat.

Mrs. Currie: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

Mr. Haynes: I am not giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member clearly is not giving way. The hon. Lady must resume her seat.

Mrs. Currie: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Haynes: I am not giving way. I respect the Chair. When Mr. Deputy Speaker is speaking, we sit down.

It is a continuous shackling that is going on. The Government are going to shackle the people in the very low income groups so that they cannot have the benefits that we say they are entitled to. It all lines up with this Government's policy of shackling the trade unions.

If the Government do not back off from this scheme, it will burden the local authorities. The staff of Nottingham city council will be burdened with more work. When the housing benefit scheme was transferred from the DHSS to the local authorities, it was made clear to the authorities that they must not take on any more staff. Here is more work coming their way, and if this proposal comes into operation, I shall be interested to see how the local authority staff react. It will mean more work for less money for them.

Conservative Members have come up with excuses about complications, and saying that the structure must come first and that figures are necessary. Some of us have attended meetings and tried to explain what the Government are doing.

Recently in the Nottinghamshire county council points have been raised about unfairness and the allowances that the police get — massive rent allowances and free prescriptions. The Government put the cost of prescriptions up to £2 not long ago, but the police get free prescriptions, free spectacles, free dentistry. What is going on is totally unfair. If hon. Members want to understand about fairness, they should listen to some of the contributions made from the Opposition Benches. The people who can afford to pay should be paying and the people in the lower income groups should not have to pay what they can ill afford for what they need.

In this review the Government, I maintain, are conning the public, but they will not get away with it. Slowly but surely the people are waking up to what is going on. The Government will force local authorities to implement these proposals and no doubt they will watch very carefully to see how many people the authorities take on to do the job. These proposals show quite clearly where the Government are going as far as the lower paid people of this nation are concerned. I think that after next Thursday the Government will get the message, because, make no mistake, when we get the opportunity we will put all these wrongs right and the rich will have to make their contribution, because they are not making it at present.

9.3 pm

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I have listened with interest to some of the criticisms of the Government action on housing benefit, but I must confess that I find many of the criticisms of the proposed changes, whether in the uprating or in the social security benefits review, misguided. I know that the present system of housing benefit was introduced by this Conservative Government, but I and many of my colleagues have been highly critical of some of its complexities. We have believed it to be in some respects illogical.

I believe that the variations in taper that apply at the moment are extremely difficult for people to understand. The variation concerning a lower taper in terms of rates compared with rents is rather absurd. Therefore, a change that will gradually move away from the present position to what I hope will be, after consideration of the Green Paper and further consideration of the White Paper and the eventual legislation, a common taper, will be a much better, more comprehensible and fairer system in terms of those receiving housing benefit.

The move that has been made to alter the taper and rates will minimise the impact of any change in one year, so avoiding those most in need being grossly adversely affected. As the Minister pointed out, old-age pensioners receiving £10 or £13 above the basic pension will find their housing benefit position changed only negligibly because of the taper alteration. I applaud the decision to proceed in that way.

It seems absurd that of the 7 million people who are covered by that benefit, a substantial number are paying income tax, some at a significant level. The changes in housing benefit — the alterations being made now and the changes that will result from the discussions on the Green Paper—will create a more satisfactory system.

Some extraordinary scare stories have circulated about the likely results of the various reviews into benefits and the legislation that may flow from those reviews. I have made some calculations, taking into account the rates of family credit, housing benefit and changes that are proposed in the social security system.

In view of the way in which the family credit system may be based on net income — after which housing benefit will apply, on the basis of net income also, taking family credit and other benefits into account—we may find that housing benefit payments fall considerably for large families simply because the family credit that will be paid in those cases will be substantially increased.

In other words, because of some interesting interplays among the various benefits, we are likely to find that one aspect of the system shows a significant saving, although the people who will be benefited or disbenefited, as the case may be, will have their needs met.

The present combination of benefits — FIS, supplementary benefit for unemployed people, housing benefit and so on—acts as a disincentive to people to improve their position at work by doing overtime or undertaking other responsibilities. There is an overwhelming case for making the system simpler and for introducing greater equity, while at the same time maintaining help for those who really need it.

Despite all the Opposition's protestations, the truth is that those who are in most need will be supported as effectively as in the past. That is as it should be. But, equally, there will be an element of incentive for those who can take advantage of opportunities in work and so on to do so. I believe that that, in its turn, will reduce some of the pressures on the present benefit system.

Some of the Opposition's arguments are nonsense. Do they really support what I believe was a mistake when it was introduced, the variations in taper? Do they really think that it is best to have a 9 per cent. taper in rates? Or do not they think that it is more appropriate to have one taper covering all those housing benefits? Surely that is the more straightforward approach—the better approach. If the Opposition believe that that would be a more logical eventual solution to the problems and difficulties of the present system, surely it is equally logical, sensible and reasonable to move in that direction in gradual stages—not in one jump. Legislation may be passed, but it might be possible to make some modest moves in that direction that do not hit any particular group substantially at one time.

In what they have done on housing benefit and the other benefits that interrelate with it, the Government have taken a courageous stand, proposing to make changes that will lead to a more efficient and effective system. As the Opposition frequently tell us, the complexities of the present system, whether in family credit, family income supplement or housing benefit, are such that large numbers of people who may be entitled to them do not claim the benefits. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) mentioned people coming to see him at his surgeries. I must confess that many people come to see me at my surgeries about housing benefit. The fact is that in most instances they do not understand the tabulations that they receive. They find them too complicated. They do not understand the picture that is presented in that way. They are desperate for a system that is simpler and more comprehensible so that they will——

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are of considerable interest. They follow on from remarks in a debate not long ago, which was not on this subject, but on social security. I think that he is falling into the trap that his hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security fell into on that occasion. Of course everybody wants a simpler system, and there is much to be said for having a single taper. However, there is not much to be said for having a single taper that will make things so much worse that people will lose money. I ask the hon. Gentleman to think for a moment whether those who come to his constituency surgeries with justified complaints about the complexity of the system, are brought there by losing money. In my experience, although they may also be concerned about the complexity of the system, they are much more concerned about whether they gain or lose by the changes that are made. As the Minister for Social Security suggested on one occasion that people would prefer a Rolls-Royce system even if it meant less money, does the hon. Gentleman share that delusion?

Mr. Wood: Obviously, those who complain would rather have more money. Nevertheless, adding together the various benefits — family income supplement, housing benefit and so on—it is equally true that if a £1 gain means that one is worse off, one cannot conceivably defend that system. If changing the system to a more equitable one means that, relatively speaking, some will be a little worse off and some will be better off, I am afraid that that is a change that I accept. One has to go down that path. As some of those who may be marginally worse off may complain loudly, I welcome the courage of the Government in nevertheless pursuing the changes to a more equitable system.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not wish to persecute the hon. Gentleman, but if what the Government are doing will simplify the system, there might be a slight tendency to applause from the Opposition. However, that is not all the Government are doing. In simplifying the system, they are taking £500 million out of it, and that means that there will be hardly any gainers but many losers. That is what makes what they are doing so utterly indefensible.

Mr. Wood: I might accept that general proposition if I did not also take account of the fact that a vast proportion of those so-called beneficiaries of the benefit system are also paying income tax. If one could devise a system, as I believe one can, whereby less benefit may be paid in particular sectors, and at the same time less income tax is paid by the same people, that would be a more sensible and rational system.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is ludicrous that one third of all households, and 50 per cent. in places such as Liverpool, should be taxed and rated to such an extent that they cannot afford to pay their own rent and rates? We must evolve a system whereby people can pay their own housing costs, and the sooner the better.

Mr. Wood: That is right and, as I have said, at the moment we have an absurdly complicated system in which people are receiving housing and other benefits and paying income tax. We need to change that system. The whole nature of the proposed benefit system changes is such that in terms of net income, housing benefit can fall for families with many children, but they will be getting substantial increases through the family credit system, and all to the good.

The savings that may be achievable in the benefits system will provide the possibility of raising tax thresholds, which will mean that those people who may in some circumstances have lost out on benefits will pay less in tax. That is wholly desirable. I cannot understand the Labour party opposing such a principle.

Mr. Boyes: The trouble is that the hon. Gentleman cannot understand anything.

Mr. Wood: I can understand. I look at the figures and I listen to complaints made by the people in my surgery. The changes in the housing benefit system—the moves to a common taper and a more simplified system—will mean that there will be a better take-up for those in need, which will give the opportunity for the raising of tax thresholds so that we do not at the same time have benefits received and taxes paid.

Therefore, overall, instead of the whingeing that we have heard from the Opposition Benches, we should be welcoming the changes, and the fact that gradual modifications are being made in the housing benefit system so that there will not have to be dramatic changes when the social security reviews are completed. We should welcome the move to more effective means to help those in real need. I am pleased to see the changes this year and I look forward to the further changes coming from the benefits review in the coming years.

9.18 pm

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): I am told that there has today been a conference on this subject in Manchester. It was attended by about 200 delegates from various local authorities in the north-west of England. There is much worry about the housing benefit shake-up, and the conference must have considered the implications of the changes to the housing benefit system and how the Government are organising future handouts while saving £500 million.

Local authorities have gone through chaos. They have only recently got the housing benefit system right after the last change, and they regard any further upheaval as unnecessary, costly and time-consuming. I am sure that the conference will have expressed its concern about the restructuring of the system and the reduction from 96 to 80 per cent. of the moneys that local government gets from Whitehall. It is estimated that that cut will cost Manchester city council about £12 million. The Government have promised to take that reduction into account when agreeing levels of support for local authorities, but councils are extremely dubious about the Government's intentions, because of their track record.

Another serious worry is the time factor in making changes. Last time the chaos reigned for nearly two years, for recipients and administrators of the system alike. Many hon. Members have referred to their advice bureaux. Mine is in a highly deprived area of the city and it was always full of worried people on Friday evening and Saturday. I fear a recurrence of that, and of many elderly people and people who rely on benefits waiting for advice because they are bemused by the complexities of the system. So great was the confusion last time that local authorities put out leaflets which tried to describe in layman's terms what was going on. It was a traumatic experience for many elderly people. Anybody who runs an advice bureau must be worried about that happening again.

This time, however, town halls have just 21 months before the deadline of April 1987. Councillor Frances Done, the chairman of Manchester city council's finance committee, has declared that the cut in funding is a direct attack on local government finances and could cause dire administrative problems. This is especially true for inner-city areas such as Manchester. Extra staff will be required to cope with the paperchase that will result from these proposals. Manchester city council is trying to employ an extra 20 or 30 staff to administer the system—to collect rates towards which tenants will have to contribute 20 per cent., water rates and the heating element of rates, all of which will be an administrator's nightmare.

We have heard much about the losers and the gainers today. It is difficult to get figures these days, but it seems that about 500,000 people will gain, that 1 million people will lose up to £1·40 a week and that 5 million people will lose between £1·40 and £3 a week. It is estimated that 650,000 people will lose between £3 and £6 a week, and that 150,000 people will lose more than £6. In all, 7 million people will be losers. Those are some conclusions of the research carried out by Manchester city housing benefit section.

In Manchester alone 112,000 people receive housing benefit, and of those 105,000 will lose some or all of that benefit. With all the pressures of collection and administration, the authority has a dismal prospect of seeing any reduction in the £12 million rent arrears. Indeed, with the Government's proposals, and with the extra administration and rent collection, it is estimated that there will be a massive increase in rent arrears.

Mr. Favell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, with ratepayers being obliged to pay at least 20 per cent. towards their rate bills, the proposal will increase the public accountability of local authorities to their ratepayers? Does he think that that will be good for Manchester city council, which employs twice as many local government employees per head of the population as neighbouring Stockport?

Mr. Litherland: We could debate rates all night. Manchester's rate is high because of the Government's cuts. The extra administration that is being put on the authority by the Government will require far more local government finance. With rate capping, where is the money to come from? The Government always blame shortfalls on the greed of Manchester city council or the people who live in Manchester. In the past we have provided marvellous services, and they must be paid for. People are willing to pay for them.

The hon. Gentleman is not comparing like with like. In Manchester we have massive deprived inner city areas, with massive unemployment, including massive youth unemployment, and elderly, sick and disabled people. There has been a mass exodus from the city to the new towns and suburbs. People have left the deprived areas. That is why we have asked for more rates. We could debate rates all night, but at present we are debating housing benefit, which is only one aspect of the matter.

All the extra responsibilities of local authorities and housing associations will have their effect on administration and finance. Once again chaos will reign supreme. One of the briefs that I have received about what the Government should do states:

> "Housing Benefit should be based on an equality of treatment between those who get 'benefit' in the form of tax relief on mortgage interest and those who receive benefit to help with rent and rates. The Green Paper in no way addresses itself to this relationship.
> Rising levels of council rents mean that housing costs have become a much higher proportion of the outgoings of families on low income. Not only does the Government not recognise this but, having already slashed the Housing Benefit budget, it is drastically reducing entitlement to Housing Benefit. Fully adequate provision for housing costs must be introduced."

The Government should take heed of that.

Finally, I wish to reiterate the point made by my hon. Friends. The Government are to make a cut of £500 million in the amount of benefit paid to the poorest people, who cannot pay, so that they can meet their manifesto commitment of tax handouts for the rich. That is their only purpose.

9.28 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I hope it will not be necessary to make an apology for being on my feet twice in one day, but housing benefit is an extremely important subject. We spend another £4,000 million on it, and it affects large and increasing numbers of our constituents, yet from looking around the House this evening it seems a desperate pity that so few hon. Members have bothered to take an interest in the subject. It is not enough to moan about housing benefit when there are changes. Hon. Members should be present to put points to the Ministers at the opportunity that they have.

The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) will be surprised to hear that I agree with much of what he said. Many of the administrative problems that he highlighted, especially in the major cities, will cause considerable trouble when the proposed changes are introduced.

Before I go on to my main remarks, I wish to pick up the comments of the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), who claimed with great fervour and determination that hon. Members could obtain relief on a second home. If he is claiming tax relief on the mortgage for a second home, he had better be careful, because the Inland Revenue will come down on him like a ton of bricks. We are not entitled to claim tax relief on a second home. The only people who can do so are those who have a second home for a dependent relative, and that dependence must be disability, age or, at a pinch, mental handicap. The provision does not apply to hon. Members. What we can claim is an allowance from our parliamentary allowance against the interest on any mortgage that we might pay —exactly the same as though we were paying rent. We can claim that, but not tax relief.

Mrs. Beckett: In a sense, the hon. Lady has made the point that I was about to make. I was about to say that she was nit-picking. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) talked about the assistance that Members of Parliament can get if they buy second homes. The hon. Lady said that his remarks were true. Whether she chooses to define it as tax relief on a second mortgage matters not to me or to my constituents — or, I suspect, to her constituents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we had better get back to the housing benefit that is mentioned on the Order Paper.

Mrs. Currie: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is simply a question of what we mean by the words we use. I was simply trying to assist the hon. Gentleman.

The housing benefit scheme was born of good intentions. It was intended to simplify the previous complicated rebates system, and it was intended that the DHSS should pay rent directly to landlords or to housing authorities so that there could be no abuse. I was the chairman of the housing committee in Birmingham when the scheme was introduced, and I welcomed it at the time and thought it was entirely laudable. But it is worth pointing out that, although all Labour Members have spoken tonight about the importance of the housing benefit system, when it was introduced, they voted against it. They did not want it in the form in which it was introduced, but now they want to keep it in the form in which it was introduced. They want no changes. They should remember some of the debates that took place before I entered the House.

Some of the problems that resulted from the scheme were caused partly by the lack of time to introduce it. That problem was recognised by the previous Minister of State and the previous Under-Secretary of State, and the period for the introduction of housing benefit was extended. Part of the problem was caused by the pressure for concessions, and the need constantly to recognise the extra needs and arrangements that were required. However, rough justice may be the best system. Every time we try to make the system fairer, we make it more complicated, and the complications destroy the fairness that we try to introduce.

The result is that the system is fiendishly complicated, with six separate tapers, different systems for rent and rates and different systems for the type of claimants. It has had unforeseen results that no one in the House would have wanted. It means that young people are better off leaving home than if they stayed at home. It destroys the link between rate-paying and voting. No one intended that to happen, but it did. It is so generous that, in many cases, a majority of the people in some areas are in receipt of benefit. In the ward that I represented in Birmingham which had almost half council tenants, in 1982, 50 per cent. were claimants of one sort of another. Now the figure is 75 per cent., and it is increasing. Their economic circumstances have not changed. What has changed is the generosity of the system.

The stigma now attaches to the people who do not claim benefit. One of my problems in my advice bureaux is trying to explain to good-hearted people, many of whom have worked in the mines, paid for their pensions and are comfortably off—thank God they are—that they are not entitled to housing benefit. So much for the stigma.

I suspect that many people who claim rate rebates, especially owner-occupiers, do not realise that some public expenditure is involved. They believe that their rates forms arrive with the rebates included, or simply crossed off, and that no transaction or handing over of money is involved. They repeatedly say to me, "I do not get anything from the state. I am not a scrounger. I do not get anything that I have not paid for." They do not realise that rate rebates, like many other benefits, are non-contributory benefits which cost the Government money. That money comes from other taxpayers, and if they are at the same time, as many of them are, occupational pensioners and taxpayers they are paying for their own rebates and they do not realise it.

Another aspect of the system which has escaped attention and not been mentioned this evening, is that the existence of generous non-cash-limited housing benefit means that no local authority has any incentive to keep down its rents. The Department of Environment for some years has imputed a rent increase each year as it calculates the rate support grant, housing investment programme and so on. I raised the rents in the year that I was chairman by more than that figure. I did it to get some money for repairs. Every penny was spent on housing repairs. I did it to encourage people to take another look at housing purchase, and we were successful at that as well.

I could do that with impunity, because the DHSS would pay. One of the results is seen clearly in a quotation from the Rowe report on the housing benefit review. In paragraph 1.20 he said:

> "Since 1979 rents and rates have increased much faster than inflation so that, according to DHSS figures, expenditure on rent rebates alone is now over 50 per cent. higher than it would have been than if rents and rates had remained at the same level in real terms as in 1979."

In other words, the existence of the benefit generates increases in rents. No housing authority has any incentive to keep down its rents.

Mrs. Beckett: That is the most stupid thing I have ever heard the hon. Lady say, and that is saying something. Is she completely unaware that the rise in rents has something to do with the £1·3 billion that the Government have cut from the general housing subsidy? It has nothing to do with the generosity of housing benefit. The cut in housing subsidy was justified by the Government because they said that they would be able to give housing benefit which would target help on the poorest—and now they are cutting housing benefit.

Mrs. Currie: Of course I am aware of that. I simply make the point that it is possible to increase the rents—and I did it, so I know what I am talking about—it is possible to increase the rents by more than the loss in housing subsidy, by more than the increase in rents enforced by the Department of the Environment, and by more than the money that is needed for repairs. It is possible to increase the rents by whatever figure one fancies, because the DHSS will pay.

It is not just Sheffield that has done that. It is every local authority in the country; and many of them are now achieving something which I regard as quite wrong, and that is a surplus on their housing revenue account—in other words, a profit, and the profit is coming from the DHSS.

Mr. Frank Field: I wish to return to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) made. We have had statement after statement from Ministers saying that they are deliberately putting up rents partly to encourage buying, as the hon. Lady has noted. The defence of that has been that those on lower incomes and those who are poorest will not be affected because of the rebate scheme. We have now had the rents increased, but we are having the rebate scheme cut. Surely that is wrong.

Mrs. Currie: I do not disagree with a word that the hon. Gentleman says, except his last sentence. He has described the situation very aptly. The sad thing—I am sure that he will join me in this—is that, despite all the extra money that has been spent on housing and despite the huge increase in housing benefit, so many people are still badly housed. There are more than 30,000 empty council properties in London alone waiting for repairs, but the money does not get spent on repairs. It gets spent in other ways, and to my mind that is quite wrong.

Something had to be done. The proposals in the Green Papers are intended to remove all that muddle and to replace it with something much simpler. By insisting that we all actually contribute to our rates, we will be restoring some local democracy. Surely everyone on both sides of the House can say that those are laudable intentions, just as we said three or four years ago.

I am afraid that I am a bit of a grotty old cynic. I have a couple of words of caution to offer to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench. The first refers to the remarks that were made by the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) about the small bills for the 20 per cent. that people have to pay towards their rates. He mentioned similarly the bills that we have to collect at the moment in the local authorities for water rate payments and so on. He was absolutely right. The average payment for rates by a council tenant is about £5 a week. If we are going to take 20 per cent. of it—that is £1 a week—and if we seriously think that local authorities will spend an awful lot of time chasing around for bills of £1 a week, I have to say that I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends are mistaken. What will happen is the same as with the water rates: the local authority will end up writing it off. The benefit to be achieved simply will not match the adminstrative costs.

Further, if my colleagues seriously think that people are going to start voting Tory in huge numbers in the inner cities because instead of paying £1·05 per week they may be asked to pay £1·10 per week I think that they are mistaken. I hope that I am wrong but I honestly do not think that that amount of money is sufficient to wake people up from their apathy of not voting or to change their voting intentions.

My other word of caution is directed to the Department of the Environment and the Treasury as much as to the DHSS. It came out of a discussion that we had yesterday in the Select Committee on Social Services, which is doing reviews of the reviews. My right hon. Friend the Minister was there. The Green Paper proposes to reduce the DHSS contribution to housing benefit administration and the actual contribution to housing benefit to about 80 per cent. At present, the DHSS pays 90 per cent. or 106 per cent. depending on the benefit. At present, local authorities have to find £135 million. We have seen various calculations which suggest that local authorities in the future will have to find anything from £400 million to £700 million extra.

According to volume 2 of the Green Paper, paragraphs 365 and 366, that will be taken into account in the rate support grant. Well, will it? If we seriously say to the Department of the Environment that we want £500 million extra for rate support grant, will it actually cough up? I hope so, because if it does not, there will be yet more rates increases, most of which will be borne by the ratepayers, and many more people will qualify for housing benefit. The poor old DHSS, which pays for just about everything else in this country, will then end up spending even more. I have a nasty feeling that the benefit system is so complicated and so all-embracing that almost every change will provoke howls of rage and end up costing us more. It is like trying to get a fat lady into a corset. It will all pop out somewhere else. I see my hon. Friend the Whip looking at me—I wish that he would not while I am talking about fat ladies and corsets.

If we do nothing about the situation, we simply bank up a bigger and bigger bill and yet more people will be claimants, including the most respectable people, who have never before asked or wished to claim a non-contributory benefit. People like that should not be drawn into this all-suffocating net. I applaud every effort made by my right hon. and hon. Friends to improve the housing benefit system and I wish them luck.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Please don't stop!

Hon. Members: She has already finished.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. Lady finished?

Mrs. Currie: Yes.

9.42 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Like the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) I also have a nasty feeling. I have a nasty feeling that the Government are continuing the process of milking the poor. Year after year they have "reorganised" the housing benefit system. There were reorganisations in 1983, 1984 and 1985 and the Green Paper seeks to continue the process into the future.

The reason for all this reorganising is that the Government have fallen into the trap to which the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South referred. By cutting central Government funding to local government, they forced local government to put up the rates. To get over that, they brought in a rate-capping system to ensure that local government could not recover for the benefit of their localities the money that had been taken from them by the Government. The Government also brought in a system which forced local authorities to put up rents.

Naturally, every time the rents and rates went up, the number of claimants increased. Indeed, we encouraged people to apply for benefits that were theirs by right. The Government have now recognised that consequence and the Green Paper seeks to do a rate-capping job on the poorest tenants. In my area we now have 21,525 council tenants claiming rent and rates rebates, 554 indirect ratepayers and 13,669 direct ratepayers claiming rate rebates.

That is a total of 35,748, or 41·63 per cent. of the population. Fifty per cent. of my constituents receive rent and rate rebates. That is a direct result of the Government's policy of forcing up rent and rates.

The new proposals are no more than an excuse to claw back some of the money that the Government are having to pay out. No figures have been provided. They have been left out for two possible reasons: first, so that calculations cannot be made and, secondly, to gauge the reaction of the country and then to provide the figures.

What will happen to housing benefits in November 1985? In June 1985 the Secretary of State announced the benefit uprating. The changes deliberately resulted in a cut in housing benefit entitlement for many recipients. About 50 per cent. of my constituents will be affected by the changes. It is estimated that 2 million households will suffer reductions and that 500,000 households will receive no benefit. Those who will be affected are poor people with families and pensioners. There will be a further twist to the spiral and a further increase in rent and rates. More people will try to obtain benefit from the housing benefit scheme. The Government will then have to pay out more money, which will result in a further twist to the downward spiral.

The Government were given the opportunity to introduce a scheme that would benefit people, not take benefits away from them. I accept that money for such schemes has to be found from somewhere, but money should not be taken from the poor to be given to those who are even poorer. Money should be taken from those who can afford it to help those in need. In that way the economy will grow, not decline. I am certain that we shall debate this matter again, because 50 per cent. of the population will be affected by it.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I hesitated to intervene in the argument about how many households could be provided with mortgage tax relief, but I am tempted to think that there ought to be some kind of tax relief for having to do this kind of thing twice over in one evening.

Two elements in the debate are related but distinct. I shall try to deal with some of the strategic questions that were raised by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). First, however, it would be sensible to say a few words about another element in the debate: last week's uprating and, in particular, the proposal about the housing benefit rates taper. I shall not rehearse the details of the uprating, apart from reiterating that against the background of a £2 billion increase it is ridiculous to say that the Government are solely concerned with cutting social security benefits.

The housing benefit needs allowances were fully uprated by 5·8 per cent. Far from housing benefit expenditure being cut, it is likely that this year it will be larger than it was last year, though just a little less large than it would have been but for the changes that we announced last week. About 7 million people will be helped by housing benefit, to which must be added a fact that was acknowledged by a few hon. Members—that about one third of a million low-paid families with children will receive additional housing benefit over and above what they would otherwise have received as a result of the real improvement in the child needs allowance.

That is the context in which the motion has sought to concentrate only on the proposal to increase from 9p in the pound to 13p in the pound the rate at which help is withdrawn from people in the upper ranges of those on housing benefit in respect of help received with their rates.

I wish to emphasise three points, even in relation to that proposal. First, someone on supplementary benefit will not be affected in any way at all. His housing benefit remains exactly the same. Secondly, no one with an income below the needs allowance is affected in any way at all. That means that no single pensioner will be affected who has an income below £48·55, and no married pensioner couple will be affected with an income of just over £71. No one at any level of income will be affected at all in respect of help with rent.

The hon. Member for Derby, South overplayed her hand in some of the figures she gave. She claimed that from November a pensioner couple paying £5 domestic rates would not be entitled to benefit with an income of £85. If she checks her figures, she will find that in November such a couple will still be on benefit with a weekly income of £90. That is the advice that I have been given.

It puts these figures in context when I repeat that the average loss for pensioners in respect of the housing benefit rates taper proposal is about 47p a week. That should be contrasted with the fact that the retirement pension is going up by £4 a week for a married couple. Put another way, a pensioner will have to have an income of £13 above the basic state retirement pension level to lose as much as 10p a week. That helps to put the matter in context.

Having made those remarks about the uprating, I come to the major theme of the debate, including the serious and thoughtful speech of the hon. Member for Derby, South about the review. So far as I can, I shall respond in like terms. To do so, I must begin by putting housing benefit into the broader context of some of the other proposals in the review.

Alongside the pension proposals and the family credit proposal, the most important theme of the review is one that I have emphasised on a number of occasions. This is probably the first attempt ever, certainly in 50 years, to look at income-related benefits as a whole. Beveridge did not do that job. In the succeeding period, things have turned out optimistically under any Government, but he assumed that income-related benefits would be a small tail to the system. That has never been true. In the years immediately after Beveridge, 1 million people were on supplementary benefit. It was 2 million in the mid-1960s, 3 million by the late 1970s and about 4 million now. Neither side of the House can crow about that record.

Because Beveridge had assumed that income-related benefits would be a relatively insignificant part of the system, no one has ever stood back and looked at it as a whole. There have been changes in supplementary benefit from time to time. We invented rent and rates rebate schemes and turned them into housing benefit. We invented FIS in the early 1970s, and that has been improved and extended since. But no one has ever attempted to look at the range of income-related benefits as a whole. They all have different rates and structures as well as their own complexities, and they have contributed mightily to the problems of the poverty and unemployment traps, which are now such a marked and unhappy feature of the British social security system.

Underlying the proposals on housing benefit, which have been the subject of so much criticism tonight, is the fact that for the first time there is an integrated approach across the range. There is a common basis of assessment using net income instead of a mix of net and gross income as at present. Perhaps more important still, there is a common benefits structure. Our family premium concept was carried through from one benefit to the other, and the age relationship for help with children was carried through from supplementary benefit to housing benefit into the proposed new family credit.

Alongside those two major simplifications in housing benefit, we are bringing rent and rates together with a single taper instead of two schemes with six different tapers, which lead to the sort of complications to which the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) referred.

Having presented in the review this pattern of income-related benefits as a whole, we will make a number of major gains. It virtually removes the unemployment trap in the literal sense of people being better off out of work than in work, and it greatly eases the poverty trap and in particular eliminates the possibility of marginal tax rates over 100 per cent.—in other words, that one gets worse off by earning more money. Those are major gains across the whole field.

In terms of housing benefit specifically, the structure that we have proposed produces for the first time a system which is fair as between those in and those out of work because it is giving help related to 100 per cent. of rent at the same level of income for supplementary benefit cases and those who are not on supplementary benefit. That in turn enables us to get rid of housing benefit supplement—one of the worst single complexities of the entire social security system—and it enables us to bring about greater equality of treatment between those receiving help with their rent and those receiving help with their rates — that is, between tenants and owner-occupiers.

All those changes—I ask Opposition Members who are critical of expenditure to concentrate attention also on these structural proposals—are major gains in terms of the efficiency of the social security system for any Government, whether this Government or any future Government, in making effective use of whatever resources they decide to spend. That is again regardless of the party political knockabout argument of how much money one spends at a particular time.

I had my doubts whether the hon. Member for Derby, South had fully understood the importance of this in her remarks about high rent schemes when she suggested that, as a result of the review, those who are affected by the current high rent schemes would suffer. One of the important points about going to 100 per cent. help at the same level of income in respect of rent is that the need for high rent schemes disappears. Those high rent schemes had to be invented as an additional complication to the system because we were giving 100 per cent. help to those on supplementary benefit, but help related to only 60 per cent. of rent for those who were not on supplementary benefit and standard cases. High rent schemes go out of the window not because there are great numbers of new losers automatically but because the system is fairer and more equitable between those two different groups of people.

These changes necessarily mean changes in the relativities among those who are on housing benefits. There will be some who do better than they otherwise would have done and some who do worse than they otherwise would have done. As the House knows, it is impossible for me to give figures of exactly what will happen because they depend on income support rates and other factors that we cannot yet settle.

Broadly, the position will be that those who have high rents or low incomes will do better than they otherwise would have done — a perfectly reasonable gain for targeting—and those who have lower rents or the higher range of incomes among those on housing benefit will probably do worse than they otherwise would have done. That is just another way of describing more effective targeting, which is what we are aiming at in the proposals.

I hope that Opposition Members, in continuing the political debate about how much money should be spent, will recognise the real gains in terms of the fairness and effective use of resources which these proposals make possible for any Government from the time of their introduction.

It seems to me that what underlines the motion as much as anything else is that argument about money. That reflects in turn the Labour party's persistent refusal to recognise that spending has to be paid for, and very often by those with very little more money than those one is seeking to help, and their refusal to recognise that the merciless inflation over which the last Labour Government presided did more damage to the poor than anything that the present Government have done on social security. What this motion shows more than anything else is that the Labour party has not thought seriously about the real problems of social security, let alone of its reform. Its position is simply that of a party that will say and do anything to get power — power which, if Labour Members got it, they would not have the slightest idea how to use.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's objective of securing a structure of income-related benefit which will ensure greater equality of help with housing costs for people at the same level of income, whether in or out or work, will remove the need for housing benefit supplement and will be simpler for staff to administer and for claimants to understand.

Armed Forces (Discipline)

10.12 pm

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): I beg to move,

That the draft Army, Air Force and Naval Discipline Acts (Continuation) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

The purpose of the order is to continue in force for a further year the Army and Air Force Acts 1955 and the Naval Discipline Act 1957, which together provide the statutory basis for discipline in the three services. Annual parliamentary approval for the special legal position of the service man is a long-established constitutional concept, and the current arrangements for a quinquennial Armed Forces Act and annual extension of the Service Discipline Acts by Order in Council were endorsed by the Select Committee examining the last Armed Forces Bill in 1981.

As the House will understand, I cannot anticipate the provisions of the next Armed Forces Bill, but, as the current Act expires on 31 December 1986, the House is aware that it can expect to have a relatively early opportunity to consider service disciplinary primary legislation once again. I shall, however, give the Government's view on certain of the recommendations and observations of the Select Committee on the 1981 Armed Forces Bill.

It may be helpful if I remind the House that, in the debate on the order last year, I gave the Government's response to the Select Committee's recommendation regarding the detention and treatment of those who are subject to service law overseas and who are certified to be suffering from mental disorders. That response appears in the Official Report of 3 July 1984 at column 267.

Another of the Select Committee's recommendations was that social inquiry reports on young service offenders should be more readily available to courts martial. Naval courts martial already have such information provided by the naval personal and family service.

I am glad to tell the House that, in co-operation with the Soldiers', Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association, SSAFA, we have introduced for a trial period of a year, beginning on 1 May this year, a system which will allow social inquiry reports to be provided in cases where a young army or RAF service man is appearing before a court martial charged with a serious offence. These reports will usually be provided by SSAFA's qualified social workers. Social inquiry reports may also be called for in other cases, if appropriate.

Additionally, the background information on character and circumstances, which is now routinely provided to a court martial on all offenders, regardless of age or seriousness of the offence, has been improved. I believe that these two changes will materially strengthen the quality of the information provided to courts martial dealing with young offenders.

I should like to take this opportunity of expressing my warm gratitude to SSAFA for the help that it has offered us in this important area, and indeed for the excellent work that it and its predecessors have done over the past century on behalf of service men's families. I know that the whole House will wish to congratulate SSAFA upon reaching its centenary anniversary and wish it well for the next hundred years in the very valuable and very important work that it does.

The Select Committee considered the powers under the service discipline Acts to hold temporarily in a place of safety any children of persons subject to service law overseas who are considered to be at risk, and asked for a report to the House on the working of those powers. Since the introduction of this new power on 1 May 1982, only three place of safety orders have had to be made, and two children have been transferred to the United Kingdom under administrative arrangements. To date the present system has worked satisfactorily, but we are considering whether the existing statutory powers should be strenghthened in relation to the transfer of a child back to a place of safety in the United Kingdom.

The Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation brought it to the attention of the 1981 Select Committee that the Charity Commission had ruled that the Royal Star and Garter Home for Disabled Sailors, Soldiers and Airmen could not extend its beneficiary class to include ex-service women. The 1981 Select Committee recommended that "the Government should give active consideration to intervening in this matter, whether legislatively or otherwise".

The House will wish to know that a separate trust has now been set up, which enables disabled ex-service women to have their own wing at the home.

The Select Committee also urged that the rebuilding of the military corrective training centre at Colchester be completed as expeditiously as possible. I am glad to tell the House that the rebuilding of the detention quarters at the MCTC was completed at the end of May this year.

The Committee rightly highlighted the potential danger to the armed forces of the rising tide of drug abuse observable elsewhere. While there is no sign that drug abuse is a major problem in the British armed services, the House can be assured that the prevention of drug abuse in the armed forces is taken extremely seriously. I and my ministerial colleagues in the Department are personally closely involved in that issue, and additional preventive measures are now being taken.

In March this year we set up in the Department a tri-service drug abuse prevention group both to monitor and to make recommendations on further improvements in the prevention and the detection of drug abuse. A new tri-service drug abuse prevention film is in the final states of completion, and all three services are strengthening their drug education programmes and reviewing their guidance on penalties for drug abuse.

In the Department and in the services themselves we take the view that drug abuse in any form is subversive to discipline and morale, totally incompatible with the formidable responsibilities that every individual in the services assumes, and cannot be tolerated. We shall spare no effort to ensure that the cancer of drug abuse does not take a hold anywhere in our armed forces.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I listened sympathetically to what the Minister said about drug abuse, and detection and prevention of that form of abuse. Are similar measures being taken vis-à-vis alcohol abuse? It is my view that, in civilian life, alcohol abuse is a greater problem than drug abuse. I wonder whether that is so for the armed services, too. If it is, what preventive measures are being taken?

Mr. Stanley: The Select Committee referred in its 1981 report to the problem of alcoholism, which is a matter that it has considered. I assure the hon. Gentleman that a close watch is kept on alcoholism in the services. Education on alcoholism is given as well. I am confident that it is a limited problem in the armed services.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): While it is known that alcohol abuse in the services is at the moment limited, drug abuse was also limited 10 years ago. Is my right hon. Friend aware that this problem could affect many more than it now affects?

Mr. Stanley: I take note of my hon. Friend's warning. I assure him that as I go round the services — hon. Members on both sides of the House who spend time with the services will endorse this — I notice that there is a great awareness of the dangers of alcoholism. The overwhelming majority of service men and women realise that the fitness that is required in the services and the training and fitness required for the battle fitness test means that someone with a strong propensity for alcohol would not do well in his service career. The service environment ensures that over-indulgence in alcohol would be a painful thing for someone doing the everyday jobs.

The annual debate on the continuation order inevitably tends to highlight the sectors where breaches of discipline may occur — the two interventions that we have heard show that. However, as the House recognises, the British Armed Forces are conspicuous not for breaches of discipline but for adherence to it. This is because our service men and women recognise that service discipline is a critical protection for themselves in the highly skilled, often fast-moving and sometimes dangerous work that they do. Anyone who is lax, disorderly, dishonest or disobedient is a serious liability. The service discipline Acts are a vital protection for those who serve in armed forces, and I commend the order to the House for approval.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I join the Minister in congratulating the SSAFA on its centenary and the work that it will do with young offenders and the mentally disturbed.

The right hon. Gentleman passed over one point rather quickly—the renewal of the Act, which must take place by 31 December next year. The Bill will have to be published early in 1986, if not before Christmas, to enable a Special Select Committee to be appointed to look into the matter. I believe that it is one of the quirks of the House — perhaps quirks is the wrong word to use about this august body — one of the customs of the House that every hon. Member is entitled to serve on that Committee.

The Minister has given us a sign of some of the changes that might take place in that legislation, and some of the actions that the Government have taken on the recommendations made by the last Special Select Committee. In many ways, what he has announced is welcome. There are no state secrets in this matter, and the Secretary of State for Defence is a believer in open government — hence his announcement of the Crickhowell decision yesterday rather than in a week's time. In the interests of open government, it would be helpful if the House could see the papers going around the Department on a variety of matters that are likely to appear in the new Discipline Act. These are not state secrets but will be discussed. There might be contrary opinions, but we all want the good welfare of and discipline in the armed forces, and it would be helpful to have some ideas of the discussions that are taking place.

We have been given an idea how the Government have met some of the Select Committee's recommendations. There were other recommendations, however, and it would be helpful to know why the Government are not able to accept some of them and why they have taken a given course of action.

I welcome the Government's decision to establish a special trust to deal with the disabled and wounded at the Star and Garter home. There was an anomaly and I only regret that it was not possible for the Charity Commissioners to find some way in which to amend the trust that established it rather than the Government having to establish a special trust, because there is still a distinction which I should have preferred not to exist.

We must also welcome what the Minister said about the SSAFA report. The Select Committee said that its terms of reference did not allow it to take evidence outside the United Kingdom. That Committee would have liked the opportunity at least to visit Germany to see conditions there and to talk to people of all ranks involved. The largest proportion of our armed forces abroad are in Germany and they face some of the most difficult problems. I hope that the Government, when establishing a special Select Committee, will enable it to take evidence outside the United Kingdom.

As for the role of SSAFA, we must welcome the decisions that have been made, especially with regard to young offenders. I am not at all certain what the role of the SSAFA welfare officer will be. I am not clear about his legal position or the status of his report. To what extent is it privileged? Is he completely analogous to a welfare officer who gives a report to a civilian court? Will he be properly protected?

The Minister said little about morale in the services, but discipline and morale go hand in hand. A force with high morale is well disciplined and, in those circumstances, we should have to have no recourse to these Acts. We know from what has been reported to us, however, that morale has suffered quite a blow in the past few years. The outflow is greater now than for some time and increased by more than 8 per cent. this year over last year. The outflow for some ranks is as high as 10·7 per cent.

The Government might tell us—they frequently have —that, compared with the Labour Government, they are restricting the flow. The Government have now been in power for six years, so they are now responsible for the outflow. It is remarkable that, to save £17 million, the Government are prepared to lose two Harrier trained pilots who cost £200 million in terms of training, service and input. Those figures are not mine but appeared in the Daily Telegraph. The straight training of a pilot officer can cost £3 million. We need to lose only three replacements and £17 million has gone. Moreover, overseas allowances are being swallowed up. It was a case of the Government saving the candle ends and losing the whole electricity supply, when they took that decision. It has caused morale at all levels to fall. Some Conservative Members have tried to argue that if the forces had learnt about the decision in a different way — if the commanding officer had learnt about it and told his men differently — morale would not have fallen. It is a real blow to morale to get a wage cut.

It is not fair to regard the allowance merely as a straightforward cost of living allowance—it is more than that. It is compensation for serving abroad, and meets the additional expenses incurred living abroad, such as the extra cost of returning home for a single service man, telephone calls to the girlfriend, and extra presents taken home for mother and father. Those matters are all real, and increase expenses. Single service men, especially single privates and leading aircraft men, have suffered most from the cuts in Germany, and it is affecting their morale. Hon. Members on both sides of the House who have been abroad and visited the troops have all returned and said that that matter is rankling the forces. They are extremely upset about it.

If there had been a by-election in Aldershot, instead of in Brecon and Radnor, the cuts in local overseas allowances would not have been made, in an attempt to preserve the Army vote. I am not wishing that the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) should have to fight a by-election. It is interesting that now that the Prime Minister is safely ensconsed in Milan, he felt it safe to go again to the Members' Dining Room for a meal.

I wish to turn to the question of drugs, which the Minister raised. The whole House will welcome the steps that have been taken, especially because when we last raised the matter in the House the Minister seemed to cast the figures for drug abuse lightly aside when he referred to them as microscopic. We now have a special unit which, I presume, will base its experience on the successful work in reducing drug abuse in the Royal Navy. I should like to know the numbers engaged in that work within the tri-service unit. Are there any special corps of the respective police forces of the armed forces involved in it, designated specifically for the purpose of chasing drug offenders and preventing drug pushing? That is especially interesting regarding Germany where there is easy access to drugs which come to northern Europe, especially through the Dutch ports. What is the cost of the unit? I believe that the Select Committee will want to look at that in considerable detail when it investigates these matters because that matter engaged its attention last time.

In replies to my questions no distinction has been made between hard and soft drugs, and their abuse in the services. It would be interesting to know whether the new units will concentrate their efforts first on preventing hard drugs and then on educating service men out of the abuse of soft drugs. We welcome the decision that has been taken.

That, to a certain extent, finishes my words of congratulation. During the past year there has been an enormous volume of matter and detail, which the new Select Committee will want to study, but which should be mentioned as the House has not yet had a proper chance to discuss it and, therefore, hon. Members have not received answers to any questions that they may have. The first is the suggestion in some of today's newspapers—I do not wish to go into the merits of the case—that there was a slackness in procedures when dealing with the spy case. The NCO who gave evidence admitted that he had not kept a full check when men were taken out for interrogation by the special branch. I do not suggest that anything untoward happened, but the fact that records were not kept must be examined, because it is important in all cases to pay meticulous attention to detail in the procedures followed, not only in the interests of the accused but in the interests of the men who look after prisoners.

Secondly, this has been a remarkable year for lost documents. Documents have been found in rubbish heaps and have fallen off the backs of lorries, and now we hear of documents being stolen from the home of a rear-admiral. Will disciplinary proceedings be taken against that rear-admiral for having some restricted documents in his home, or were they documents that he was allowed to take home? These are important matters, because we can perceive a general air of laxity. The documents that were found on the rubbish heap contained details of Tornado servicing. The documents that fell off the back of a lorry contained naval secrets. Some restricted papers concerning Trident were stolen from the home of a rear-admiral. I am sure that the Select Committee will wish to examine those matters. I do not expect precise answers to those queries, but I believe that the Minister should be aware of the anxiety that has been caused.

This year, we had an interesting change in Queen's regulations, which did not have to come before the House, extending the curb placed upon members of the armed forces to join movements or take part in marches. That seemed to restrict considerably the political activities of members of the armed forces. I do not suggest that service men should parade round in their uniforms demanding the removal of the Prime Minister. But there should be opportunities for service men to take part in normal marches and demonstrations. They should not be disciplined, as citizens — albeit special citizens — for taking part in normal political activities. What if there was a demonstration against the loss of housing benefit—a matter which we discussed in the House earlier today? Would that be regarded as a movement or a march in which a service man could not participate without fear of disciplinary proceedings? We must examine the new restrictions that have been placed on free discussion and free participation in political activity, in addition to the rigorous rule that has existed until now.

This year, we have also seen the development of pink and yellow cards. The pink card is given to service men serving at Greenham or Molesworth, and wherever we store missiles or other weapons, enabling them, in certain circumstances, to shoot at unarmed fellow citizens of the United Kingdom. Those cards have a restricted legal value. For example, in Northern Ireland the yellow card has been regarded as a policy document, not in any way as the conclusive defence of a soldier. The issue of such cards has made the Army more an instrument of government than an instrument of an objective state.

It is possible, under many of the regulations, for such matters not to be properly examined, because they do not conform with the old common law procedures, which allowed troops to be used to quell civil disturbances only at the request of a magistrate. The matter could always be examined in the courts. The new proposals in these documents can give a false sense of security to the service man involved, who might believe that he is protected by the regulations and the advice given on the cards. That defence would not stand up in court.

Secondly, it might be used as an excuse or justification for action which otherwise would not be permissible. There are two different ways of looking at the problem which is a difficult one for the troops. We must study it carefully, because pink cards are also issued to American service men. They are not bound to carry them as our service men are, nor are they subject to our courts as our service men are.

There have been some recent incidents in Northern Ireland where it seems that the yellow card procedure has been completely ignored. I do not wish to develop that matter further, because those incidents are still before the courts. They are matters which cause anxiety.

I should like to deal with some of the discipline problems that arise from the visiting forces legislation. There has been an increase in the number of foreign forces. They are not subject to our common and civil law, as our armed forces are. That requires careful re-examination. I hope that that is something to which the Government can agree. It is time to re-examine the Visiting Forces Act 1952. It might be something for the Select Committee on Defence to study. It is a matter of contention. The British soldier is put at a disadvantage compared with a visiting soldier.

There are other interesting discipline matters. There is the strange position whereby the mark 19 automatic grenade launcher, which can fire a ball of steel through an inch of steel at two miles at 350 rounds a minute, is being deployed at Greenham common. The Under-Secretary has said that it is a standard infantry weapon for use against armed attack. We have been told, however, that our troops, subject to our discipline, are responsible for the perimeter fence at Greenham common, and Molesworth. We have had the splendid example of the Secretary of State wearing his first and only battle honour on his flak jacket at Molesworth.

There is the problem of the use of those automatic grenade launchers by the United States army. Why do they have 19 of them at Greenham common? If they must be there, why are they not controlled by and under the discipline of the British armed forces? They are infantry weapons to be used against armed attack, but who are they going to be used against?

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): I appreciate my hon. Friend's anxiety. Although he may be opposed to the siting of cruise missiles in this country, is he not reassured that if anyone tries to raid or gain control of those nuclear weapons, such as the Spetsnatz, about whom we have heard a great deal, they can be repelled? Would he like to see the boy scouts guarding nuclear establishments? Whether or not one agrees with nuclear weapons and cruise missiles, it is important that if sensitive nuclear weapons are potentially available to terrorists or a major enemy, I find it reassuring — that they are properly guarded.

Mr. McNamara: The Front Bench is always grateful for my hon. Friend's support on these matters. The issue is who controls those weapons. I was going on to argue, had my hon. Friend let me continue — in my usual courteous way I was prepared to give way the moment that my hon. Friend raised himself to this feet—about from whom those weapons were going to protect us. They will not protect us from an airborne attack or from the special manoeuvre group troops. The only people from whom they can protect us are the Greenham women.

I see no reason why those arms should be in the hands of American personnel who have no responsibility for the defence of the perimeter rather than in the hands of the

[Mr. McNamara]

British Army or the Royal Air Force regiment. That means that we have no control over them. We want to know why they are there and why 19 of them are needed with a capacity of 350 rounds per minute, which rounds are capable of going through an inch of steel at two miles. If I lived in any of the surrounding villages I should be a good deal more worried, consciously at any rate, about those weapons getting into the wrong hands than about the cruise missiles getting into the wrong hands.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman is straying somewhat from the motion, which relates to terms of service, discipline and punishment in the armed forces.

Mr. McNamara: I was considering the discipline to be applied and the distinction between United States and British personnel in the use of these weapons. Why are they treated differently not just in terms of the orange card but in terms of the weapons issued to them?

At the time of the increase in wages and the cut in overseas allowances, the Government were criticised for being more interested in money and efficiency than in man management and contented forces. The Ministry of Defence responded to that criticism by claiming that a parcel of measures designed to improve terms and conditions of service, living conditions and general morale had been knocked on the head by the Treasury. The Daily Telegraph stated:

"A package of improved 'conditions of service', strongly advocated by the Defence Ministry, has been under protracted and sterile negotiation with the Treasury.

In failing to implement any of these measures, along with the pay increases, the Government lost a major chance to show goodwill."

We are prepared to support the Government in showing good will to the armed forces. We should therefore be happy to know what was in that package to which the Treasury took such exception. What was in the package which made it impossible for the Treasury to agree to such a gesture of good will? If the Minister will tell us, we shall be happy to support him in fighting the Treasury to obtain that package for our armed services.

It may be, of course, that there was never any such package and that the claim was no more than a smokescreen put up by the Ministry of Defence to defend itself against accusations from all parts of the House that morale in the forces was very low indeed, as those of us who have visited them know.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), as I know that in his heart he is a great supporter of our armed forces and all our service capabilities.

I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's comments about the loss of documents. We must all be concerned about any possible leakage. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister agrees that any such loss, no matter how small, must always be treated as a very serious matter. However apparently insignificant a document may be, it could nevertheless be of value to the enemy in piecing together the jigsaw.

I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the services should indulge in political activities. They should remain aloof from politics and serve the Government, be it a Conservative, a Labour or any other Government, and not meddle in politics. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the legal position of the orange card ought to be defined. I do not know what power it confers. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces could tell us.

I know that the hon. Gentleman's party is worried about the role of the visiting forces, but the important question is not who owns but who protects the cruise missiles. The hon. Gentleman put his finger right on the matter when he asked who is responsible for guarding them. I am not concerned about the niceties of the position of visiting forces but about whether we are sufficiently cognisant of the responsibility that is placed upon us to ensure that those weapons are properly guarded and are not activated without our authority. It is a very grave responsibility.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's remarks about SSAFA's centenary. It renders a unique service to service men and to their families. The whole House is united in the hope that SSAFA will continue its good work for another century. It does not seek publicity, but it is always there to provide a service, and service men acknowledge its value.

As for service discipline, it has never been higher. The hon. Gentleman referred to the 8 per cent. of service men who have left the Armed Forces, but that does not affect discipline, or the service that they render. Service discipline remains intact.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister of State's reference to young offenders. We realise that these young people face great difficulties. I welcome also the attack upon drug abuse by the Ministry of Defence. I think that alcohol abuse could also be a problem in the future, and I am glad that my hon. Friend said that this problem is already being tackled.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North referred to the loss of the service man's overseas allowance. The Government may be open to criticism because the commanding officers were not given sufficient time to put this over to the men under their command. Perhaps we may be guilty, but nothing in life is perfect.

Mr. McNamara: I was not suggesting that the fact that the commanding officers did not have the opportunity to put it across properly meant that the matter was justifiable or that that was a suitable excuse. I was arguing that it was wrong for the Minister to advance that as a reason why it was taken so badly. I was simply saying that a wage cut is a wage cut, and that was the way it was faced.

Dr. Glyn: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. Gentleman, but I am sure that my hon. Friend will answer that point. I apologise if I did misinterpret the hon. Gentleman. I thought he expressed the view that I take —that this was looked upon as a cut and that adequate notice was not given to commanding officers to explain the situation. I am sure my hon. Friend will touch on that important point which affects army discipline.

I note what was said about the Disabled Trust. We ought to have done this many years ago, and I welcome any movement in that direction.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North mentioned the rebuilding of the barracks. I also represent a garrison town, and I have a particular interest in the rebuilding of Victoria barracks, Windsor.

I know that the Government are doing everything they can to speed this up. I appreciate that there are certain difficulties, but it is not on for soldiers to change in a barracks and then to go on parade. If our soldiers are to perform the functions required of them in Windsor, it is important that those barracks are rebuilt as swiftly as possible. There are technical difficulties which the Government must overcome — for example, there are great problems with regard to the Property Services Agency — but this rebuilding should take place at the earliest possible moment. I have had tremendous co-operation from my hon. Friend's Department. I hope that will continue so that we can ensure that the barracks are rebuilt.

This is a discipline matter, because the conditions under which our soldiers are asked to operate will in the long term affect the desire of people to serve in the brigade.

I welcome many of the things said by my hon. Friend and reiterated by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North. Never before in the history of our nation have our services been called upon to play such a difficult role, under difficult conditions, in so many parts of the world. That involves the use of sophisticated weapons, and our forces are discharging those duties with great distinction. I wish them well in the future.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My practical experience of military discipline is severely dated. It is many years since I served with the Royal Military Police, but, like many hon. Members, I continue to take an interest in the wellbeing and welfare of the personnel of the armed forces.

Like the hon. Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn), I am concerned about alcohol abuse, but I was somewhat reassured by what the Minister said about this form of addiction. I believe I am right in saying that the Minister's Department has statistics which detail the number of members of the armed forces who have been proceeded against for offences relating to drug abuse. The Minister may also have statistics of those who have been dismissed from the services because of drug abuse. Does the Minister's Department have any statistics of those who have been proceeded against or dismissed from the services for alcohol abuse or offences brought about by alcohol abuse?

I, too, welcome the involvement of the professional welfare officers employed by SSAFA to deal with what with in civilian circumstances one would call social background reports. These welfare officers, in some instances, have to work with social work departments and other civilian agencies. It certainly is a step forward.

If we have highly efficient disciplinary procedures, it is essential that we also have a humane grievance procedure, which I believe in the main we have in the armed forces. I wish to ask the Minister about the counselling that members of the armed forces receive when, perhaps for medical reasons, they have to leave the forces unexpectedly early. Had it not been for the absence of my secretary—and it was not without leave—the Minister would have received a letter today concerning a constituency case. A letter is on the way to the Minister.

A young lad in my constituency who was serving with the Parachute Regiment was dismissed from the forces because of a medical complaint. This confused, bewildered young man came to my surgery last week, wondering what he could now do in civilian life. From what he said to me under my questioning, and with my military experience, albeit outdated, I was left with the impression that this young man had not received much counselling or, if he had, that it was of the most perfunctory kind. If that is the case—and, in fairness to the Minister, he does not have the details yet—it is a matter of deep regret.

We need an effective disciplinary code for those who serve in the forces. At the same time, a human grievance procedure is required. As part of that procedure—and I define the word grievance widely, with which I think the Minister will agree—it is important that those who have to leave the armed forces unexpectedly early and involuntarily should be afforded the courtesy of effective and humane counselling in order the better to equip them for the changed circumstances with which they are faced.

11.4 pm

Mr. Stanley: With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the comments that have been made during this brief debate.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) devoted much of his speech to comments on morale in the services. I do not in any way contest his comment that, over the past two years, there has been an increase in outflow from the services and in the number who are exercising their right to premature voluntary exit. I must repeat the points that I made in the recent debate on the Defence Estimates. That increase has taken place from a record low level over the past 10 years. The rate of premature voluntary exit from the services is barely more than half the rate during the last two years of the previous Government when it was at an all-time high for the previous 10 years. The position now is altogether much more healthy than at the end of the period of the last Administration.

This Government, unlike their predecessors, have a good record in fulfilling the recommendations of the Armed Services Pay Review Body. We have not allowed service pay to fall behind those recommendations in the way that was done under the previous Administration. We believe that, whatever the disappointment that those in Germany felt about the last LOA review, our service men and women in Britain and overseas are confident that in the present Government they have a Government who, are trying to give service men and women a fair deal in relation to the recommendations of the independent Armed Services Pay Review Body.

I understand the degree of disappointment that was felt when the LOA settlement was announced, but I must repeat what I have said previously: the LOA system operated by the present Government is, in essence, exactly the same system as was operated by our predecessors. It is a system to give compensation for the differences in the cost of living between this country and the places overseas where our service men and women are asked to serve. Where that cost differential narrows, it is inevitable and inescapable that there will be reductions in LOA, just as where there are widenings in that disparity, it is inevitable and inescapable that LOA will be increased. I must stress that in the same cycle of reviews in which LOA in Germany went down, in many other places it increased. That was very much welcomed by the service men concerned.

I refer the House to the full and excellent description that was given of the reasons for the last results of the LOA review in Germany by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement in his reply to the Adjournment debate on 20 May.

Dr. Glyn: We all understood the reasons on 20 May. The reason why an earlier announcement was not given to the commanding officers has not been explained. It is difficult for soldiers to understand the complexity of these arrangements. When LOA increases, they are delighted. When it decreases, they are disappointed. The reasons for the fluctuations have been well set out, but why were the commanding officers not given longer notice to explain to their men exactly why this settlement had to take place?

Mr. Stanley: I accept my hon. Friend's point. We shall look again at the mechanics of the way in which the results of LOA reviews are made public. In an area as large as Germany, there are large numbers of units and at any one time many men are out of the barracks training, and so on. Immediately the LOA result is posted on unit notice boards, the announcement goes public over the British forces broadcasting network in Germany and, naturally, becomes an immediate subject of interest to the media. It is inevitable, because on the day the notice is posted there will be many people out of barracks on exercises, and so on, that quite a number of them will hear through the instantaneous media, but I take my hon. Friend's point. I have looked very closely at how that particular announcement was handled this year and as and when the next LOA review takes place we will see whether there are lessons to be learned.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) referred to my comment about the attack we are making on drug abuse. He asked whether the new group is going to concentrate on hard drugs. The remit of the group is to look at all drugs right across the board—hard and soft, and solvent abuse as well. As part of the close attention which we are paying to this subject, we are refining and somewhat extending our statistical work and seeking to provide ourselves with better centrally held information on the types of drugs that are abused so that we have a proper, informed basis for further work and have details of the types of drugs that appear to be the main threat.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North also referred to the question of the rules of engagement cards. I cannot agree with the construction that he put on the cards in use by service men in the United Kingdom. The cards follow basically the same policy as has been followed for many years by successive Governments, and are wholly consistent with the policy of minimum force which successive Governments have accepted. The Select Committee on Defence has recently carried out a very rigorous and detailed study of the security of military installations in the United Kingdom. It has had copies of the rules of engagement cards and evaluated them very closely. Its conclusions on these cards certainly did not in any way bear out the construction which the hon. Member placed upon them.

The hon. Member referred also to the Visiting Forces Act 1952, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn). There, too, I felt that the construction which he placed upon that legislation was seriously at variance with the legal reality. The suggestion that United States service men are wholly outside the ambit of the process of law in this country is simply incorrect. I would refer him to an excellent and definitive description of the legal construction that should be put on the Visiting Forces Act that was given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department in the detailed speech which he made on 19 December 1983. It would be well worth while those interested in that legislation referring to that speech.

I would remind the hon. Member that the Visiting Forces Act which applies to our own country reflects an agreement between the members of NATO, a number of whom agree to have the forces of other countries stationed on their soil—not least, of course, ourselves. The legal position that United States service men enjoy in this country is in broad terms exactly the same as that which our own service men enjoy in Germany. That is something with which we are entirely content.

I would like to endorse the comments which my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead made about the very demanding tasks that are placed upon members of the armed forces and the very creditable way in which they carry out those tasks.

My hon. Friend also referred, as did the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, to certain incidents involving the loss of documents. I assure the House that the loss of any classified document, whatever the level of classification, is a matter of concern that is always investigated in great detail, and we do our best to seek the lessons that are to be learnt.

In the size of the organisation that the Ministry of Defence runs, the weight and volume of such documentation is enormous. For the transit of that documentation, we are in many cases dependent on the services of others who, by and large, work well for us. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North referred to some classified documents falling off a lorry. In fact, they fell off a post office van. That is being investigated carefully by the post office, and the lessons in that case will have been learnt.

I was sorry that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North chose to jump to instant conclusions, and to make his remarks on the record, about a report that appeared in the newspapers today about the loss of a classified document from the home of a particular senior officer. The hon. Gentleman, without informing himself properly of the facts, said that that officer should be disciplined.

I wish to make it clear that the officer concerned suffered a burglary of his home in which he lost a considerable number of personal possessions — the House will feel sympathy with him over that—and I am advised that only one document of the lowest possible restricted level of classification was taken. That one document was held in his home perfectly properly and correctly, under the normal rules, by the officer concerned. Therefore, the suggestions that the hon. Gentleman made were without foundation, and I am pleased to put that on the record.

This has been a useful and wide-ranging debate, and I hope that the House will now feel it possible to reach a conclusion on the order.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Army, Air Force and Naval Discipline Acts (Continuation) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 11th June, be approved.

EDUCATION

Motion made and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

That the draft Education Support Grants (Amendment) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 23rd May, be approved.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Question agreed to.

ANIMALS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

That the draft Deer (Firearms etc.) (Scotland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 3rd June, be approved.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Question agreed to.

Fairground Safety

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

11.18 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of fairground safety.

This has become a matter of wide public concern. It is of direct concern to every parent, for while every child loves a fairground, regrettably, every child is also a potential victim of tragic accident.

It is a matter of concern to Government, too, in framing safety requirements under the law, and I take this opportunity to compliment the Minister and his predecessor on the keen and positive interest that they have shown in this area of safety. I know that the Minister intends to keep the whole matter under review, and I hope that he will give serious consideration to the continuing concern of myself and many others. The subject is equally of interest to many right hon. and hon. Members, many of whom have had to deal with the aftermath of tragedy in their constituencies. I am particularly pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) here, because I know that he has a particular interest in the subject, and I understand that he generally thinks along the same lines as me.

I congratulate the Health and Safety Executive and its team of inspectors on stepping up their work on fairground safety, particularly on the thorough work that they did this week at the Newcastle Hoppings, about which I shall say more in a moment. I recognise, too, that the showmen involved have a vested interest in safety. Of course, they do not want accidents on their rides. They want to entertain, not cause misery. They want credibility, not public boycott. And naturally, they want to earn their living.

The Showmen's Guild of Great Britain has shown an admirably positive attitude towards safety. Together with the Health and Safety Executive, it has within the past year, implemented the new safety code, and is carrying out a valuable self-policing role. I pay a particular compliment to the Showmen's Guild national president, Mr. Whiteleg, who earlier this week travelled to Newcastle to meet me at the Hoppings so that we could together tour the site and examine safety in practice. We saw the log books that are now being kept by operators under the voluntary code of practice. We looked at the machines that were being run and at the safety measures that were recently introduced to make the various items of machinery more effective. Mr. Whiteleg is a genuine man, with honest purpose. If all showmen were as reliable, there would be fewer acccidents, and the voluntary code could be relied upon to be 100 per cent. successful.

Unfortunately, however, not all the showmen are as honourable as Mr. Whiteleg. Let me quote the words of Mr. Rodney Harrison, managing director of Harrison Brothers Amusements, who comes from the north-west of England. In an interview earlier this year he said:

"It's time somebody spilt the beans on a small rotten core within the industry. A few of them are getting away with murder under the present system of inspection. Faulty machines are camouflaged. I've done it, everyone's done it. I know for a fact that when the inspector arrives to check the safety of a fairground half the rides have parts missing, but if the inspector can't see inside the mechanism of a ride then he can't check it properly. There are lots of good people in the business but the rotten core, perhaps 5 or 7 per cent., have their activities covered up."

This week, in the centre of my constituency, on a 26-acre site on Newcastle town moor, has gathered Europe's largest travelling fair, known locally as the Hoppings. I welcome the fair. I welcome the fun and enjoyment that it will give to many in my area whose daily lives may be dreary and dull. I welcome the business that it brings to the many small businesses that have shows, rides and stalls, many of them local, others travelling from a distance. I am glad that this year has been largely accident-free.

Last year a 17-year-old girl, Julie Pearce, was trapped by her foot on the Superloop, a huge contraption that sends cars at incredible speed up to 60 ft or 70 ft above the ground and then down again. She was swung round by that machine and eventually flung out, falling 60 ft from the top to the ground. She is still in hospital 12 months later, having suffered multiple injuries. I am glad that she is now fast on the mend. It is a miracle that her life was spared.

Four weeks ago there was another accident in the north-east. A few miles from the Hoppings is the Spanish city at Whitley Bay on the coast. There a 12-year-old girl was killed and three others injured when the bolts on the safety harness of a machine called the twister sheared off. On 2 June this year, six people were hurt, two seriously, at Wolverhampton when the phantom chaser collapsed. On 6 May 19 were hurt, 14 treated in hospital, all children, when the chairoplane went wrong at a fairground at Felixstowe. On 27 April this year 17 were hurt, all aged between 11 and 16, at Dover when the "lifting paratrooper" collapsed. These are all fairly major incidents that have happened in the past three months.

In the past five years, according to the reply given to me by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, accidents causing major injury have trebled—from 13 in 1980, there were 20 in 1981, 23 in 1982, 28 in 1983 and 38 in 1984—a constant increase year on year. Over the past eight years, 25 deaths, 158 major accidents and 283 minor injuries have been recorded.

These figures do not show everything. They do not catalogue all the minor injuries and near misses. I shall quote a letter that I received this morning from a concerned mother:

"On Monday this week I went with some members of my family to the Hoppings on Newcastle Town Moor, and I accompanied my 3½-year-old son on the dodgem cars. A notice asked customers to ensure that children wore the safety belts attached to the car . . . I made quite certain Tim was wearing his properly. Unfortunately it wasn't enough to prevent a really rather nasty bump to his head, when our car and another collided. Tim was jolted forward and his forehead banged against the steering wheel. He cried for some time from pain and fright, and we got first aid from the St. John Ambulance on the site, but I'm glad to say it comes under the heading of 'minor injuries'. What concerns me, however, is that I feel it could have been avoided. The belt was not adjustable to take into account the quite marked variation in sizes and ages of children, and it was the great degree of slack left in the belt that allowed Tim to be virtually unrestrained in it.

" As a mother of three children, I know bumps and scrapes are part of childhood, and I know parents have responsibilities themselves to assess risks and hazards. However, with regard to dodgems (a tremendous favourite with even very young children of three and four) I feel that belts should be adjustable, or parents should somehow be informed of the risks involved to small children whose heads are level with the steering wheel. I hesitate to suggest 'no under-fives allowed', but I wonder if we were lucky in Tim escaping with only a painful bump. How common are broken noses, jaws, teeth and so on?"

One can tell from the tone of that letter that the writer is a responsible mother, and not prone to exaggeration or undue concern. One is aware that in this accident the bump was minor, but head injuries, by their nature, can easily become serious injuries. She makes a valuable point about safety instructions and gaps that still exist in safety procedure.

I hope that the examples that I have given illustrate the severity of the still remaining problem. I have said that the Health and Safety Executive has tried hard to tackle the problem within the existing framework of the law. It now has the voluntary code of practice that has recently become applicable. It is also carrying out more inspections than ever before.

However, the executive faces a number of problems. First, the law is vague. The Health and Safety at Work Etc Act is so general when it comes to applications to fairground sites that it is often extremely difficult to secure a prosecution. Both the law and the voluntary code lack teeth. Then there is also the pressure of time and work on the executive. The factory inspectors did better than ever before in the last year, but they were still able to carry out visits—single visits normally—to only 25 per cent. of fairgrounds. To put it the other way round, three quarters of all fairgrounds were not visited.

Under the law, there are no mandatory requirements for the Health and Safety Executive to inspect at regular intervals. There are no clear, defined legal requirements on safety harnesses, how they should be contructed, where they should be sited. There are not sufficient legal requirements on designers and manufacturers, on testing of equipment before it comes into service or on giving a type approval to new fairground machinery, often the source of the accident statistics.

The fact remains that the absolute duties under the Health and Safety at Work Etc Act that apply to a factory do not apply in the same way to fairground sites. Fairground sites nevertheless attract many children and the atmosphere is much riskier than the workplace or factory.

Even under the voluntary code, doubts have arisen about the nature of inspections and sometimes about the type of inspector selected. Because the code is voluntary and the onus is on the machine operator or fairground to choose the inspector, there are cases of inspections being done by people with few qualifications in machinery and engineering.

There are obvious shortcomings with safety harnesses. On Monday, when I visited the Hoppings with my 15-month-old daughter, I was encouraged to get on a rocket-shaped vehicle that goes round in a circle and goes up in the air when the passenger pulls a lever. It is a fairly old machine—I remember going on it when I was a child. It has an open cockpit out of which it would be extremely easy to fall, especially for a youngster who was in the wrong position while whirling around. As it moves fairly high above the ground, someone who fell out at speed could suffer serious injury. There was no safety harness in the machine and the operator was not aware of any safety risk. That shows that there is a long way to go on educating machine owners and operators.

The partnership between the Health and Safety Executive and the Showmen's Guild of Great Britain has operated well, but it could be developed so that there is a closer partnership because, ultimately, self-policing is the best answer. There must be a clearer framework for education into better attitudes and more awareness of safety so that showmen, who are brought up in a rather free atmosphere can be persuaded to think more in terms of safety requirements such as are found elsewhere.

We must give the law more teeth in regard to inspections, their frequency and who does them. There should be safety harnesses and we should consider type approval of machinery at the design stage. Such matters cannot be left to voluntary good practice. I hope that I would be the last person to encourage unnecessary laws, but legislation must be considered in this context. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will investigate that possibility and that change might be made by simple amendment, perhaps to the Health and Safety at Work Etc Act 1974, setting out responsibilities for showmen at fairgrounds.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is also worried about fairground safety and that everyone who is involved in what is now a sensitive area wants to do what is best for children, who need watertight protection from risk, for owners and operators and for the general public, as we are all involved with fairgrounds at some stage. I am confident that my hon. Friend will keep the matter under review and I hope that he will find it possible to tighten up present requirements. I look forward to hearing his response.

11.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): It is a convention when Ministers reply to Adjournment debates to congratulate the Member who initiated the debate. In this instance, I congratulate sincerely my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) on bringing the subject of the debate before the House and on the constructive way in which he has described what has been done. He has described some of the failings, which are clear, and made some useful suggestions for my consideration and that of the Health and Safety Executive and the Health and Safety Commission.

I pay a special tribute to my hon. Friend for the way in which he has done his homework, as it were, and for having taken the trouble to give the Showmen's Guild of Great Britain the chance to discuss with him what has been done.

I realise fully that every accident has its impact on the families concerned. Without reciting a list of accidents, I hope that my hon. Friend will convey my best wishes to Julie Pearce and others who have been injured, and their families, this year and in the past as a result of regrettable incidents.

I speak with considerable feeling on this subject because I take seriously health and safety issues and for two other reasons. First, I look for every opportunity to emphasise that safety needs to be built into operations and not merely bolted on afterwards. Secondly, during my Easter and summer holidays as a student I used to work at Battersea funfair. I was not involved with the passenger-carrying rides and I do not think that I would qualify for membership of the Showmen's guild, but I have had experience of working with those who provide so much entertainment for so many. I hope that they continue to earn a good living by providing safe amusement for those who visit fairs, whether fixed or travelling.

I invite my hon. Friend to have further discussions with the Health and Safety Executive. Some of his suggestions are technical ones, and I should prefer not to make an off-the-cuff reply. It is important that they are given proper consideration and that interest and expertise is shared with my hon. Friend. I do not want to give my hon. Friend much hope that there will be an immediate change in the law. I am not saying that everything is satisfactory but I consider the framework to be so.

The House will know that the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act 1974 was designed to avoid constantly changing the law on which it impinged. Instead, its aim was to impose overall duties. I shall quote from the foreword of the code of safe practice at fairs. It states that although the code does not itself have the force of either law or an approved code of practice, the Health and Safety Executive has instructed its inspectors to take it into account when considering whether there is compliance with statutory requirements. Failure to follow the guidance or other equally effective measures may lead to action by inspectors ranging from advice and warnings to the issuing of enforcement notices or even prosecutions, although ultimately it is for a court or tribunal to decide whether there has been compliance with the law.

I draw the attention of the House to appendix 1 on legal obligations, which spells out the parts of the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act which apply. It refers to section 2, which is the general duty of employers to employees. Section 3 is concerned with the general duties of employers to persons other than their employees. Section 4 relates to the general duties of a person connected with premises. I commend the entire code to the House. I know that other hon. Members are interested in this issue and my hon. Friend drew attention to the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). I know that there are others who would wish to be here.

The experience of the new code of practice will determine whether there should be more law. Any one who has read it, or the guidance notes produced by the Health and Safety Executive on the "Octopus" and "Waltzer" rides, will have seen that practical experience is being used in drawing up the requirements. Anyone who believes that to ignore the code of practice or the guidance notes will leave him free from prosecution if he does something wrong or allows a dangerous position to develop, is wrong.

Fairs have a great part to play, and it is only during the past 10 years that they have come under formal health and safety controls. I, too, pay tribute to the trade associations which are powerful in the industry and which have co-operated in bringing the code of practice into operation. They and anyone who studies the industry will realise the difficult nature of the industry in that little equipment is standardised, there is a great variety of rides, and there is often little supporting literature.

Accident levels had shown the need for something tougher than the previous Home Office guidelines, which came into effect after the tragic major accident at Battersea fun fair in 1972. After the various sections of the industry and the health and safety experts were brought together, the code of practice was produced to provide something more explicit about the responsibilities. The Health and Safety Executive recognised that, if trade associations were able to contribute their expertise and if they supported the code, enduring improvements to fairground safety would be more likely. The code was published in 1984, and provides a comprehensive statement on what fairground safety requires. I emphasise that it incorporates the best known practice in the industry.

My hon. Friend mentioned statistics. There is little doubt about the number of deaths and major injuries. We are likely to have had far better reporting of the number of incidents and minor injuries during the past few years than previously. The industry's co-operation has provided more encouragement to people to declare what has been happening. I know from talking to inspectors that part of the reporting mechanism, where the Health and Safety Executive is advised of an incident which may recur on the same sort of equipment elsewhere, makes it possible to take unsafe machinery out of operation until modifications have been made or until it has been checked to see whether the ride can be operated safely.

At the launch of the code my predecessor and the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission said that compliance with the code's provisions would be monitored closely and enforced where necessary. The Health and Safety Executive organised an extensive programme of visits to fairs to publicise and explain the code's provisions. It has gone on increasingly to enforce them. Many operators have made significant improvements to rides as a direct result of the code, and have prevented what otherwise could have been serious injuries to passengers.

I shall now deal with enforcement last year. The code was used without difficulty in serving 28 prohibition notices and 17 improvement notices from April 1984 onwards. The code has also been used as the basis for prosecutions under the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act over breaches of its provisions. The precise legal nature of the code is not necessarily as important as the fact that it is a practical back-up to the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act.

I wish to turn to a specific point which my hon. Friend made, which is the issue of safety belts and harnesses. I am advised that they are manufactured to British standard specifications, which is a high and recognised standard. Wherever possible, reference to them is incorporated in the guidance notes and recommendations. However, my hon. Friend raised an important point on the age of those involved in some rides and amusements. That is a matter on which I shall seek advice, and I shall write to him with details, if he has not already obtained information directly from the executive.

It is generally recognised that the code has been taken seriously not only by many fairground operators but by nearly all of them. If people do not take it seriously, they will be in breach of the code and will be liable to prosecution under the Act. If anyone knows of people who are wantonly disregarding the requirements of safety, he has no obligation to speak in general terms but instead to put in a report. It is the same as seeing people doing other dangerous things in other circumstances. There is a general community responsibility.

The code has attracted much international interest. The United States, Canada and European countries have recognised that the United Kingdom is the first country to produce a comprehensive code setting out detailed objectives for fairgrounds.

My hon. Friend drew attention to some of the sad and tragic accidents that have happened this year. We shall have to wait until the end of the year to get the full picture, but I assure him that, whenever a serious accident happens, it is examined, and that the results of that examination will be shared with and, if necessary, imposed upon the industry. I do not wish to sound as though I am saying that the Health and Safety Executive is against the industry. Only with co-operation can we have safety built in, not just bolted on.

I should emphasise what the regulations require. There should be daily inspection by the operator, and a requirement that every amusement device should be thoroughly examined at least once every 14 months. That should also be done following any repair or modification likely to have affected the integrity of the device. Every newly constructed passenger-carrying device should be tested by subjecting it to the maximum strains. Existing rides should be tested within three years of the code coming into operation, and every new device should be tested before it comes into operation. A log book should be kept to record all those tests and inspections, and a register must be kept which can be seen by the health and safety inspectorate. The role of the inspectorate is to investigate that those precautions have been taken. It is for the operator to determine whether the ride is safe.

In general, the principles in the code are sound and are being enforced by the Health and Safety Executive, with the back-up of the Health and Safety at Work Etc. Act. I look forward to following up this short debate with further parliamentary interest so that we can continue to ensure that amusements are as safe as is reasonably practicable and that people can enjoy themselves in safety.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes to Twelve o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

MINERS' AMNESTY (GENERAL PARDON)

Mr. Tony Benn, supported by Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Bob Clay, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Mr. Terry Fields, Mr. Martin Flannery, Miss Joan Maynard, Mr. Bill Michie, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mr. Martin Redmond and Mr. Dennis Skinner, presented a Bill to provide for a general amnesty for all those who were fined, imprisoned or otherwise punished by the courts, the National Coal Board or others, for acts done or offences committed during the 1984-85 strike by the National Union of Mineworkers; to secure that full pardons, reinstatement at work and compensation shall be offered to all the persons involved; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Monday 1 July and to be printed [Bill 172.]

Policing (London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

9.36 am

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): I am very pleased that the House today has the opportunity for a full debate on the policing of London. This is the third successive year that the House has had such a debate, and this is a welcome development. The policing of the metropolis is always difficult, frequently sensitive and sometimes controversial. The magnitude of the task, and the professionalism with which the police tackle it, have been particularly vividly illustrated by the events of the past few days. It is right, therefore, that the House as a whole should have the opportunity to debate the policing of London, but that I should precede that debate by once again paying a warm tribute to the special work of the Metropolitan police in combating IRA terrorism.

This debate is important, however, as part of a cycle of events, following the publication of the Commissioner's strategy report, which underlines both the accountability of the Commissioner to me as police authority for the metropolis, and my accountability to Parliament for the way in which I discharge that duty. Following discussion with me, the Commissioner published his strategy report last January. The report reviewed how far the goals set for 1984 had been achieved, and set a new force goal for 1985. I sent copies of the report to all right hon. and hon. Members for constituencies in the Metropolitan police district, and subsequently met many of them to discuss it.

I promised to take up personally with the Commissioner a number of the points raised at those meetings, and I met him for this purpose at the end of March. I was then able to write last month giving the Commissioner's detailed and constructive response to the comments made. To complete this round of discussions, I hope shortly, together with the Commissioner and his policy committee, to meet the local authority associations.

I rehearse this sequence of events to underline how real the lines of accountability now are. Compare this process of rational consultation and discussion with some of the antics of the GLC police committee. How can a body which produces a disgraceful piece of propaganda like its recent video expect to be taken seriously as a commentator on police affairs? The so-called police monitoring groups, most of them funded by the GLC, are even worse. They trade in rumour, smear and innuendo. They do not care about improving the policing of London. All they want to do is to drive a wedge between the community and the police.

Before looking at the Commissioner's plans for 1985, I shall review briefly the record of 1984.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): My right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned the GLC anti-police video. I am sure that he has seen it, like a number of right hon. and hon. Members. Does he agree that it is so serious and so damaging to policing in London, and therefore to people's freedom before the law, that the film should be withdrawn immediately if the GLC has any pretence to a genuine interest in the welfare of Londoners?

Mr. Brittan: I have publicly expressed my horror of the film, which I have indeed seen. The GLC would rescue at least a scintilla of its reputation for objectivity if it withdrew that film.

The Commissioner set his force four goals in 1984. The first was to maximise performance through the most effective use of manpower. The strength of the Metropolitan police, both police officers and civilians, has increased significantly since 1979. The Commissioner now has considerable manpower at his disposal and it is right for us to look to him to use this to the best advantage.

This means, above all, ensuring that police officers are not behind desks doing jobs which do not need police powers, skills or training. The measures that the Commissioner has been taking to achieve this have had considerable success. In the year ending in April, the work done by nearly 150 officers was taken over by civilians, so that those police officers were freed for operational duties.

The second goal was to minimise criminal opportunity through crime prevention, public contact, involvement and co-operation. Nobody living in London can fail to be aware of the enormous amount of effort the Metropolitan police have put into this in the last year. There has been a profusion of new schemes and initiatives. To pick out two impressive statistics, at the last count, there were 1,282 neighbourhood watch schemes in operation, with 515 more planned, and there are 21 crime prevention panels.

The credit for that lies of course with the members of the public involved, as well as the police. Their role will increase in importance. Experiance suggests that, while the police can apply the energy to get a neighbourhood watch scheme or a crime prevention panel going, only the public can supply the stamina necessary to sustain it. The latest British crime survey, which will be published shortly, shows that nearly 90 per cent. of people nationwide believe that neighbourhood watch schemes would work, and about two thirds of those questioned would themselves be prepared to take part.

The Commissioner took as his third goal the enhanced detection of certain criminal offences — robbery, burglary and auto-crime — by the use of advanced detection techniques. Overall, there was an increase of 9 per cent. in the number of offences recorded in 1984, roughly in line with the national increase of 8 per cent. This figure is obviously disappointing, particularly when set against the decrease of the previous year. But it should not be allowed to obscure some real achievements.

The number of offences cleared up rose by 9 per cent. The clear-up rate — the House will know of the reservations widely held about the value of clear-up rates as a measure of police effectiveness—stayed constant at 17 per cent., despite the increased demands made on the police. There have been notable successes with some of the specific offences targeted by the Commissioner. The number of burglaries cleared up has increased overall by 15 per cent. and the number of domestic burglaries cleared up by 28 per cent. This has resulted in a slight increase in the clear-up rate for burglery. It is also encouraging to note that the number of burglaries recorded in the first quarter of 1985 was 9 per cent. lower than in the first quarter if 1984, and that there was a 4 per cent. drop in burglaries in England and Wales as a whole.

Where success has been achieved — the Commissioner would be the first to recognise that it has not been universal—it has not been due to fluke or good fortune. It has resulted from the application of sophisticated analytical and detective techniques. The Commissioner will be looking to improve these techniques further, particularly in the gathering and analysis of intelligence.

The fourth goal was to improve the management and organisation of the force. The major development here has, of course, been the force reorganisation, with which I shall deal in some detail later. But the Commissioner has taken a number of other initiatives, independently of the reorganisation, to hone the management of the force. For example, a ready reckoner of costs was issued to districts, divisions and certain headquarters branches. This will help senior officers to identify the costs of different courses of action, and to instil generally a greater cost consciousness.

One factor had a profound effect on the Metropolitan police last year—a factor which could not possibly have been foreseen when the Commissioner drew up his strategy. That is the miners' dispute. The aid supplied by the Metropolitan police to other forces was of enormous importance. Over the period of the dispute, the Metropolitan police supplied an average of 810 officers per week for periods of up to eight days to meet requests from chief officers of other forces.

The Commissioner sought to minimise the impact of the dispute on London by maintaining essential cover as far as possible. A measure of his success was that the number of arrests made for notifiable offences increased by 5 per cent. last year. Training, on the other hand, was postponed, and many desirable activities, such as crime prevention and community relations, had to take second place.

Part of the strain was taken up by the Metropolitan police special constabulary. The specials had to take on many demanding duties in support of their regular colleagues. They responded to the challenge magnificently. Their contribution is a fine example of public-spiritedness. All special constables deserve our gratitude and respect.

Ultimately, the impact of the dispute fell on individual Metropolitan police officers—and their families. They had to spend long periods away from home, performing duties which were always arduous and sometimes dangerous. I wish to place on record my gratitude for the tremendous contribution that they made to the policing of the dispute. They can look back with pride to the part they played in the policing operation. Their efforts helped to secure the preservation of a basic liberty—the freedom to go to work.

I come to the Commissioner's plans for 1985. First, I will state the position about the resources available to the Metropolitan police for this year. There have been no cuts in their budget. In fact, the Metropolitan police have more resources than ever before. Let us examine the record. When we took office in 1979, the establishment was 26,589. It now stands at 27,165. More important, in May 1979, the strength was 22,225, 4,364 below establishment. At the last count, the strength was 26,699. The total strength — civilians as well as police officers — has increased by no fewer than 5,850.

To put it in perspective, the increase in police strength is roughly equivalent to the entire force in Merseyside, one of the largest provincial police forces. The budget for 1985-86 is £763 million, 5 per cent. higher than the equivalent figure for last year. These are considerable resources by any standards. Of course, anyone running the force would ideally like still more, but the Commissioner accepts that resources are finite and that the existing resources must be put to best use.

The Commissioner has made it clear that the force, like everyone else, must live within its means. Like any other large organisation, there is scope for increased efficiency in the use of resources. Last year, for the first time, I decided that the Metropolitan police budget should be cash-limited. There is nothing new or unusual about cash limits. This year, 62 per cent. of Government public spending is cash-limited. Almost all defence spending, for example, is cash-limited, as in my Department is the prisons Vote.

The introduction of a cash limit does not mean a reduction in expenditure; one can increase expenditure enormously and still need a cash limit. The point is, rather, that a cash limit is a healthy discipline and a spur to increased efficiency. It means taking budgets seriously. Indeed, the Commissioner makes the point clearly in his annual report that the cash limit underpins all his other efforts to sharpen up the efficient management of resources.

It is against the background of increased resources for the Metropolitan police that the recently announced reduction in planned expenditure should be viewed. After the cash limit was set in February, it became apparent that there would be unforeseen increases in parts of the budget. Therefore, properly and prudently, the Commissioner took stock of the situation and decided on compensating economies in other areas. But, as he has pointed out, many of these are simply a matter of good housekeeping. The strategy for 1985 remains fully in force.

That strategy consists this year of a single goal—to improve the quality of service to the public—and that goal will have four elements. The first—carried over from 1984—will be the reduction of opportunities for crime through crime prevention initiatives and fostering contact, involvement and co-operation with the public. One of the main aims will be the further development of community-police consultative arrangements. These arrangements have been on a statutory basis since the beginning of this year, when section 106 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 came into force. The Act places a duty on the Commissioner to establish consultative arrangements throughout the Metropolitan police district, taking account of the guidance that I issued on 25 January. To date there are arrangements broadly conforming to the guidance in 26 of the 40 boroughs and districts. The Commissioner will be doing all that he can to fill the gaps as quickly as possible.

The Commissioner is—as he is required to do under the Act—consulting the local authorities concerned. Some are still considering their response. Others, such as Hackney, have said that they will not take part in any arrangements which are not based on their police committees—committees which purport to hold the Metropolitan police to account. I have two comments about that position. First, their approach is contrary to the law that Parliament has laid down. Secondly, there can be no justification for these boroughs trying—for purely political reasons—to block the setting up of consultative arrangements which would be of inestimable benefit to those living in the boroughs.

These attempts will not succeed. Consultative arrangements will be established in those boroughs. The Commissioner and I would both greatly prefer that the borough councils take part, but if they refuse they cannot be compelled to do so, and arrangements will have to be set up without them.

The second element of the goal for 1985 is, again, the enhanced detection of specified target offences. The Commissioner has added to the list two areas which have rightly caused profound concern over the past year: drugs and racial attacks.

London has suffered more from the menace of hard drugs than any other part of the country. The Commissioner is fully aware of the gravity of the threat that they present. The central drugs squad has been committed to the investigation of large-scale suppliers and manufacturers of drugs. This has had results. The amount of heroin seized has quadrupled. In the force as a whole, there were more drugs seizures in 1984 than the year before. 25 kg of heroin, 3·7 kg of cocaine and 747 kg of cannabis were seized. Arrests for trafficking rose by 31 per cent. At the local level, district commanders have taken a wide variety of initiatives, many of them as part of a co-operative effort with other local agencies. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary visited a very encouraging project in Southwark last January. More, much more, remains to be done. The Metropolitan police will be taking a full part in the national police commitment to deal with drugs crime.

I am sure that the House will also welcome the increased priority attached by the Commissioner to eradicating racial attacks. It is intolerable that whole communities in the east end of London—hard-working and law-abiding communities—should have their lives blighted by the fear of racist violence. My hon. Friend the Minister of State visited Tower Hamlets in February to discuss the situation with community representatives and the police. What he saw left him in no doubt that the problem is a grave one, but one which is being tackled with a will. The police cannot solve it on their own, but the Commissioner intends to ensure that they respond promptly and effectively to attacks; and, in the wider context, to develop a multi-agency approach to the problem, which I think is what is needed.

The force reorganisation is the principal part of the third element of the force goal for 1985—the effective, efficient and economical use of resources. This is probably the most fundamental reorganisation that the force has undergone this century. Careful and thorough research pointed clearly to the conclusion that the present structure is too centralised and has to be changed.

After discussing this with me, the Commissioner announced last November a number of fundamental changes, which have my full support. The size and scope of headquarters will be considerably reduced. Some officers working at headquarters will be freed for operational duties. One tier of territorial command will be removed by abolishing the present four areas and 24 districts and putting eight new areas in their place. Responsibility and accountability will be devolved downwards wherever possible. The division will become the fundamental unit of policing. These basic principles of the reorganisation are now settled, but many important questions on how these principles will be implemented are still up for discussion and decision. The process of implementation will take about two years.

I know that there has been concern that there was not consultation before these changes were announced. A number of right hon. and hon. Members have told me that they regretted the absence of prior consultation. Some community-police consultative groups have also expressed their disappointment. I entirely understand these feelings. But the Commissioner judged—and I agreed—that the changes were so essential that extensive consultation would have caused only damaging delay and uncertainty. The morale and efficiency of the force would have been at risk. But, as I have said, the changes announced so far —this is the key issue—amount to no more than the bare bones of the reorganisation. The Commissioner is committed to widespread consultation with all concerned as the flesh is put on these bones.

This is true, above all, of the effect of the new force structure on community-police consultative arrangements. I know that several consultative groups, in the inner London boroughs especially, are worried that the loss of district commanders will undermine their borough-wide basis. The Commissioner is keenly aware of these concerns. He is determined to find answers to these worries, so that the invaluable work done by consultative groups is not impeded.

In line with the general aim of the reorganisation, the Commissioner hopes that groups will come to regard divisional chief superintendents as the focal point for consultation. Many of the issues discussed in consultative groups are essentially local, affecting only one division, or even part of a division. The divisional chief superintendent, the officer with direct operational responsibility, is often best placed to respond to them.

But the Commissioner fully accepts that problems may arise particularly in boroughs such as Lambeth which cover three or more divisions. Consultative groups in these boroughs may well feel the need for a more senior officer, with wider responsibilities, to attend meetings. The Commissioner therefore accepts that it may be useful in these cases for a commander — or even the deputy assistant commissioner—from the new area headquarters to attend meetings, if the group so wishes.

Neither the Commissioner nor I is advancing this possibility as a blueprint for adoption by all groups. It must be for each group to decide, in consultation with the police, how consultative arrangements can best work under the new force structure. Surely the important thing now is for each group to sit down with the local police and work out acceptable arrangements. I am very pleased that the Lambeth group—in a characteristically constructive and forward-looking fashion—has already started to do this.

The reorganisation is by no means the only strand in the Commissioner's efforts to improve——

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): In touching on a fundamental matter, the Home Secretary has been both reassuring and perhaps disappointing. He has not made it clear whether the figure of eight new areas has been set in concrete without the consultation to which he referred and without paying attention to the strong, serious and formal representations which were made to the Commissioner, or whether it is for further consideration and that it might conceivably be increased.

Mr. Brittan: I would not be presenting an accurate picture if I led the hon. Gentleman to think that it is at all likely that the figure will be changed.

Mr. Spearing: It is entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. Brittan: I understand what the hon. Gentleman has said and I am grateful for his acceptance that on other issues I have given a measure of reassurance. The reorganisation is by no means the only strand in the Commissioner's efforts to improve efficiency and economy in the force. As police authority, I naturally take a close personal interest in this part of the strategy. There are a number of areas to which I have asked the Commissioner to pay special attention.

As manpower absorbs nearly 80 per cent. of the force's resources, the handling of it must be the prime object of the Commissioner's efforts. The aim is simply to free as many officers as possible for operational deployment. There are two specific areas on which I have asked him to concentrate. First, the force reorganisation will enable him to move police officers from administrative jobs at headquarters to operational jobs on the ground. I have asked the Commissioner to maximise the number redeployed in that way. I have said that I wish a minimum of 200 officers to be redeployed by the time that the reorganisation is completed. The second area is civilianisation. I have already mentioned that nearly 150 posts were civilianised last year. I have told the Commissioner that the search for further posts must continue. I shall agree with him targets for further substantial civilianisation when we discuss his strategy for next year; and I shall expect to see them reflected in his strategy report. To help in this, I have just agreed to an increase of over 40 in the civil staff specifically for civilianisation, on top of the increase of 132 posts that I announced last October for this year.

Equipment too is a major area of expenditure, especially vehicles. The Metropolitan police has a fleet of over 4,000 vehicles, which costs about £20 million a year. A joint review of the fleet is being carried out by the Home Office and the Metropolitan police to ensure that it meets the needs of the force as economically, efficiently and effectively as possible. The Home Office has engaged a consultant to advise the review body. As well as looking at the size of the fleet, the review will examine how the fleet is managed and the scope for contracting out. Pending the completion of the review, I have placed an upper ceiling on the total size of the Metropolitan police vehicle fleet of 4,150 vehicles.

At my request, the Commissioner and the receiver are also examining whether it would be more economical and efficient to contract out a variety of functions presently performed in house. Cleaning services have been contracted out in over 200 buildings. Further studies are in progress—for instance, on vehicle removals, wheel clamping and car pounds. My officials will be examining carefully the findings of those studies. I shall expect the Commissioner in his next strategy report to give an account of the results achieved, and to set out a programme of further studies.

The fourth element of the force goal is to develop corporate and personal professionalism. The main initiative here has been the new handbook of policing principles and guidance for professional behaviour. It is divided into two parts. The first—the policing principles of the Metropolitan police—is the first attempt to set down comprehensively the duties of the Metropolitan police since that made by Sir Richard Mayne, one of the first Commissioners, in 1829. The second part—the guidance for professional behaviour—gives individual officers the guidance they need in carrying out their duties from day to day. It devotes considerable attention to the concept — crucial to police work — of discretion. In a very practical, down-to-earth way, using a wealth of helpful examples, it analyses the problems which officers face and points the way towards sensible solutions.

I warmly endorse the aims of the handbook. I am sure that it will have great declaratory value, but it will have practical value as well. Discussions about the handbook will be held at every level of the force. The aim is to encourage officers to come to grips with, and to reflect in their behaviour, the high standards of professionalism that it enjoins. Although directed primarily at the younger officer, it should challenge and stimulate also the most senior and experienced.

The handbook assumes all the more importance in the light of the findings of the Policy Studies Institute report. The report made a number of serious criticisms of the behaviour and professionalism of the Metropolitan police. The Commissioner was candid in his acceptance of many of those criticisms, and has been energetic in taking remedial action. For instance, he set up a working party to look at racism in the force, which has come up with many practical recommendations. Much more remains to be done. The handbook underpins those efforts.

There is one consistent theme in all the many changes that the force is undergoing — the effort by the Commissioner to make his force more purposive. The ability, energy and devotion to duty of Metropolitan police officers have never been open to doubt, but greater efforts are now being made to direct those energies effectively. Priorities are being laid down. Targets are being set. Systems are in place to review the priorities and to see whether the targets are being met. That helps the Commissioner to ensure that the force is being used to best effect, and it enables me to see whether the Commissioner has achieved the agreed goals set out in his strategy report.

All that implies a greater need than ever for the views of the public about policing to be expressed. Before drawing up his strategy, the Commissioner needs and wants to know what concerns Londoners most, but he and I also need to know the views of this House. That is why this debate is so important for the policing of London.

10.5 am

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): If there is one paragraph in the report of the Commissioner, which was published a few days ago, which symbolises the finest qualities of the Metropolitan police it is the paragraph on page 72, which refers to Police Constable John Gordon, the dog handler who was critically injured in the bomb attack at Harrods. When my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and I visited some of those injured at Harrods, it was difficult to believe that Mr. Gordon could ever return to active service, yet, as a result, not just of dedicated medical attention, but even more of his own superb determination, he was back at work less than a year after he sustained his fearsome injuries.

In paying tribute to Police Constable Gordon, we pay tribute to all members of the Metropolitan and other police forces who have been injured in the pursuit of crime. In the light of the staggering complacency of the Home Secretary's speech, one would never think——

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): The right hon. Gentleman wrote that before he heard the speech.

Mr. Kaufman: I wrote it in just now. I shall happily pass the text of my speech across to the Home Secretary for his further enlightenment when I have completed my speech.

In the light of the Home Secretary's increasingly staggering complacency, one would never think that this debate was taking place againt a background of unprecedented public confrontation between the Government and the police. In recent weeks, fierce attacks have been made on the Government by several chief constables in their annual reports, and a vote of no confidence in the Government was carried unanimously by the Police Federation. The Police Federation conference also saw fierce barracking of the Home Secretary.

Following the publication of the report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, there have been further critical statements from the Commissioner, leading to an ill-tempered response from the Home Secretary and, never to be outdone when shrill declarations are being made, by the Prime Minister. In many ways, the Commissioner's report, which we are considering today in the context of this debate, carries these controversies further, for while we are debating policing in the metropolitan area, many of the lessons can be applied to policing and to law and order problems throughout the country.

The report is extremely disturbing in many ways. The Opposition remain worried by the unsatisfactorily low proportion of women in the Metropolitan police. Last year, in the annual debate, the Home Secretary got into a great state about allegations that the Metropolitan police were operating a 10 per cent. quota of women in the force. It is, therefore, just a little uncanny that 12 months after that debate we learn from this year's report that the proportion of women in the force is 9·3 per cent. Is that a quota, or a coincidence?

I would also welcome an explanation of why last year 13 per cent. of male applicants to join the force were accepted, compared with only 7 per cent. of women. This might, of course, have something to do with the information contained in the report that 23 per cent. of male applicants were interviewed, but only 14 per cent. of women applicants. We should also like an explanation of that matter.

We share the Commissioner's concern that fewer applications for membership of the force have been received from members of the ethnic communities. At present, it seems that only about one half of 1 per cent. of the nation's police officers come forward from these communities. Part of the explanation may derive from a view contained in the annual report of the Commission for Racial Equality, which was also published a few days ago, which stated:

> "There is ample evidence to suggest that black people generally believe the police to be fundamentally hostile to them."

The CRE report goes on to suggest:

> "The prospects of a truly multi-racial police force may ultimately depend upon the vigour with which the police get rid of racism in the force".

In the light of that statement, and in the light also of the recognition of racism in the force by Lord Scarman, by the PSI report, to which the Home Secretary referred, and by the Home Secretary himself in the final debates on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, it is, to say the least, disappointing that the Commissioner's report contains not one word on that important subject. The subject is all the more important in view of what the report itself says about the disturbing number of racial attacks in London as well as in other places.

Those worrying statistics are only a part—although a highly disturbing part — of the grim and frightening picture provided in the Commissioner's report of the appalling crime wave that afflicts London in common with the rest of Britain. It is a crime wave the existence of which one would never guess from the half-hour speech to which we have just listened.

In the seventh year of this Conservative Government the crime figures are rising remorselessly, and the story told by the Commissioner's report, as by the figures for the whole country, is extremely alarming. Last year in London, crime rose by 9 per cent. to a new record level. Theft was up by 6 per cent., violence against the person was up by 7 per cent., robberies were up by 13 per cent. and burglarly was up by 10 per cent. Two thirds of burglaries took place in private homes, and those crimes were up even more than the average, by 11 per cent.

Not only has crime risen to historically high levels, but the ability of the police successfully to combat crime remains extremely unsatisfactory. Last year in the Metropolitan police area the overall clear-up rate for crime remained at a lamentable 17 per cent. The increase in the number of arrests, at 5 per cent., did not keep pace with the number of those who should have been arrested. Indeed, the actual arrest rate fell. The clear-up rate for theft was only 16 per cent., and for burglary only 10 per cent.

In his speech the Home Secretary made some selective comparisons about police strength now compared with when the Government took office, so let us look at the picture of crime in London now compared with what it was when the Prime Minister, who represents Finchley, and is therefore a London Member, first stepped through the doors of 10 Downing street in 1979.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): In the context of crime in London, will the right hon. Gentleman look at the Greater London council's video on policing in London and its effect? Will he repudiate the words in that commentary that communities must rebel, because that sort of thing must be significant in considering this subject?

Mr. Kaufman: When I listen to the hon. Gentleman, I feel that in fighting crime the real Dick Tracy would be more convenient for us.

Mr. Tracey: Answer the question.

Mr. Kaufman: By talking about the effect of a video which I and most people have not seen, the hon. Gentleman must not shuffle aside the crime rate that is afflicting London, information about which I shall now give to the House.

Mr. Brittan: Will the right hon. Gentleman help us? I appreciate that he is busy and has not had time to see the video, although much comment has been made about it. Will he agree to see it and express his views when he has done so?

Mr. Kaufman: If I have the time, I shall watch the video, but during the past couple of days I have been helping to win the Brecon and Radnor by-election. We have other preoccupations. If only the Home Secretary would devote himself to dealing with London crime rather than with one video cassette, perhaps the statistics that I am about to give the House would be more central to the issue.

It is absolutely typical of the Home Secretary, when we are facing the worst crime wave that this country has ever known, and the worst crime wave that London has ever known, and when he is the police authority for London, as he so satisfiedly told us, that, instead of telling us about crime for the past half hour, he devoted a section of his speech to a video which I, most of the country and most people in London have not seen, as well as to the miners' strike, to which I shall refer.

Let us hear about the crime over which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is presiding. Last year, 716,545 serious offences were reported as having been committed in London. That was a 26 per cent. increase on the 1978 figures. Violence against the person in London, under this Government, is up by 34 per cent. Burglary in London, under this Government, is up by 38 per cent. Criminal damage in London, under this Government, is up by 54 per cent. Let us look at the number of crimes committed per 1,000 of the population, again comparing the situation now with what it was when the Government came to office. All crime is up by 41 per cent. Violence against the person is up by 51 per cent., burglary is up by 54 per cent. and criminal damage is up by 71 per cent.

When the Government took office, 65 serious crimes were committed every hour in the Metropolitan police area. Now, 82 are committed every hour. When the Government took office, in the Metropolitan police area there were 39 crimes of violence every day. There are now 52 crimes of violence every day. When the Government took office there were 183 cases of criminal damage every day in the Metropolitan police area. There are now 281. Since the Government came to office, burglaries have risen from 336 a day to 461 a day. Since the Government came to office, thefts have risen from 888 a day to 1,022 a day.

When the right hon. Lady became Prime Minister, a serious crime happened somewhere in the metropolitan area every 56 seconds. Now, one takes place every 44 seconds. Is that less important than a GLC video? What is more, the fight against that disturbing escalation in crime is faltering. Again, during the right hon. Lady's period of office the total clear-up rate in the Metropolitan police area has fallen from 21 to 17 per cent. The clear-up rate for theft has fallen from 20 to 16 per cent. The clear-up rate for criminal damage has fallen from 14 to 11 per cent. The clear-up rate for burglary has fallen from 11 to 10 per cent.

As the Home Secretary said, the number of police has risen, but the number of crimes per policeman has risen faster — by 5 per cent. The clear-up rate per police officer has fallen by 16 per cent. under the Government. That is a devastating picture of crime in our capital and its surrounding area. It is provided by the Commissioner himself in the report before us.

The report reveals a particularly disturbing rate of crime among young people. Half of those arrested for notifiable offences were under 21 years of age. Of those arrested for robbery, 63 per cent. were aged under 21. Of those arrested for burglary, 62 per cent. were under 21. Of those arrested for motor cycle theft, over 70 per cent. were under

21. What is more, not only were those arrested for crime predominantly young, but the victims of crime were often young, too.

Old people are understandably fearful of crime. We all know from our constituencies of the fear which prevents many old people from venturing out of doors or even from opening their doors to callers. That apprehension is real and must be taken seriously by all of us—I know that it is. The revelation in the Commissioner's report, however, is that only 3 per cent. of victims of violence against the person last year were over 60. Mugging victims are much more likely to be young people — 20 per cent. were schoolchildren. Those facts make a depressing picture.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the clear-up rate for offences about which the public are most worried is at least in part related to the trust and co-operation between the police and the public? Does he further agree that the GLC video, of which he was so dismissive, undermines some of that trust and co-operation?

Mr. Kaufman: If that little box contains all that the Government have to say about the crime rate, we are faced with a lamentable state of affairs. Trust between the public and the police is mentioned several times in the Commissioner's report and I have something rather more relevant and rather less trivial to say about it.

All of the facts add up to a depressing record, which is even more depressing in view of the complacent untruth in the Conservative party manifesto for the 1983 election. That misleading document said:

"already street crime is being reduced and public confidence improved in some of the worst inner-city areas.".

That was the dishonest claim which was made only two years ago. The Metropolitan police crime statistics show that, since the Government were elected, there has been an 8·5 per cent. increase in fraud and that the clear-up rate for that crime has fallen badly. Although the crime figures for fraud must now be increased by adding this gross case of fraud to them, I can at least direct the police towards the culprit.

Why are we suffering from this unprecedented crime wave? The Home Secretary is laughing at his own election manifesto. Does he stand by it? Does he say now, two years after being elected on the basis of that fraud, that street crime is being reduced? Is he still saying that public confidence has improved in some of the worst inner-city areas? Would he like to come to the Dispatch Box and endorse what was in that manifesto and say that the same is true today? No. Perhaps the Home Secretary will now take the smirk off his face and listen to what is happening with crime in the metropolis, for which he, as he has told us, is personally responsible as the police authority.

Why are we suffering from this unprecedented crime wave, which disrupts the community in so many ways? The 1979 Conservative manifesto said:

"The police need more time to detect crime".

It promised to ease the burdens on the police. That is another broken promise. The police themselves are now complaining about the extra, and often unnecessary, burdens being put on them which interfere with, or even disrupt, their principal duty of fighting crime. The Government are misusing the police in many ways. In so many ways, they are making the police either reluctant instruments, or even victims, of controversial Government policies.

Page 109 of the Commissioner's report shows that he is apprehensive of the extra burden that will be put on the police by the Government's policy of privatising public transport. The report contains some pretty sharp comments for a non-political document. When discussing privatisation of the National Bus Company as it will affect operations in London, the report says:

"nothing has changed police views on the control of routes, termini and stopping places and the need for their adequate supervision, together with strictly enforced levels of maintenance."

Implementation of the complexities of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 will undoubtedly distract the police from their most important duties.

In his recently published report the chief constable of Staffordshire said:

"Looking forward to 1985, I foresee continuing additional demands on our manpower resources should the NUM dispute continue. In addition, our manpower availability will be further depleted because of the extensive programme of training for all officers of the Force in preparation for the implementation of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act."

That worry was echoed by the chief constable of Warwickshire, who, in his annual report, said:

"My biggest fear is that we will not be able to complete this very necessary training before we are obliged to commence training of the whole Force on the changes in law and procedure resulting from the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984."

Complaints were made at the recent Police Federation conference about the damaging effects on police efficiency of the Government's cuts in rate support grant and their grant penalties on local authorities. Police Constable Paul Middup, the chairman of the constables' section of the federation, said that, with other local government services, the police were forced to bear their share of spending cuts. He continued:

"Central government cannot duck the issue any longer. It is fast turning into a public scandal which is entirely of their making. They cannot blame the local authorities any longer."

The anxiety is stated most comprehensively in the Commissioner's report. I shall quote it at some length. It says:

"There are clear signs already that demand has outstripped our capability to supply a comprehensive service"—

we did not hear any of this from the Home Secretary—

"and we have been forced to concentrate upon partiular priorities within the totality of demand. The moment that an organisation begins to choose amongst corporate priorities, so follows inevitably the recognition that desirable goals will be left unpursued or, at best, given less weight from amongst fixed resources. Rigorously enforced cash limits are a challenge to our professionalism in matching our available resources against increasing demand. In seeking to operate responsibly within these limits we shall inevitably find ourselves less able to meet all of our commitments towards the general public in the way that we would wish. If we rise, for example, to a centrally counselled drive against drugs, which brings heavy demands on manpower through round-the-clock surveillance, then the existence of finite ceilings to manpower will dictate the removal of officers from other duties. The delicacy and sensitivity of the work requires the deployment of experienced officers, who are also in demand for other key areas of operational work—such as anti-robbery or anti-fraud duties."

Nowhere is that misuse of the police against the inclinations and instincts of the police more clearly shown than in what the Commissioner says about the impact on his force of policing the miners' strike—an unnecessary dispute which was provoked by the Government for their own partisan purposes, as the public now say in all of the opinion surveys that we get.

Nobody knows exactly the financial cost of policing the miners' strike, but, for the country as a whole, it is almost certain to be £250 million, if not more. All of that money could more usefully have been used to fight crime in our villages, towns and cities. We know, however, that the cost to the Metropolitan police was £16·5 million and that nearly £7 million of that remains to be reimbursed. We know also that the Metropolitan police had to make cuts of £8 million in expenditure, which has not been reimbursed. — [Interruption.] The local authorities did not want that to be done, but wanted the money which was provided for policing purposes to be spent on fighting crime, just as the Metropolitan police did.

Mr. Brittan: Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that, faced with a dispute of that kind, conducted in that manner, riotous mobs should be allowed to go unchecked?

Mr. Kaufman: The trouble and the confrontation were of the Government's making. The police did not want to be involved. They wanted to be back on their beats fighting crime. They would have been fighting crime had it not been for the Prime Minister and the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He stoked up the dispute in a way that no Home Secretary has ever done before.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman is ignoring the fact that a third of the miners continued to work and wanted to continue to work. They were able to do so against organised thuggery only because the police were there to protect them. Does the right hon. Gentleman deny rights to those trade unionists who wanted to go to work but who were not allowed to express their view in a ballot?

Mr. Kaufman: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is a member of a Cabinet which denies the right to work to 4 million people who want to work. He is complacent about that. Let us hear, not what the Home Secretary in his heated moments, trying to prove his virility to the Prime Minister, says about this, but what the Commissioner says about the effect on his force of the Home Secretary's provocative policies. The Metropolitan police have had to make spending cuts of £8 million because of the costs of the miners' strike, which have not yet been reimbursed.

Assistant Commissioner Dear wrote a letter to The Times, in which he pointed out that the Metropolitan police had provided up to a quarter of all the additional police manpower during the dispute — up to 2,000 officers each week, and over 250,000 individual tours of duty. In his report the Commissioner said:

"The manpower commitment to the miners' strike throughout the past year has resulted in a considerable reduction in the attendances at training when compared with the previous year."

Let us hear what the Commissioner says about the result of those absences:

"Recorded crime has increased and, although crime figures are notoriously resistant to accurate analysis, the absence of so many officers looks persuasive when we try to explain the increase . . . The mutual aid supplied to forces directly concerned with the miners' dispute inevitably reduced the number of officers available for duty in the metropolis during the last three quarters of 1984. The effects of this reduction on some police activities can be illustrated by a number of statistics; it is likely to have been a major cause of the comparative reductions in both the number of arrests and the number of stops made by this Force during the period of the dispute. The effects of the dispute on offences committed and offences reported by the public cannot be satisfactorily estimated."

There were only two weeks when no Metropolitan officers were sent to the coalfields, and the distractions from the necessary work of the police are demonstrated by the reference in the report, unprecedented so far as I can ascertain in any report by the Commissioner, to the role during the strike of the national reporting centre. This is not properly a subject for a report by the Commissioner, since it is an ad hoc body. It is not under the Metropolitan police or any police force. It is under the trade union of chief police officers, the Association of Chief Police Officers. The activities of the national reporting centre during the year of the strike have so discredited it that it is not being used for the co-ordination of the work against the IRA bombers which the Home Secretary announced on Tuesday, which might be regarded as a proper reason for the activation of a genuine national reporting centre.

We have an unprecedented crime wave and a police force which, despite its best endeavours, is too overstretched and too distracted by other tasks adequately to tackle the crime wave. Moreover, these distractions are unfortunately tending to undermine the confidence in the police among the public, to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred, which is essential for a successful attack on crime.

In his report the Commissioner repeatedly emphasises the need for public confidence. On page 1 he refers to the need for "a police service which sees itself firmly rooted in a consenting community rather than as a police force imposed upon an unwilling people."

On page 7 he says that the work of the Metropolitan police

"rests upon the exercise of authority — and occasionally force where necessary — and the legitimacy of that authority rests not only on the fact of the law but also on the will of the community: remove either and the police become oppressive."

On page 14 the Commissioner makes the frank admission:

"Great emphasise has been laid in my strategic approach to the policing of London upon the requirement on Metropolitan Police Officers to observe the rule of law — to police within what has been called the 'due process'. This requirement is unequivocal and always has been; if police officers do not abide by the law, then any credibility they seek in requiring or persuading others to do so in a consensual society is put in jeopardy. Police officers have not always risen to this demand. On occasions they have, quite wrongly, behaved in ways suggesting that they were anticipating — and pre-empting — failures of the judicial process to deliver what they would have viewed as justice."

That is not a GLC video, but the Commissioner admitting to shortcomings in his own force which he believes should be put right.

It is not the role of the Commissioner to discuss in detail the causes of crime, but it is essential for the House of Commons to do so. We can see the causes all about us. Cuts in public transport mean that more people are alone on the streets at night. Cuts in the housing programme mean that there is more derelict property, a prime target for vandalism and a haven for criminals to lurk in. Cuts in local authority finance reduce road maintenance and street lighting. Cuts in Customs and Excise staff mean that drug runners have an easier time.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Government have just increased by 50 the strength of those responsible in Customs and Excise for investigations. The chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue says that he is perfectly satisfied with the strength — about 250 — of his investigation force. This has nothing to do with customs officers generally.

Mr. Kaufman: Following the hon. Gentleman's comments after the publication of the Select Committee's report and that creep-like intervention, he must be well in line for the knighthood that he is seeking. A tiny increase now does not compensate for the massive decrease under this Government. The hon. Gentleman had better get his Select Committee to look up the figures before he comes here with his usual crawling remarks from the Back Benches.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the recent about face by the Government and the appointment of 50 new customs officers should be put into perspective? Customs and Excise deployed more than 40 officers to raid and read the books taken from the "Gay's The Word" bookshop.

Mr. Kaufman: It is a question of priorities, and the Home Secretary gives his priorities to the House of Commons. The cuts in VAT and Inland Revenue staff —[Interruption.] The Home Secretary had better tell us whether he regards books sold by "Gay's The Word" as a greater narcotic than the kind of drugs that we are seeking to fight, against which the Government's fight has been faltering since they came to office. The cuts in VAT and Inland Revenue staff not only affect the fight against drug pushers but give an easier passage to fraud. Fraud means loss and even financial ruin for its victims.

Another ingredient is the increase in unemployment. Unemployment in Greater London is now three times higher than it was when Labour left office. For young people it is nearly four times as great. This was curtly dismissed as a crime factor in a recent interview given by the Home Secretary to the Financial Times.

Mr. Wheeler: Quite right.

Mr. Kaufman: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman said that. The interviewer said:

"The Home Secretary, who was relaxed, confident and clearly enjoying his portfolio . . . said Home Office research suggested that the general perception of a link between unemployment and crime was unfounded."

That view was not shared by one of the Home Secretary's predecessors, who said:

"If we can nip in the bud criminal tendencies in people then we would be going a long way towards easing the pressures on our police . . . Undoubtedly, economic mismanagement . . . where that leads to high levels of unemployment, especially amongst young people, also contributes considerably to increasing the number of those tempted into a criminal life."

That was Lord Whitelaw speaking when he had the responsibilities that I had as a Minister. True, he went on to make a joke about it, saying:

"The only real remedy for this situation is a vigorous pursuit of Conservative economic and social policies."

As was so often the case, Lord Whitelaw understood the cause, even if he was wrong about the remedy.

As we approach the time when the Labour party will be asked to accept responsibility for the government of our country, we shall not make the Tory mistake or commit the Tory deception of offering gimmicks and platitudes or pretend cynically that it is simple to deal with a profoundly difficult social problem.

We commit ourselves to taking action that will help to create conditions which will make it easier for the police to do their job and more difficult for criminals to do their worst. We will seek to remedy some of the conditions that foster crime and create criminals. We will make it more difficult for criminals to get hold of guns, by restricting their availability. We will tackle the problem of shotguns falling into the hands of people with no good reason to possess them, while safeguarding the rights of those with a legitimate use for one in work or sport.

We will take urgent action against the drug traffic, and will increase the resources available to all those involved in fighting the drug traffic. We will do everything possible to ensure that drug dealers are detected, convicted and given sentences appropriate to the seriousness of their crime. We will tackle the social and economic factors that help to make people, especially the young, vulnerable to drug abuse. We will put an end to the Government's penal policies against local authorities. We will seek to improve life in the areas that are most crime-ridden, where despair leads to alienation and alienation turns into criminal behaviour.

We will give a high priority to restoring local services. Cuts in those services have meant fewer caretakers, park keepers and public servants, whose presence can deter crime and vandalism. A better housing programme and improvements in the environment can tackle certain types of crime at their roots.

Seeking to remedy these problems is not easy, cheap or quick, but it is easier, cheaper and quicker than dealing with the dire results of social neglect. The crime wave is one of the results of social neglect with which our people must live.

When he was shadow Home Secretary, Lord Whitelaw said:

"A Government that cannot protect its own citizens from attack in the streets of its towns and cities, that cannot protect property from damage, or homes from intrusion, has failed to live up to the basic duties of Government."

By their own standards, and on their own tests, this Government have failed. Their departure, which is ever more likely, will give the nation a new chance to combat the crime wave which will be the Prime Minister's grim legacy to the nation which she has so ill served.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Connoisseurs of hypocrisy will find a great deal to treasure and savour in the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). I am sure that I shall read with pleasure one astonishing passage when he commented, with evident approval, on a chief constable who was complaining about the additional manpower requirement that would be imposed on his force by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. There will be additional requirements, some of which will be excessive. In so far as they are excessive, it is because my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was perhaps unwise in accepting the amendments tabled by the Opposition in Committee and on Report.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman did not serve on the Standing Committee. If he had done so, he would have known that the Home Secretary did not accept anything. He was there for only 3 per cent. of the Committee's 147 hours.

Sir Philip Goodhart: Connoisseurs of hypocrisy will look at that statement as well. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman could not bring himself — although one gathers that he has completed his reselection process— to condemn the savage attacks perpetrated on the Metropolitan police by the GLC and that he was not able to dissociate himself from the attacks, which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary described as divisive, deliberate attempts to turn the community against the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Dobson: Have any people, other than a series of Conservative Members of Parliament, received this GLC video?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I was not referring to the GLC video. I have not had the misfortune to see it. During the past year, like every other hon. Member representing the metropolis, I have received, and occasionally read, a vast amount of damaging, libellous and false literature from the GLC attacking the police.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the video is "damaging, libellous and false", should he not make arrangements, first, to see it for himself and, secondly, to go to the GLC, buy a copy and have it placed in the Library so that other hon. Members may see it as well?

Sir Philip Goodhart: The hon. Gentleman, who is one of the leaders in the assault on the police and who is deliberately attempting to stir up a dislike and distrust of the police, refers to the GLC video. I am not referring to that video.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Sir Philip Goodhart: I am referring to the mass of propaganda put out by the GLC, of which this video may have been one of the worst aspects.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I shall not give way to the gentleman whom I must refer to as honourable.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The person who is on his feet has just—[HON. MEMBERS: "Order."]—ascribed a number of remarks to me. Would he care to inform the House when those statement were made, so that the House may have a correct record?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have heard nothing so far which is out of order, although I have heard a great deal of discourtesy.

Sir Philip Goodhart: At some later date I would gladly go through the hon. Gentleman's record on that point both inside and outside the House. However, I wish to move on to regret that the right hon. Member for Gorton in his adroit speech was, alas, unable whole-heartedly to recommend the ethnic minorities to join the police force. Nothing will do more good for ethnic relations with the police than to increase ethnic recruiting. I am sorry that he was unable whole-heartedly to recommend a substantial increase in recruitment from the ethnic communities.

I am also sorry that the right hon. Gentleman seemed incapable of paying whole-hearted tribute to the work of the Metropolitan police in past years to improve their relationship with the community as a whole.

I was delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was able in his admirable speech to pay tribute to the role of the special constabulary in past years.

I am delighted to find in the Commissioner's report that the increase in recruitment to the special constabulary is continuing, and to note that in the first month an extra 125 recruits joined the special constabulary. However, more can be done, in particular by Home Office Ministers, by increasing the specials' allowances. That will have a substantial and beneficial effect on increasing recruitment. The Commissioner has imaginative programmes for the deployment and use of the specials.

I regret that in the speeches of both my right hon. and learned Friend and the right hon. Gentleman there was no reference to traffic accidents and road safety. They made a great many references to violent crime in the capital. Violent crime undoubtedly worries a great many of my constituents. During the past 12 months many people have been killed and injured because of it. But even in our violent capital city the average citizen is three times as likely to be killed or injured by a motorist than by a criminal.

In my London borough of Bromley in 1984 no fewer than 1,639 people were injured and 15 killed in road accidents. That is three times the number who suffered death or injury at the hands of criminals. Therefore, I regret that in the past couple of years the Commissioner has seen fit to move officers from the traffic section, which is responsible for road safety, rather than to increase and strengthen it. There are 27,000 Metropolitan men and women police officers. The strength of the traffic branch was 1,000—less than 5 per cent. of the force—but the Commissioner has reduced that by some 200. That is a mistaken sense of priorities. My constituents are becoming increasingly worried about road safety and the way in which our traffic laws are ignored.

At the end of last year I visited the state of Victoria in Australia. In the 1970s as a result of a campaign by the press, local politicians, doctors and the police, the state was able to halve the number of road fatalities. I learnt that the state put 20 per cent. of the force on traffic safety. No police force here comes within half that figure. We should give the subject a higher priority.

My right hon. and learned Friend and the right hon. Gentleman made scant reference to fraud and white collar crime, yet this year fraud in the City and elsewhere has been increasing substantially. The saga at Lloyds is a reminder that we have not got this aspect of policing quite right. In this matter, although not in many others, we could learn considerably by studying the crime fighting organisation across the Atlantic. The American system of district attorney offices is more effective in combating fraud than our system of the fraud squad and Director of Public Prosecutions. I hope that that can be looked at. I do not cast aspersions on the intellectual calibre of the recruits to the Metropolitan police because one of the best features of the Commissioner's report is his emphasis on their high quality.

Fraud is not as eye-catching a subject as terrorism. Again, we all have reason to pay tribute to the skill and courage of the police, and to single out for praise the anti-terrorist squad, which does so much to protect us from the outrages of evil men.

One aspect of the terrorist problem does not often get the attention that it deserves. We see London as a prime target for terrorism, but other countries and other police forces sometimes regard London as a home for terrorists. In considering our problems with the Provisional IRA we are often very ready to criticise the American authorities for a perceived lack of vigour in tackling IRA support in various cities in the United States. Yet we have the same problem.

I have considerable sympathy for the Sikh community in this country and I recognise that many of its members have substantial grievances in relation to past policies of the Indian Government. Nevertheless, there is substantial concern on the part of the Indian Government that various Sikh groups in this country are giving overt or covert support to terrorism in the Indian subcontinent. The anti-terrorist branch of the Metropolitan police cannot be expected to deal with that problem single handed. There should be substantial co-operation between the Foreign Office and the Metropolitan police, which does not seem to exist at present, in the surveillance and control of groups who from time to time seek to foster terrorism overseas. We give an extraordinary latitude in freedom and of speech and action to those who seek asylum here as political refugees, but we must ensure that they do not abuse that asylum. I am sure, however, that in this as in so many other tasks the Metropolitan police will prove yet again that they are equal to the challenge.

11.2 am

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Before dealing with the Commissioner's report, I wish to comment on some of the points raised in the debate so far.

Terrorism is one of the problems that London has to face, as the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) rightly said, but terrorism arises from those who believe that they are so enlightened and have so much access to the truth that they are prepared to use violence in pursuit of their faith. Causing bodily harm with bombs and rockets catches the headlines, as the distressful events of the past few days have shown, but there are other kinds of violence. I am sorry that the Home Secretary has left, but I hope that he will read my comments.

I refer to exchanges in the House on an earlier occasion about the severe drain on the Metropolitan police caused by the miners' dispute and its profound effect on the morale, activities and attitudes of the Metropolitan police. I believe that that dispute was unnecessary, but Conservative Members laughed out loud when my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) dared to suggest that it might have been deliberately precipitated. This is a debating Chamber and I wish to dwell for a moment on that issue because it is a well-known and well-documented fact that five years or more ago a certain right hon. Gentleman advocated certain lines of action for the Conservative party.

A year ago, I wrote to Mr. MacGregor about Cortonwood. I am not a mining Member, but I happen to know something about that issue. I received no reply from Mr. MacGregor, but I received a reply from his deputy. I am satisfied that the action taken at Cortonwood was provocative and ill-considered and may have been designed to precipitate a dispute. I put it no higher than that, but it is certainly no laughing matter. One of the problems in this country and throughout the world is that people dismiss basic points about so many things that go wrong without properly examining the small print.

Mr. Tracey: This is a very serious matter, but does the hon. Gentleman deny the words of Mr. Arthur Scargill and Mr. Ken Livingstone—the hon. Gentleman is probably more familiar with them than I am—as reported in the Morning Star, that they saw the dispute as an opportunity to bring down the Conservative Government? Does he deny those specific words in black and white?

Mr. Spearing: I am not responsible for the remarks of either of those gentlemen or for what is printed in newspapers, but I am concerned about the laughter that greeted my right hon. Friend's suggestion, because laughter is not appropriate when there is evidence to show that the true situation is very deep.

When the Conservatives talk about violence, their immediate reaction is to escalate policing. I do not blame them for that. That is how they have been brought up and that is how they think. They do not go for the root causes or for earlier action to prevent the violence. In that context, I include constitutional violence. I shall not dwell on GCHQ or the Levene case, which would have had Mr. Gladstone revolving in his grave, but there was certainly constitutional violence in those cases.

On the Commissioner's report and the speech of the Home Secretary, I endorse the apposite comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, who rightly corrected the short, narrow and somewhat lukewarm introduction from the Home Secretary—who, after all, is the Cabinet Minister responsible to the House for these matters. I welcome the wide scope of the Commissioner's report. It gives us a great deal more information than we had before and to that extent the Commissioner is to be congratulated.

I also congratulate the Commissioner on two initiatives that he has taken during the year. The Home Secretary has already referred to the first of these — the official attitude of the police to racial attacks. In the end, of course, what really counts is the attitude of individual constables and station sergeants and the way in which the machinery operates when incidents of this kind or the risk of such incidents occur in any given area.

In this context, I pay tribute to the greater sensitivity shown by the police in my part of Newham—I cannot speak for any other part. These matters depend on sensitivity and local links, which may not necessarily be formal, and on confidence and co-ordination between the police and leaders in the community. That is something for which one cannot legislate and which cannot be created by writing enlightened paragraphs into annual reports or making enlightened speeches on the subject. It has to be worked on, people have to take initiatives, and the police are in a central position because it is they who are able to take initiatives which will count. So I offer my congratulations to the Commissioner in that respect.

The second cause for congratulation is the Commissioner's initiative in respect of membership of those organisations whose members are not readily identifiable. I leave it at that. It was a bold initiative and a correct one. Any person in public life, whether he is a Member of the House, a policeman or an official in local government, should be known to the public if he has any obligations which may affect the discharge of his public duties. In that respect, the Commissioner's action was welcome and bold.

The theme of the report is community policing. The Home Secretary himself laid stress upon the formal arrangements that he hoped to initiate in the boroughs, and referred to some of the less formal ones. I believe that both are important, but even more fundamental is the combination of theory and practice.

[Mr. Spearing]

What might be called the Newman regime at Scotland Yard has been described by some people as cerebral policing. That is welcome, because the old image of the policeman was that cerebral activity was less marked than some other activities. That bias is welcome, therefore as far as it goes, but it is not enough. We have to think and to discuss, but we have to be practical as well. It is what happens on the street and what happens in incidents as well as what happens in blueprints and theories that makes for success, as it does in all that we do, especially all that Governments do. In that connection, I have some less welcome comments to make, but I hope that they will be regarded as constructive.

The first is in respect of the exercise of new police powers. Under the new Police and Criminal Evidence Act —I cannot remember when it comes into force, but it cannot be very far off — big new powers will be available to police constables on the beat and to the officers who direct them when there are a number together, whether they are whizzing round in white vans or are at large demonstrations.

I shall not go into the merits of that Act, because they have been discussed; in any event my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) is in a much better position to speak expertly about them than I am. However, the degree to which those powers are used by individual constables in the first instance and the degree of sensitivity, imagination, common sense, sense of proportion and perhaps sense of humour displayed by those constables are all-important. Incidents can be sparked off by any combination or lack of those and rapidly get out of hand. That is very important in the use of these new powers.

We tend to forget that the discretion of a single constable is at the heart of policing. He does not have to use the powers available to him. Deciding that cannot be legislated for by senior officers. It is up to him, because the powers of constables are vested in each member of the force. We can write as many blueprints as we wish in respect of these new powers, many of which are controversial, but the decision to use them rests with the individual constable.

I touched upon my second criticism when I intervened in the Home Secretary's speech. It has to do with the reorganisation, and it is referred to on pages 25 and 26 of the Commissioner's report. I am sorry to see that everything else in the report is to some extent negatived by what has happened, and I regret the lack of reassurance that I was able to obtain from the Home Secretary. If I was disorderly on that occasion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will understand why.

The Commissioner's report is extremely enlightened, in theory. He is concerned with public perceptions, public preferences and the priorities that the police have to address to meet the expectations in any one community. However, the reorganisation proposals which have been launched and which I am glad to hear have not yet been completed are fundamental in many ways to how those aims are discharged.

It is generally known in London that the reorganisation of the police into three tiers of command was unsatisfactory. The areas themselves were unsatisfactory. Many of them go back to Victorian times and take no account of the motor car, let alone the helicopter and more recent technological advances. In general, much of what is said on pages 25 and 26 of the report is right. There ought to be larger areas. There ought to be greater scope for senior officers to exercise individual responsibility. It may be that we need to compare some of the new areas with forces outside the United Kingdom for all sorts of reasons, especially bringing in new talent and enabling experienced officers of the Metropolitan police to obtain posts outside. Matters such as that are very important, but overriding all else we have to reflect the needs and expectations of the public, and that is where in one respect there is a grave error.

The Commissioner says on page 26 of his report:

"To date only the broad outlines of the reorganisation have been determined."

The Home Secretary went a bit further and said that it had not been finalised. However, in practical terms it had gone rather further in respect of the allocation of stations, preliminary thoughts about areas, and so on.

One controversial issue that has been around for six months or more is not the principles of the reorganisation, which are generally understood and not too controversial, but the eight new areas which are to be determined.

The theory is that there is to be a petal pattern in London, and I go along with that. There is to be one central area covering the well-understood special needs of Whitehall, Parliament, the Palace, the west end and the City. Round it, there are to be seven other areas going out like a petal covering London. That makes an attractive and common-sense picture. However, certain areas of inner London whose needs are very special will now not be under one unified police command, whatever the quality of police-public relations, but are to be split among as many as three areas.

The single central district is solely north of the river, perhaps with a temporary extension across Westminster bridge if there is a procession. It does not extend to the urban areas of south London.

This will not affect east London greatly, except that in the London borough of Newham there are at present two police districts which are conterminous with broadly different parts of the borough and reflect the different needs and the different things that happen in those areas, some good and some not so good.

The reorganisation in south London which affects the well-being of policing and the community is not oriented to those needs. Worse, there was not adequate consultation before the possibility of an extra area in the south was ruled out. This is a major reorganisation, and the Home Secretary admitted that there was not satisfactory early consultation. I understand that business organisations were consulted, not about their views of the reorganisation, but about administration. However, hon. Members were not consulted.

Many commercial organisations to which the Government urge us to go for expertise have certain qualities but providing a complex service immediately is not their responsibility. Marks and Spencer, McDonald's and other big food companies do not have to stock anything that they do not want to sell. They do not have to be where they do not want to be. Modern business, which is so lauded by Government Members, does not have to cater for complex needs in the same way as the Health Service or the police. Inbuilt constraints and qualities are entirely absent.

The police, like the fire and the ambulance services and local authority social services, which Government Members so often criticise, have to meet difficult and intractable situations. They cannot refuse to meet the demand. Marks and Spencer does not have to stock anything that it does not want to stock. The opposite is true of the police and many other civic services.

The people who are involved in comparable spheres, such as probation officers, social workers, local authority councillors and, indeed, Members of Parliament, must be consulted. I hope that Government Members agree with me, because they know that many problems are almost insoluble and require a great deal of capital effort by them and others before they can be solved. Such problems require the commitment of personal time so that they do not escalate. Communication with others skilled in particular arts is essential. Keen Government Members will have developed a network of communication locally, involving a host of people upon whose advice and co-operation they can rely and which is readily given. Without that, we could not fulfil our function.

Such a network is often related to a civic structure. Everything is centred on the town halls, particularly in London. The statutory structure of local government—what is left of it—is under pressure. Splitting a single London borough three ways for policing will create difficulties. Inner London, with its own historic, social and ethnic problems, is to be split so that the area headquarters and the weight of activity is in the outer areas. That will cause trouble.

I understand that the area of conflagration four summers ago will be subject to such a dissection. Everyone asked then, "What's gone wrong?" We know what went wrong —stop and search in Brixton was used ill-advisedly. There was an escalation caused by the misuse of police powers and the incident got out of control. That was at a time when there was a single police command. Conditions and understanding have improved, but that is all to be changed.

Some hon. Members laughed when I mentioned the Cortonwood example. There has been no proper analysis of the police role, in spite of all the brave words in the report and the excellence of hon. Members' speeches.

Whitehall, Buckingham Palace, the west end and the City are exceptional and need a different type of policing. That area is unique and perhaps experience there will not stand an officer in good stead for promotion in a county or provincial town. However, unless we pay attention to the special needs of other parts of London which are dissimilar to the outer areas and which can have a coherent police presence, whereby all the sensitivities listed in the report can be dealt with as a whole, the rest of the report might as well be forgotten.

I hope that it is not too late. During the Home Secretary's speech, I asked whether he could assure us that we could re-examine the proposal for eight areas. On the spot, he was unable to give me that assurance, and I understand that, but the fact that he could not give that assurance shows that insufficient attention has been paid to that aspect. It is a factor which involves not only the House but the morale of the police. It is a matter for the practical men who understand the problems and know what is required.

I support what my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton said. I give two cheers for this enlarged and informative report. I hope that cerebral policing can be extended to practical policing and that the combination of both will give us a police force of which London can be proud and in which we can have confidence.

11.26 am

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and I welcome his thoughtful speech. I join him in congratulating the Commissioner on the excellent quality and constructive nature of the report.

Alas, one can only say that the speech by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was long on invective but short on solutions. The only part of his speech about which the House can unite is that which referred to the bravery and courage of PC Gordon. The House will be aware from the Commissioner's report that many thousands of Metropolitan police officers are injured when on duty. We offer them all our best wishes. We recognise their bravery and courage in the way in which they carry out their duties in London, often under difficult circumstances.

The right hon. Member for Gorton seems to have forgotten the state of the police force before the Conservative Administration came to office in 1979. One of the most urgent and pressing tasks facing the new Conservative Government was to rebuild the police force, which had been neglected for some years and was in serious danger of becoming demoralised. That was affecting public confidence in the police.

As the Commissioner shows in his excellent report, the police themselves are the first to recognise that public support must be won and kept rather than taken for granted. Urgent action was needed in 1979 to boost confidence all round.

As is all too obvious from the newspapers and the media programmes these days, the police face an ever-increasing number of problems. Their priorities must be adjusted to reflect the crimes which worry the public most. As an example, in London the Metropolitan police have rightly made drug abuse, racial attacks and vandalism priorities for 1985 in response to public anxiety.

As a member of the Home Affairs Select Committee since 1979, I have taken a special interest in the police and race relations. Next Session the Race Relations and Immigration Sub-Committee intends to carry out an inquiry in the Bangladesh community. We shall examine the policing aspects, especially in the east end of London. It is important that all London citizens should feel that the police service relates to them and that their special problems are being considered.

When considering the extent of police resources, it is important for the House to remember that, since 1979, the resources allocated to the police have more than doubled, from £1·1 billion to £2·8 billion, and that total police manpower in England and Wales has increased by more than 12,000. However, in London, the Metropolitan police force—one of the oldest forces in Europe—has a supremely difficult task. It is responsible for nearly 7 million people who live in the Greater London area, as well as for the millions of people who visit the capital during the year. It also has responsibility for royalty and diplomatic protection, which has increased enormously in this age of terrorism. The fight against terrorism and the provision of special services, such as the central criminal intelligence office, and many other central responsibilities of the Metropolitan police are additional burdens.

[Mr. John Wheeler]

To help to counter London's crime the strength of the Metropolitan police has increased by 5,850 officers since 1979, to give it a total strength now of about 26,750. It is interesting to note that there is still scope for finding at least 400 more recruits to join the Metropolitan police today. In addition, the number of civilian support staff has increased by more than 1,250. Many of those civilian employees provide important services in the investigation and detection of crime.

No one pretends that increasing police strength alone is sufficient to beat crime, but without the increase the force, which was well below the recommended manpower level in 1979, simply could not have coped with the range of burdens that it must shoulder in 1985.

One way of making the best use of the resources allocated, which tackles not just the reality but the debilitating fear of crime, is to have more police officers on the beat. I am pleased to say that, since 1982, 942 police officers have been added to the Metropolitan police strength for street duties. That at least provides a reassurance to the public that the police are present.

The right hon. Member for Gorton was highly selective in his use of statistics from the Commissioner's report. The House should know that, in the past year, the Metropolitan police have had an excellent record of clearing up serious crimes. The clear-up rate for homicide was 77 per cent. — few capital cities in the world could equal that. Arrests for drug trafficking increased by 31 per cent. from the 1983 figure to 1,781. The clear-up rate for blackmail and wounding was 55 per cent. Despite those impressive figures, the performance in overall clear-up rate remained at 17 per cent.—the same as in 1983.

That has happened because the vast amount of crime is random and opportunistic and, therefore, difficult to detect. Burglary and car theft occur when the opportunity is given; a door or window is left unsecured and temptation occurs. Such crimes often happen out of sight of a patrolling police officer, and only more community-based crime prevention tactics will help to remove the opportunities.

It is worth considering the true nature of the crime problem in London. Auto crime represents at least 30 per cent. of all recorded crimes in London, while burglary represents almost 24 per cent. and criminal damage represents more than 14 per cent. Those crimes and other thefts represent 95 per cent. of all reported crime in London. The difficulty is that patrolling police officers, however welcome and reassuring they may be, rarely come across such crimes while they are on duty. Since those crimes are often crimes of stealth, they are usually committed in private property or out of sight of any witness.

I especially welcome the efforts being made by the Home Office crime prevention unit and members of the Standing Conference on Crime Prevention to develop strategies to deal with auto crime and residential burglary. The conference which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will hold in November will provide a welcome contribution and a constructive way of dealing with such crimes by involving the public and the whole community. That is the way ahead in dealing with the great mass of property crime. We should not listen to nonsense from the right hon. Member for Gorton, who had no solutions to offer.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, Sir Kenneth Newman, also agrees that tackling crime, specially property and auto crime, requires the involvement of the community. His report clearly shows that the drive to create professionalism in the police service in London is a most important way to achieve a reduction in London's crime problem. He and I share the belief that the key to success is public co-operation, and a major contribution to crime prevention is already being made by local communities. In London, 19 crime prevention panels have been set up, and there are 1,150 neighbourhood watch schemes in the Metropolitan police district, with 400 more being planned. Plans are afoot to extend such schemes to businesses. About 22 police community consultative groups have been established to liaise between the police and the communities.

As hon. Members must know from their constituencies, the neighbourhood watch schemes are producing dividends. One can see the circulars from the police officers responsible for those schemes, which measure the success in the reduction of property crime, which causes so much distress to ordinary people on our large estates and in residential homes. We can see a reduction beginning to take place, and we all have a duty to sustain and encourage such initiatives.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I do not wish to discourage the hon. Gentleman, but if he can see a reduction taking place, why is it not reflected in the quarterly statistics?

Mr. Wheeler: As the hon. Gentleman will know from his local authority area, much effort is being made to reduce crime. We are talking about the Commissioner's report for 1984. We must all hope that, when we have this debate in 1986, the efforts of the neighbourhood watch schemes and other strategies will have produced the result which he and I want.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman knows that he has not answered my point. He is giving circumstantial evidence about how well the scheme is working. I shall have something to say about the schemes in due course. I do not oppose them, but the hon. Gentleman has no evidence for what he said, and the quarterly statistics suggest that he is incorrect.

Mr. Wheeler: I have evidence, because I have seen some of the circulars which the officers responsible for those schemes have issued to the public, comparing figures to demonstrate that there has been a reduction. Whatever the hon. Gentleman may say about the scheme, it is the way forward. It has only just begun, and we must encourage and sustain its momentum and analyse it so that we can encourage it further.

I should tell my hon. Friend the Minister that if the police community consultative groups are to be successful — many dedicated people are involved in them who want to make them successful—they must have some modest funding to provide an infrastructure. If that is missing, the schemes will not succeed. I hope that my hon. Friend will give urgent consideration to this important point.

The police in London have another problem, which is perhaps as wounding and destructive as crime itself. I am thinking of the attacks upon the Metropolitan police by the GLC and by some, although only some, Labour-controlled councils.

Particularly damaging is a recent video entitled "Policing London", to which reference has been made, which was produced at a cost of £35,000 of ratepayers' money and which is already being shown to many schoolchildren in London. The video purports to argue the case for what is called the "democratic control" of the Metropolitan police. What it amounts to is an insidious and vicious attack on the police, hawked around London under the most flimsy of political excuses and deliberately shown to the most impressionable members of the community, our children.

In the film, the police are shown as guilty of every fault in the book. There is, of course, plenty of room for legitimate criticism, and nobody has been more ready to respond to it than Sir Kenneth Newman. He has recently issued a pamphlet entitled "Guidance for Professional Behaviour" to all his officers. It deals constructively with many of the criticisms raised in the report on the Metropolitan police.

I am particularly angry about the cowardice and bigotry that lies behind it all. Just when real efforts are being made to mobilise the whole community in the fight against London's crime, there are now many schools and clubs in London where the police are not even allowed in to meet young people and explain their work in fighting crime and providing protection for us all.

The film's slogan—"Communities must rebel"—is the final straw. If the GLC really wishes to sow problems for the police force in London for many generations to come, it could not do a better job. I only hope that the forces of sense, sanity and responsibility will prevail. It would help if, for once, the right hon. Member for Gorton said, "Having seen that clap trap, I am convinced that it does nothing to advance the wellbeing of the community in London, nor of the efforts of the police", and that he and his party would disown it.

11.42 am

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I agree with many of the comments of the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and particularly with his major theme — that we cannot tackle the appalling problems of London's crime simply by saying that it is simply a matter for the police and that the community has no responsibility. It is clear that the community has a role in helping to tackle many of the problems of crime that we are debating today.

Because of that, I greatly regret that the Metropolitan police should have become the butt of the sort of political controversy that has surrounded its activities in recent years. It is all very well for people to hold differing views about the best ways of achieving operational effectiveness, but what we have seen in recent years from some on the Left—I stress, only from some—is a constant flow of anti-police propaganda which seems to be aimed at undermining public confidence in the police. From some on the Right—again, only from some—we have total, uncritical and unquestioning support for the police. Neither is helpful in the current situation.

The majority of Londoners value the discretion that the police have, and are opposed to attempts to introduce political control over the day-to-day operations of the Metropolitan police. However, that discretion is a privilege which must be exercised with skill and sensitivity. The objective must clearly be policing by consent and we must always be on the look-out for new ways of establishing that element of consent.

The police consultative committees are an important way of helping to achieve that objective. They provide a vital bridge between the police and the community. They need time to build up public confidence in their effectiveness and they need to show real results to convince the doubters, but they have a considerable role to play.

I regret the attitude of some boroughs, mine included, which want liaison with the police solely on their own terms. They do not want more community involvement in a police consultative committee and their objective is much less to do with consultation than with control over the police. If those authorities are adamant in refusing to play a part in the development of genuine consultative machinery, the Home Secretary should not hesitate to bypass them and establish effective grass roots-based community liaison committees and consultative machinery in those areas.

Also important in developing the idea of policing by consent are the hard-pressed inner city areas of London, where greater priority should be placed by the police on operational sensitivity. The hon. Member for Westminster, North said that the majority of crime, certainly in the inner cities, was ordinary, routine, bread-and-butter house-breaking and burglary. The complaint that I most often receive from constituents is either that the police did not bother to come at all, if it was a minor matter, or that they came, showed little interest and went away and nothing more was heard about the incident.

I appreciate the pressures on the police. Routine break-ins are a fact of life and there is little chance of anything very effective being done about them. Nevertheless, for the individual concerned, the person who suffered the break-in, it is a traumatic experience. Greater recognition of that by police officers would go a long way to strengthening relationships with the community.

The same is true of the ethnic minorities. We should recall what Lord Scarman said in his report following the 1981 riots. He pointed out that, in the already deprived areas,

> "the black community suffers more severely than the white community from the deprivations found in the inner city, especially in relation to unemployment, educational achievement and housing."

That should be at the forefront of the minds of those concerned with policing in the inner cities.

If I were in a senior position in the Metropolitan police, I should be extremely concerned about the view of many black and brown Londoners that the police are not on their side and form an alien force. We need a greater concentration of skilled police resources in the inner cities to counter that problem. It is no use putting into the inner cities comparatively new recruits who do not have the expertise to deal with these different problems.

Related to policing by consent and the need to develop public confidence is the question of complaints machinery. I appreciate that we should not get complaints against the police out of perspective. I welcome what is being done under the 1984 Act to try to develop conciliation on minor matters so that such issues do not have to go through the plethora of complaints machinery. I also welcome the introduction of the new police complaints authority and its ability to monitor the investigation of more serious complaints. However, for most ordinary people the idea that the police should investigate complaints against the police is not acceptable. They do not believe that the investigation will be as impartial and objective as it must be to inspire public confidence.

I am glad that, in the report of the Commissioner, considerable emphasis is placed on crime prevention. As the hon. Member for Westminster, North said, there must be greater co-operation between the wider community and the police in, for example, a number of elements in public administration in London.

Housing is one such element. The design of many London council estates makes them a paradise for vandals, muggers and hooligans. They are full of opportunities for criminals to prey on their victims and provide ample ways for offenders to get away rapidly before the police arrive on the scene. More attention to that sort of problem would reduce many of the risks that our constituents have to face.

It is also true that the standard of housing management has an effect on crime levels. If flats or houses are left empty for long periods, if vandalism is not swiftly countered, if lifts are left unrepaired and if bread-and-butter administrative matters are not dealt with properly, a higher level of crime is encouraged. Many of my constituents argue, with considerable justification, for greater investment in the provision of entryphones, in reducing public access to council estates and in providing more caretakers and, in extreme instances, a concierge system. Although it would cost money, the expense must be offset against the cost of repairing the consequences of vandalism and hooliganism. My constituents argue that sensible investment of this sort would be good value for money and cost effective in terms of crime prevention.

The development of neighbourhood watch schemes is encouraging, but the numbers of such schemes are small when compared with the problem of routine crime in London. There is worrying evidence that neighbourhood watch schemes have been most successful in middle-class areas, where it is possible to find people who are prepared to contribute the time and effort necessary. The schemes in these areas have raised the awareness of the need to prevent crime. They have involved the local community in devising initiatives of their own and they have improved relations between the police and the community.

Unfortunately, there has been less progress in the development of neighbourhood watch schemes on council estates. Burglary and mugging is not confined to the comfortable parts of London. The worst examples occur in council estates. Many of my constituents' homes have been broken into twice and three times. We all know that the lone pensioner feels especially at risk on many council estates.

We should ensure that greater effort is directed to encouraging the development of neighbourhood watch schemes on council estates, and the Woolwich police force has been attempting to do so. The Woolwich divisional report shows that there has been some progress. In view of one of the comments made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), it is worth repeating what appears in the recently published report of the Woolwich division. It states:

"The schemes are obviously aimed at reducing crime and there is some evidence to show a degree of success."

The report continues to underline a problem when it says: "the main element in reducing crime relies on the publicity given in these areas that a neighbourhood watch scheme exists."

A problem has been encountered in Woolwich in obtaining planning permission to display neighbourhood watch scheme signs, and to date none has been placed. I investigated the matter and I found that the difficulty lay more in lack of ability to reach an agreement between the police and Greenwich council than in obtaining planning permission.

The Woolwich police want neighbourhood watch signs to be placed on lamp posts throughout the areas where the schemes operate. Greenwich council says yes, provided that the police pay £40 for every sign that is erected. The police contend that the signs will benefit the community and that the council should therefore meet the cost. The council says no and argues that it costs £40 to erect a sign and that the police must pay £40 before a sign is erected. There is now a complete impasse. I would not mind so much if virtually every lamp post in my constituency did not already bear a sign erected by the London borough of Greenwich. Some of them are reasonable. For example, some signs draw attention to traffic problems and litter problems and other matters of general interest. However, some are political. They refer, for example, to nuclear disarmament, rate capping and other issues of political concern to the council.

The council is spending a good deal of money on lamp-post signs and I cannot understand why it refuses to assist the police in areas where neighbourhood watch schemes operate. Surely £40 a lamp post would be a good investment for the borough council.

I take up the remarks that have been made about improved efficiency and professionalism. I am glad that, in the Commissioner's report, there is a considerable commitment to improving both these objectives. The force reorganisation is a step in the right direction but, like others, I regret the lack of consultation before the reorganisation was launched. The Metropolitan police are seeking to strengthen links with the community and it would have been useful to have delayed the implementation of the initial stages of reorganisation while some local consultation took place.

It is important, whatever form of organisation we have, that there are not rapid shifts of key officers. We have frequently complained about the speed with which commanders, for example, have been moved in the London area. If the Metropolitan police are trying through the divisional system to develop genuine links with local communities, it is clearly extremely important that key officers are able to stay long enough in any one area to ensure that personal links are established. That must be a considerable priority.

I welcome the improvements in training that are referred to in the Commissioner's report, but I regret that one of the Lord Scarman's main recommendations seems not to have been accepted. He recommended that there should be a minimum of six months' training for every recruit. That seems to be a reasonable objective, given the situation in London, and I am sorry that the recommendation is not being implemented.

There is a case for far more priority to be given to in-service training, especially in areas that bear on relationships between ordinary police officers and members of the public. Some officers are very good, but others have a good deal to learn about how to handle members of the public. When there are pressures, as in inner London, in-service training to improve relationships between police officers and the public should have high priority.

The Government can claim genuinely to have provided considerable additional financial support for the Metropolitan police. That is true of improved manpower, better pay and conditions for individual officers and the modernisation of methods and equipment. However, at this stage, Londoners cannot say that they are seeing a genuine return on that investment. They are not seeing a substantial reduction in crime and they do not have a greater sense of security particularly in the inner London area. Given the money that has been invested, Londoners are entitled to look for considerable improvements in the near future.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I apologise at the outset, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the fact that I shall not be able to remain in my place until the end of the debate. However, I look forward to reading the Minister's reply in Hansard.

Nearly everyone in the House and in the country will agree that few matters are more important than the maintenance of law and order and the combating of crime by appropriate efforts. That is especially true of my constituents in Carshalton and Wallington who live and work within the Epsom division of Z district in the Metropolitan police area. Perhaps not all hon. Members are aware that the Epsom division is the largest in the Metropolitan police area and the fifth busiest division in the entire Metropolitan police force. Therefore, I make no apology for concentrating on the problems and prospects of policing within the division.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary rightly said at the outset of the debate, the Commissioner has identified divisions as the key policing units within the metropolitan area. I shall become more local by saying that I am acutely interested in the policing conditions of the Wallington sub-division, which is virtually conterminous with the boundaries of my constituency.

The problems of the Epsom division are well set out in the 1984 divisional strategic plan, which is one of the component elements of which the Commissioner, Sir Kenneth Newman, has to take account in formulating his plans for the entire metropolitan area. The clear priorities identified for the division, were, first, the reduction of burglary; secondly, the reduction of auto crime; and thirdly, tackling problems of road safety and traffic management.

I agree that those are all important problems with which the police must deal, but I should like to see an equally high priority attached to dealing more effectively with the problems of vandalism and hooliganism, which the Commissioner identifies in paragraph 52 of his report as one of the top policing priorities for 1985.

In advocating solutions for improving law and order in my part of south London, the divisional report gives priority to the containment, detection and punishment of burglary when people are convicted. It puts great stress on the value of preventive measures such as "neighbourhood watch" as a way of stopping these problems at source. It also foreshadows intensified police action directed to combating auto crime and improving road safety. I stress once again that more police attention should be devoted not just to those two aspects of policing, but to the related problems of vandalism and hooliganism.

My constituents believe, and many of them have written to tell me this, that such behaviour is anti-social and thoroughly offensive, and causes intolerable fear to and anxiety for many people, especially the elderly, on large estates. It must be a priority to ensure that when detected and convicted those offenders are dealt with severely by the courts and go to prison for long periods.

It has not been easy in recent times for the police to achieve all that they would have liked to achieve, especially as the miners' dispute, which has been mentioned, and the many demonstrations that take place in central London almost every week have placed enormous extra demands on the force. That has been felt by the divisions from what one might call the suburban parts of the metropolitan area, such as my constituency, which have had to supply extra manpower in mutual aid to the centre.

We may still be feeling some of the longer-term effects of those damaging disputes and demonstrations. Police leave had to be shelved at the time of the miners' dispute and it is now being taken up, with the inevitable consequences for police cover in areas such as mine.

I suggest that the answers to the various policing problems that I have identified must be found in a sensible combination of measures. Clearly, we need more police. That is something to which I shall return. We need more of the available police on the beat. In that context, I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the paragraph in the divisional strategic plan for the Epsom division, which makes this pertinent comment on public attitudes:

> "During the preparation of this year's plan, a number of opinion formers within the community were canvassed by letter in an effort to produce a strategy that also reflected the views of the community. The theme which ran through all responses was that police must be seen. The presence of a policeman in uniform in the street is seen to be one factor which reassures the public that crime is being kept under control."

That is what the public want. I believe that the opinion formers were speaking for the public, and I hope that that emphasis will be continued in the policing of the Metropolitan area.

The third element must be to place more emphasis on all forms of crime prevention, as the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and many others have said. Fourthly, and vitally important, there must be more police co-operation with the public in all appropriate forums and ways.

On that last point, I commend the idea of local police liaison committees. I am familiar with the workings of the police liaison committee in the London borough of Sutton. I should like to see even more fruitful contacts maintained and developed between local officers and schools and many other institutions involving young people.

I have had the good fortune to go out with the police from Sutton in some of their rapid response vehicles, in particular on a Friday evening, which is one of the peak periods for crime. I have also been out on the beat with neighbourhood policemen and local beat officers in the Wallington sub-division. I can vouch for the fact that the combination of those high technology quick-response methods plus the traditional methods of policemen on the beat, on bicycles and in their neighbourhood communities, is a powerful combination and helps the police to do the job as well as possible.

[Mr. Nigel Forman]

I am, therefore, a strong believer in the preventive advantages of community policing. However, when all that is said and done, still more needs to be addressed. There is no getting away from the Commissioner's recent warning, which has been widely publicised, that without even more resources for the Metropolitan police, it will be difficult to provide the capital with the protection and the reassurance which it needs and the public deserve. As one of my local newspapers, the Wallington Advertiser, put it recently in an excellent editorial:

"The only real answer to increased crime is increased policing. That means more money for the police which this 'law and order' Government should remember if they want to retain the loyalty of areas such as the borough of Sutton."

The Government, whom I support, must face the need to set higher establishment figures for the Metropolitan police, and ones which are truly commensurate with the demands of combating rising crime and lawlessness which unhappily afflict the metropolitan area.

I recognise all that the Government have done and the figures which were quoted by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I pay tribute to him and to his predecessors for building up the police in the way that they have done. My constituents appreciate that, but I must make a point about the long-term aspects which I should like my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues in the Home Office to consider carefully.

If we take a longer view and study policing in the metropolitan area back to just before the last war, we find that since 1938 the population of the Metropolitan police district has declined by about 15 per cent., but that recorded crime over the same period has increased by an alarming 660 per cent., while the establishment of the Metropolitan police has increased by only 39 per cent. Even though we now have an establishment of 27,165 officers and an actual strength that is commendably close to that level, the long-term trends to which I have drawn attention should merit the close consideration of Home Office Ministers, in particular in any negotiations that they have with their colleagues in the Treasury.

I believe that we should be prepared to find the necessary extra resources to enable us to meet the higher and more realistic establishment levels that we must attain. I make no apology for stressing that the extra policing responsibilities of the Metropolitan police must be recognised in that way. I suggest strongly that within those larger establishment figures a higher priority should be given to meeting the growing policing needs of the Epsom division and, especially, the Wallington sub-division within it. In that way, more effective action can be taken to deal with crime and lawlessness at source and to improve the still too low detection and clear-up rates for many crimes.

I acknowledge that the most serious crimes have a commendably high detection and clear-up rate, but the House should realise—I am sure that it does—that many of our constituents are equally worried about some of the less serious crimes, such as burglary, which affect them directly.

I wish the Metropolitan police well. I congratulate the Commissioner on his report. I realise that the police have a variety of difficult tasks to perform and that in many ways they are expected to perform social as well as policing tasks, which complicates the position. We must resolve to give the police the extra resources and support that they need. I am confident that in that way we can make further progress in dealing with the difficult problem of lawlessness and crime.

12.9 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) said that the response to more crime should be more police. To an extent, there has to be an immediate response to protect the community. However, what divides hon. Members is the fact that some of us believe that the response to more crime also has to be more homes, more jobs, more stability and less poverty, because there is an inescapable connection between the degradation and indignity to which many people are subjected in our inner cities and levels of crime. If one correlates the most depressed areas with the greatest indices of deprivation, one sees that they also have the most crime. There is no way out of that problem simply by providing more resources for the police, although I would not disagree that there are circumstances in which that has to be done.

I welcome the open and frank style of the Commissioner in his report. On page 13, one tries to spot one's own constituency. On that page, the Commissioner frankly sets out the problems when there has been drug dealing, when one has to satisfy the demands of the local community which does not want that anti-social activity, while at the same time the police do not want to damage the support that has been built up throughout the whole community, by going in in a rough and unfeeling way. The way in which the Commissioner poses those problems is a frank admission of his difficulties. He is also frank in dealing with some past mistakes, although I do not always agree with his conclusions.

For instance, the Commissioner says that the Vagrancy Act 1824 could have remained on the statute book if it had been more sensitively used by police officers. He believes that we need not have had the Bail Act 1976 if the police had been more sensitive. I have no doubt that it was right to get rid of the Vagrancy Act and introduce the Bail Act, but I do not take credit away from him for recognising weaknesses in the past and building on experience.

We welcome the increasing clear-up rates where they take place, as well as the Commissioner's emphasis upon co-operation with the community. Although overall crime has continued to rise in Lambeth, there have been some dramatic improvements in relations between the police and the public as well as in clear-up rates, as a result of community activity and co-operation between the police and local groups. Part of the success has come from increasing co-operation between the police and the local authority. When one reads what local authorities say about the police and what the police sometimes say about the local authorities, one would not always know that that was so, but under the surface I believe that there is growing co-operation particularly between housing departments and local police forces. The Government must recognise the importance of retaining the link between the police and local authorities, particularly after the abolition of the Greater London council and the end of any strategic authority for London.

The Government must recognise that one day local authorities will play a part in the accountability of the police. Anything that tears apart the relationship between the police and their local authority is wrong. My local police consultative committee has been disappointed with the Commissioner's plans to break up the districts. Lambeth police had the same boundary as the local authority. We were particularly disappointed because that proposal was made without prior consultation. We were told that the broad framework of the reorganisation of the London police had been established, and there was to be consultaion only on the detail. That was wrong. The closer that the organisation of the police force can grow towards the organisation of local government the better.

One notes from the Home Secretary's remarks that there are now 5,000 more police and civilians on the staff. We all recognise that one of the reasons why we are elected to Parliament is to protect the citizen from violence and theft so that he is safe in his own home and upon the streets. That is our duty, but the Home Secretary has completely failed to discharge that task. There is no evidence in the report that any of the duties that the right hon. and learned Gentleman takes upon himself have been discharged.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) said that there was a breakdown of confidence in the police in 1979. He welcomed the report and the extent to which it mapped out the success in rebuilding morale since then. However, since 1979 there had been an increase of 30 per cent. in recorded crime in London, yet between 1977 and 1979 there was a reduction in recorded crime. I should have thought that the police would draw more confidence and morale from a reduction in recorded crime than from an increase of 30 per cent. over the past six years.

Even in the past year there has been a failure—crime in London has risen by 9 per cent., which is higher than the national average. That has happened although, as he said, the Home Secretary has added the equivalent of the entire Merseyside police force to the establishment of the Metropolitan police. The clear-up rate in London is far too low. At 17 per cent. it compares extremely unfavourably with other conurbations where the clear-up rate is two to three times better. It is no better in my constituency than elsewhere.

My people continue to be failed. In Lambeth, the chances of being robbed or being the victim of crime are almost three times greater than in the rest of the country. That is not right. There is an insufficient perception about who the victims of crime are. Some people have a sentimental, sloppy view that crime involves a transfer of resources from the rich to the poor, that somehow there is a Robin Hood element in the criminal fraternity that brings about the transfer of resources. That could not be further from the truth. I have always taken such an interest in the policing of my constituency and my borough because I know that the victims of crime are among the poorest in the community. The chances of being robbed on the streets of Lambeth are about 20 times higher than on the streets of Kingston upon Thames or Richmond upon Thames. If one is affluent enough to have a car, the chances of being robbed when one is doing the shopping or of having a chain snatched from around one's neck are far fewer than for those who have to walk home or queue for a bus.

The same is true for the pattern of burglaries. A survey of one of my estates showed that about 40 per cent. of the inhabitants had a personal acquaintance with burglary, either of themselves or of an immediate neighbour. That is an extraordinarily high figure. It underlines the fact that the victims of crime tend to be the poorest and most vulnerable in the community. Any idea that such crime is directed by poor people against the rich is not true, certainly not numerically.

Despite the growth of crime in London by 30 per cent. in five years, and 9 per cent. over the past year, the Government are responding to the problems of crime in the same way as they do to the problems of housing, health care and so on. They have decided that monetarism is more important than a safe community. They have now announced the cash limiting — the rate capping as it were—of the Metropolitan police, as well as of several boroughs. It is no good the Government pretending that, once they start capping expenditure and resources in that way, it does not have some effect on policing.

A paragraph in the report, quoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), makes this clear:

> "If we rise, for example, to a centrally counselled drive against drugs, which brings heavy demands on manpower through round-the-clock surveillance, then the existence of finite ceilings to manpower will dictate the removal of officers from other duties."

The moment that one starts limiting the expenditure that the police believe they should undertake, somebody will suffer. We must recognise that the drive against drugs is an extremely expensive and detailed operation. I know that from my constituency, where, over several months, the police mounted a carefully targeted operation to catch the dealers, not the punters. In that way they caught the real criminals and did not alienate those who simply dabbled in a joint or two of cannabis. It was an extremely successful operation, but it cost money. If we are to have expenditure limits on policing a borough such as mine, something must suffer, and I suspect that people will suffer. They will be burgled at home or experience what are called "opportunistic crimes".

More money must be spent on detailed surveillance to tackle the heroin problem. The police have not caught a worthwhile heroin dealer if he is an addict. It is easy to push up the number of dealers who have been caught, to put them behind bars and to parade those statistics, but if only people who are addicted to heroin are being caught, there has been no success.

The pattern of heroin dealing and consumption in south London is rather like pyramid selling. Once somebody becomes addicted to heroin, he can usually satisfy that addiction only by going into crime or by becoming a dealer. Such a person needs 10 or 12 customers to provide enough profit to satisfy the habit. When the addict's new customers themselves become addicts, they will need another 10 or 12 customers, who will probably become addicts, to supply the profit to sustain their addition. Once addicted, people are likely to get caught — heroin addiction rots their brains, among other things.

There must be a much higher level of police surveillance targeted at those who make the real money. That entails resources. It would be ridiculous to cap any such expenditure, whether by reducing the amount of money spent on catching dealers or by reducing expenditure on other forms of policing.

If we are to deal with the problem of heroin dealing and addiction, the Government must consider other aspects of the law. I believe that part of the rise of crime in south London is accounted for by heroin addiction. Somebody who attends a court might find that 10 people are charged with offences ranging from burglary to shoplifting and taking and driving away a motor vehicle. It is quite likely that none of them will be being charged with possessing heroin or dealing in it, but, digging a little deeper, it might well be found that the substantial cause of almost every crime was addiction to heroin.

A robbery might appear in the statistics as a robbery when it was the consequence of heroin addiction. That means that many people are now beginning to commit crime almost as automatons and they will commit crimes as long as they remain addicted. We must therefore consider much more deeply the treatment of offenders when the prime cause of an offence is addiction.

I have talked exclusively about heroin in this context, but cocaine is an increasing influence. We cannot deal with the problem simply by recourse to the criminal law, to imprisonment and its alternatives. I go as far as saying that people who are hopelessly addicted to heroin should be treated as mentally ill rather than criminal. The result of such treatment would be that their immediate suffering and the constraints on their liberty were greater. The Government must take a much deeper and longer look at the correlation between the criminal law and the law for the mentally ill if they are to deal with the heroin problem.

One of the consequences of escalating rates of crime in south London is a rise in insurance premiums. Insurance companies log burglary claims according to postal districts so that, if crime is especially high in, for example, SW2, SW4 or SW9, the premium becomes prohibitive. The result is that the mixture in a community will get poorer as people with possessions will leave the area if they cannot get insurance cover or find it prohibitively expensive. Poverty and deprivation in some inner-city areas will therefore be intensified. I should like local authorities to run some form of insurance scheme on council estates. After all, people who are "allocated" to an estate deserve the protection and security of insurance.

The number of black applicants to the Metropolitan police dropped from 444 in 1983 to 400 in 1984. We must recognise that there is something seriously wrong. The ethnic minorities are badly represented in the Metropolitan police. I know that this is not scientific evidence, but I should like to give an example of how the perception of black policemen can differ in other parts of the world.

The film "Beverly Hills Cop" has been so successful that it has probably grossed more money than "Gone with the Wind". People have gone back time and again to see Eddie Murphy playing a New York cop on holiday in California. There are enormous queues outside cinemas —I have tried twice to get in. Many of the people who have gone to see the film are black. They love the film and regard the cop as a hero. He is investigating cocaine dealing and is obviously the object of adulation and great humour. We should compare the perception of that black cop with that of his counterpart in the Metropolitan police. I was struck forcibly by the difference of perception when I saw a black policeman guarding the South African embassy recently. It is almost as though somebody was being humiliated.

It would be much better if we saw a few more black policemen in positions of authority. I should like to see more black policemen on the cars—I have never seen a black policeman driving a police car. How many black detectives, how many Eddie Murphys, are there in the Metropolitan police? That kind of image of the Metropolitan police force among the black community shows that something is wrong.

I am not trying to apportion blame, but the under-representation of the black community in the police force shows that something is seriously wrong. A more imaginative approach should be adopted. The number of black applicants to join the Metropolitan police is 400, but only 30 of the 400 have been accepted. Only a small number of the black people who applied to join the Metropolitan police were even interviewed, which suggests that the employment policy of the Metropolitan police is not sufficiently imaginative.

One of the ways of improving relations between the police and the community and catching more criminals is to have all sections of the community represented in the Metropolitan police. Then there would be more understanding of the mores of the local community and the different cultural groups. I am not suggesting that blacks should be set to catch blacks, or whites to catch whites, but there is something wrong with the present recruitment policy and it must be improved.

I ask the Government not to remain complacent and unctuous about the achievements of the Metropolitan police. No matter how great a gloss the Government put upon the report, the truth is that life in London is becoming less and less safe and people's property less and less secure.

This is having an effect on the inner city areas in particular. For the Government to respond by cash-limiting the Metropolitan police and dressing up the figures in the report as some kind of achievement is nonsense. They need to think again about their responsibility to the whole community.

12.30 pm

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): This important debate has turned out to be a personal disappointment for me. I have great respect for the intellectual powers of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), and I am sure that many hon. Members share my view. However, for him to come to the House and tell us that he has not had time to be sufficiently briefed on a highly controversial video produced by the GLC and that he has been chasing around in Brecon and Radnor is extraordinary and unacceptable.

It is also disappointing that so few hon. Members from London constituencies are to be seen on both the Government and the Opposition Benches. Both this week and last week has seen a notable absence of Opposition Members. We have been facing Opposition motions, so perhaps the absence today of Conservative Members is due to the fact they have been putting in overtime this week and today are catching up with their paper work.

I am also disappointed that the chairman of the GLC, the council which we are told speaks for London, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), is not here today.

Mr. Corbyn: He is working.

Mr. Tracey: It is disappointing that he is not here to give us the benefit of his views and his considered wisdom.

Mr. Corbyn: Where is the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks)? Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the subject of absent friends, can he tell us where the spokesman for the Police Federation is today?

Mr. Tracey: I am happy to respond to that question. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) is not here, but I represent the constituency in which the head office of the Police Federation is situated. I maintain a close relationship with the federation, and hope that I shall be able to reflect to some extent its view on the topics under discussion. Ten days ago I was privileged to be on a phone-in programme of the London Broadcasting Company. I was amazed at the extraordinary attitude that some people adopt towards the police. It is destructive rather than constructive, on a matter that must be of concern to all members of society. It is an antagonistic rather than a co-operative attitude towards the police. I am sure that that is spurred on by the propaganda in the GLC's video, and that it is very harmful to society in the capital.

I am heartened by the fact that last year a national opinion poll——

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tracey: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he will take the opportunity later to address the House at great length, as he always does.

A national opinion poll last year found that 75 per cent. of the population of the metropolis were quite happy with the way in which policing was going on. Policing would be helped even more if a more helpful community attitude were taken by Labour Members, their colleagues across the river in County Hall and several London boroughs—all Labour-controlled—which have not yet seen fit to adopt a proper police consultative procedure.

I welcome the Commissioner's report. Sir Kenneth Newman is one of the leading policemen and leading authorities on policing in the world. I am sure that that view is shared by his colleagues in police forces throughout the world. They certainly look to his example. His report is sound and justifies many more hon. Members being present to discuss it.

The report's analysis of modern crime was not quite reflected in the remarks of the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). Much of modern crime in the metropolis is random and opportunist—for example, auto crime and walk-in crime. Of course it is not satisfactory to have a clear-up rate of only 17 per cent., but that is a misleading figure. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) pointed out, the Metropolitan police have a clear-up record of 77 per cent. for homicide, 73 per cent. for crimes involving kidnapping and 55 per cent. for crimes of blackmail and wounding. To bandy about the figure of 17 per cent. as though it represented every aspect of crime in the metropolis is misleading and a deliberate smear on the police.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that a non-clear-up rate of about 25 per cent. for murder is satisfactory? Does he think that it is reasonable that a quarter of the murders committed in London go unsolved, when the rate is nearly always 100 per cent. in nearly every other part of the country?

Mr. Tracey: Of course I do not believe that that is satisfactory. Indeed, at the beginning of my remarks on this section I said that 17 per cent. was not satisfactory. It is right for hon. Members to look at the more successful side of the operations of the Metropolitan police and not to harp on constantly about the less successful figures. That carping by Labour Members dismays Conservative Members.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary pointed out, the Government have considerably increased resources for the Metropolitan police. The budget of £763 million represents a 5 per cent. increase this year. As I understand it, the Government intend to continue putting resources into the Metropolitan police force. Much has been made of one reference in the Commissioner's report to cash limits, about which he is apparently unhappy. I draw the attention of Opposition Members to an article by the Commissioner in the Metropolitan police newspaper Job, which is headlined "Living within our means". He starts by saying:

> "The Met now has a fixed income, called a cash limit. Like any family on fixed income, we have to live within our means."

He concludes the article by saying:

> "I am confident that the Met will respond to the challenge of living within our means. This is no more than you and I have to do in our private lives. As an organisation we can do it too."

That shows the Commissioner's confidence in himself and his men that they can meet the challenge which the Government have rightly set the force, in the same way as the Government have set a challenge to local authorities, health authorities and other national bodies.

We must take careful note of the fact that since 1979, when the Conservative Government came to office, 4,500 more policemen have been recruited, which, as my right hon. and learned Friend pointed out, is as many as there are in the Merseyside police force. Greater emphasis has been placed on efficiency monitoring in all areas of the work. More of the tasks that can be conducted by civilians are being conducted by them. The civilian strength of the Metropolitan police has increased by 1,250.

There is greater scope for such measures. We could consider putting out to tender ancillary services and operations not directly concerned with policing. Obviously, vehicles should be maintained in that way, and services within the Scotland Yard building and other police premises could be dealt with similarly. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend has said that that is being studied, and I wish him well in that. There is no doubt that where that has happened in health authorities and in various local authorities in London, including Wandsworth, which is now a historic borough in terms of local government, everyone except a few head-in-the-sand Socialists knows that the ratepayers and the borough enjoy greater efficiency.

Evidence of that in the Metropolitan police would be of great assistance in meeting some of the demands made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman). He seemed to suggest that we should constantly plough more money into employing more and more policemen, but every extra policeman costs about £25,000 or £26,000. Clearly, the Commissioner and those who run the Metropolitan police must strive for the greatest possible efficiency, and that is what is happening now.

In my local borough, the Royal borough of Kingston upon Thames, the police are having great success. Of crimes reported to the police, the burglary rate has been reduced by 20·4 per cent., and serious assaults, robberies, fraud and indecency have been reduced by 11·7 per cent. during the past year. On-beat crimes reported to the police have fallen by 2·8 per cent. Only in motor vehicle crime, which so greatly inflates the statistics for the Metropolitan police record, has there been an increase of 4·7 per cent.

We are tackling these matters in the Royal borough of Kingston upon Thames. We have a consultative committee known as the "Police and Community Forum" and I pay tribute to the Labour chairman of that extremely hard-working committee, which brings in various strands from all parts of the community — the schools, the churches, the youth clubs, and so on—and gives useful thought to the best way of policing the borough.

Stemming from the deliberations of that committee we now have more than 50 neighbourhood watch schemes out of 1,200 or so in the metropolis as a whole. These schemes have attracted great support from people in the borough, and the reduction of 20·4 per cent. in the number of burglaries reported shows the effectiveness of the schemes. In my mind, and in the minds of people living in the borough, there is no doubt about that and we are pressing on to form even more neighbourhood watch schemes to achieve greater success and to ensure the co-operation between the public and the police that is vital to the policing of the borough, rather than leaving everything to the uniformed police.

The attitude of people in my borough and in so many Greater London boroughs, with the exception of eight Labour boroughs, which seem to refuse to co-operate with the police in that way, contrasts with the attitude of the GLC, which happily will not be with us for many more months. That council chooses to spend £1 million per year on a so-called police committee and on setting up police support groups and other bodies which I fear are no more than anti-police propaganda units.

The GLC also chooses to produce newsheets entitled "Policing London" written in a fashion aimed to detract from the good work of the Metropolitan police, and to spend £35,000 on producing a "Policing London" video, which has already been mentioned in the debate. I was most disappointed that the right hon. Member for Gorton could not find it in himself to repudiate the suggestion in that video that communities must rebel. [HON. MEMBERS: "Has the hon. Gentleman seen it?"] Certainly, I have seen it. I believe that there was an open invitation to all hon. Members to see it some months ago, when we were sent a folder and a poster telling us of "A 30-minute dramatised introduction to the GLC's policy on the Metropolitan Police".

We have heard today that children in inner London schools are being invited to see this scurrilous stuff which invites communities to rebel. What greater charge can be laid against a council than that it has produced a video which ends with those words? We actually see on the screen a man mouthing the words "Communities must rebel." It is the Greater London council underwriting that advice to children in inner London schools. Why is the chairman of the Greater London council, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, not here to repudiate that?

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman and other Government supporters have sunk to an abysmal level today. Each of them knows that that quotation is featured in a poem—a man is reading a poem to a group. It no more implies what the GLC thinks than the phrase

"To be, or not to be" in "Hamlet" suggests that Shakespeare was an existentialist. The hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense and he knows it.

Incidentally, as the Government propose to abolish the GLC, the police support unit and the others which the hon. Gentleman criticises, does he know that they are the very people who put in the application for money for the victim support scheme, to which the Home Secretary has not yet responded?

Mr. Tracey: I shall certainly respond to the hon. Gentleman's comment about the film. I do not care whether the phrase is featured in a poem or in a playlet in the film. For the producers of the film to put it there is the exercise of dramatic licence gone mad. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the film is to be shown to children in ILEA schools.

I go further. A motion was tabled for discussion at a meeting of the Greater London council calling upon the council to withdraw the video featuring the phrase "Communities must rebel." It was described as being "tantamount to inciting violence and hatred."

Mr. Paul Boateng, whom we know only too well and who wishes to come to the House as the Member of Parliament for Brent, South following the next general election, tabled an amendment deleting the words criticising the video and saying that the council

"continues to ensure, through all means open to it, including the production of videos like 'Policing London', that information about the policing of London is available in the most graphic and accessible forms to all the people of London."

That is the attitude adopted by Mr. Boateng in respect of that insidious video. In his view, it should be shown to children in the schools of inner London, among them my own children. As a parent, I detest that attitude. But I am not surprised that Mr. Boateng holds the views that he does, because he has gone even further. In The Standard of 18 September 1984, Mr. Boateng was directly quoted on the subject of justices of the peace in London. He said:

"We must now make magistrates accountable to the Party. That doesn't mean they will refer every decision to the Party but the quality of their justice will be measured. They will have to accept the line on Party justice."

That is typical of the attitude of the Greater London council and of the chairman of its police committee. I invite the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) to repudiate Mr. Boateng's attack on magistrates and the message that communities must rebel which is about to be put before our children in the GLC's video about the police.

The best way to encourage our children to work with and co-operate with the police in our communities, which is the finest way to bring about effective policing and law and order in the metropolis, is to adopt the course that one finds in some parts of London, where the police go to schools and talk to children and attend other public events. Home beat officers attend events and talk to children and adults about their work. Mounted policemen attend with their horses, as do police drivers and motor cyclists. They try to interest the public in their work. Those events will help to bring about co-opertation and to educate the public properly about the work of the police.

I endorse the comment of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) that the police must be seen on housing estates and that borough councils must encourage the police to come on to estates and to communicate with the public to seek co-operation.

Mr. Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman believes that borough councils should have closer liaison with the police, but does he accept that the reorganisation of the Metropolitan police proposed by the Home Secretary will make liaison with any local authority much more difficult? The reorganisation will create huge new police areas, and many local authorities, including Conservative-controlled ones, have objected to it on those grounds.

Mr. Tracey: I do not agree that reorganisation will make liaison more difficult. It will still be possible to have the same format of consultative committees in the boroughs, and the community will still be able to consult the police. I am sure that the police will make it just as easy for councillors and residents' associations to communicate their views on the policing of London. I do not accept that the reorganisation, which seeks greater efficiency, will cut across lines of communication with the public.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will have picked up some useful points on the policing of London from this debate. We have a fine Commissioner in Sir Kenneth Newman, who has produced a useful report on policing in the metropolis in 1984. We must constantly seek greater efficiency and cost-effectiveness in the police force, and the important message that should go out from the House is that there should be the greatest possible co-operation between the public and the police in the metropolis.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The debate is a travesty of the way in which we should discuss the organisation, control and operation of the police force in London. No one can pretend that it is satisfactory, when an organisation spends £800 million a year, to debate it once a year in the House on a Friday morning, with few hon. Members present and with the Home Secretary present for only part of the time, although he is the police authority for London. There will be no vote at the end of the debate, and we can have no detailed discussion on the way in which the police force is organised in each area.

I hope that, when the Minister replies, he will concede that there is a glaring lack of democracy in the running of London's police force compared with the system elsewhere in the country. Ministers must accept that, if Londoners are to have any confidence in the running of the police force, they must have an elected police authority. If it is good enough for every other police force to be run democratically, why is it not good enough for London?

Although we are discussing the police force, some reference must be made to the growing influence that the Commissioner and deputy commissioners of police have over the public order legislation framed by the Home Office. They also have growing influence with the media on the way in which public order issues are discussed. The Home Office has produced an ever-increasing framework of control and repression in its public order legislation. These are important matters.

The Home Secretary and police officers call for the control of political activity and dissent. The licensing system for marches, the control of political organisations which wish to march in London and the cost of policing those marches is creating an atmosphere of political repression which will lead to the banning of some political organisations. The Home Secretary's job is to protect political freedoms, not to create an atmosphere in which political freedoms are denied or might even be taken away. He should address himself to his role in protecting civil liberties rather than appearing on television and radio and making utterances in the opposite direction.

How is it that the Metropolitan police force manages to spend £801 million a year and claims to be an ever-growing force, yet it is always short of staff and its clear-up rate is by far the lowest in the country? It is incredible that the police are seriously considering tagging reported crimes so that they can decide whether they are worth investigating because their clear-up rate is already so inefficient.

I suspect that the Government intend to use the crime figures in the same way as the unemployment figures and to change the basis of the statistics so that they look better than they are. If the police decide that it is not worth following up a housebreaking when the goods lost are worth less than £100, for example, the clear-up rate will look much better. I hope that the Minister of State can assure us that the Government have no intention of introducing a system which would allow certain crimes to be ignored because the police cannot be bothered to clear them up.

Government Members talk about confidence in the police force and attacks on the police, real or imaginary, by Opposition Members and the GLC or borough councils. The Minister should consider the feelings of people in the communities, particularly in inner-city areas such as the one that I represent. Peolle are worried about burglary, damage to property, theft, racist attacks, attacks on women and safety on council estates. When approached locally, the police are often helpful and are prepared to discuss such matters. However, higher up the hierarchy of the Metropolitan police one finds a growing obsession with the need for high technology, highly mobile and heavily motorised policing which does nothing to improve the safety on council estates, and nothing to reduce the incidence of housebreaking, theft or petty burglary. In fact, it does the opposite.

People complain that, when a local policeman is appointed to a particular estate, as soon as he gets to know the area and to understand and work with the community he is moved to another beat. That is unsatisfactory. What does the Minister of State intend to do about that?

The lack of democracy in the police force is underlined by the complaints procedure. It cannot be satisfactory for an organisation to investigate itself when a complaint is made against it. A complaint against local government is investigated by the Commissioner for Local Authority Administration in England. Complaints against the Civil Service or any other public body are not investigated internally. The police tend to investigate themselves, and there is much disquiet about that. Lord Scarman, reporting in November 1981 following the Brixton riots, said:

> "There is a widespread and dangerous lack of public confidence in the existing system for handling complaints against the Police. By and large, people do not trust the Police to investigate the Police."

He was right, and all the surveys carried out by independent research organisations support that view.

Fears have been expressed about the reorganisation of the Metropolitan police. Many objections and complaints have been made about the proposal to reorganise the police into larger areas. In my area, the inner city borough of Islington, the unemployment rate is registered at about 20 per cent., but in real terms it is 30 per cent. or higher. For youth it is higher than that, and for black youth it is higher still. My constituents suffer enormous social deprivation. Our local police force is to be linked with Waltham forest, Haringey and Enfield, so creating a new police area extending from the City of London to Cheshunt in Hertfordshire. These are entirely different areas with different problems and different social attitudes.

What possible reason could there be for introducing that form of reorganisation? When the plans were placed on our desks, we learned that the proposal had come about as the result of management experts discussing with the police the most efficient way, in the view of the management experts, of running the police. The greatest input appeared to have been made by the McDonald hamburger chain. There was no consultation with local authorities, community organisations, tenants' associations and others concerned with the issues involved.

The Home Secretary may say that if we went in for super police areas the local relationship would remain unchanged. I do not believe that. We are likely to have a series of super police headquarters around London. Indeed, one is being planned for Islington. That will lead to the closure of other police stations, which in turn will lead to a highly centralised police force, with one person in charge of the district and responsible directly to the Commissioner, and the local level of consultation will have gone.

Underlying the plan by the Home Office is, in my view, a fear of the growing demand for democratic control of the police. Under the present system there is, in large measure, conterminosity between the boundaries of police districts and the borough councils.

A constituent of mine living in, say, Hornsey road in a council flat can, if wishing to complain about the flat, visit the local council offices or see the locally elected representative on the council. If that person is concerned about something to do with the police, he or she can do little but come to me, and one day once a year, in June, I might get a chance to raise the issue in Parliament.

A parallel is becoming obvious with the denial of democratic rights as the police force is organised into a larger unit, which denies local authority consultation methods. Indeed, various consultation groups in London met the Minister of State about this issue and then presented him with a resolution. Police-community consultative organisations from Enfield, Hammersmith, Fulham, Harrow, Islington, Kensington, Chelsea, Lambeth, Merton and Wandsworth met on 18 March last and agreed a resolution saying:

"The group expressed its regret that the Consultative Committees were not given any prior notice of the proposed reorganisation . . . calls upon the Commissioner to amend his proposal to retain the Borough as the consultative unit, thereby also retaining the District as an operational unit under the control of a District Commander . . . calls upon the Commissioner to retain the Borough-based Community Liaison Officer."

It would be interesting to know how many objections to the plans for reorganisation and, implicitly, the changes in consultation arrangements the Home Secretary received.

It would be interesting also to know how many of those complaints went on to call for a more democratic system of control of the police force in future. The Home Office owes it to the House and the people of London to explain the real motives behind the process of reorganisation. It has not convinced anyone that the reorganised force will be any cheaper to operate. I am convinced that it is trying to deny the possibility in future of locally elected police authorities, or at least some form of consultation at borough level in the running of the police force.
